"There's a real culture of innovation in Israel, and it's grown significantly over the last two decades," he said. "Israel is now a real leader in startups and entrepreneurship. It's ranked first in the world in terms of the number of scientists and technicians per 10,000 employees."

A pediatric gastroenterologist, Avitzur established the first national pediatric small-bowel transplantation program in Israel and is currently a medical director at the Hospital for Sick Children in Toronto.

In his opinion, one of the driving forces behind Israel's success is the sense of responsibility and teamwork instilled in Israel's children through youth groups. As they age, he said, this ethic is further cemented in the army.

> 'It's ranked first in the world in terms of the number of scientists and technicians per 10,000 employees'

"In the army, everyone has regular debriefings with candid and honest discussions," he said. "That atmosphere of constructive criticism and honesty translates well for new companies. You lose time with subtlety – what you really need is for people to be able to tell their bosses when things are not working."

In developing the country's first pediatric small-bowel transplant program, Avitzur relied on his own experiences growing up in Israel. "We had to overcome many obstacles," he said, citing Israel's low rate of organ donations. "We had to adopt the typical Israeli mentality: improvise, be creative, and have a little chutzpah. We really had to think outside the box."

This kind of creativity has played a major role in Israel's entrepreneurial success, he said. "Israelis come up with ideas that sound like science fiction at first. In Israel, there's a mentality that you have to be willing to take risks, and that it is okay to fail as long as you're persistent."

Avitzur also cited the regulatory and financial frameworks in Israel as key to the success of its high-tech and biotech industries. "In their early stages, Israeli 'incubator' companies are well supported by government subsidies and venture capital," he said, noting that Israel spends a higher percentage of its GDP on research and development than any other country in the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD).

"You need ideas and passion, but you also need the market support, patents, regulatory bodies and technology in place to turn those ideas into products," he said. "Israel has that unique mixture of core values, education and financial structure to help new businesses succeed."

Despite these enormous successes, Avitzur warned of challenges facing Israel's biotech future. "Our math and science scores are not what they used to be," he said. "On top of that, there's high unemployment amongst males because so many of them are going to a yeshiva instead of working. It's not sustainable."

Avitzur's lecture was part of a two-part lecture series on Israel's high-tech and biotech industries hosted by Darchei Noam's adult education and Israel connections committees.

"When you hear about Israel on the news, it's always about the conflict," says Meir Bester, chair of Darchei Noam's adult education committee. "It's rare to see a story of Israeli success, so we've decided to focus on Israel's great achievements in the high-tech and medical arenas."

The second lecture will feature Jonathan Levy , Israel's consul for economic affairs, who will dissect the business climate behind Israel's growth and discuss key Israeli innovations. Levy will be speaking on April 3 at 7 p.m. at Congregation Darchei Noam, 864 Sheppard Ave. W.

Media-monitoring group helps educate students about Israel

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

A new program has been developed by CAMERA – a media-monitoring organization that promotes balanced coverage of Israeli news – to help pro-Israel students educate their campus communities about the Jewish state.

Since January, the Committee for Accuracy in Middle East Reporting in America (CAMERA), has been reaching out to students who need the resources, guidance and assistance in creating pro-Israel organizations where none exist.

Aviva Slomich

The initiative, called the CAMERA Campus Activist Project (CCAP), will provide students with the funds needed to invite speakers and hold events to educate others about Israel and to respond to anti-Israel events on campus.

"We are there to offer resources, guidance and funding to these students to ensure pro-Israel education is available on campus," said Aviva Slomich, CAMERA's director of student programming.

She said that since the program launched about three months ago, six American colleges have become involved with CCAP.

"We're currently on campuses where people are more apathetic… and where there is anti-Israel propaganda and they need help in refuting these claims."

Slomich added that she is interested in fostering relationships with Canadian students who want to present their peers with accurate information about Israel.

Over the past couple years, CAMERA has worked with Canadians through its fellowship program, which commissions undergraduate student to organize pro-Israel events on campus, monitor campus press for biased coverage of Israel-related issues and take part in a leadership training program in Israel.

This year, there are two Canadian fellows – one at Wilfred Laurier University and one at Carleton University.

But Slomich said she hopes to find more Canadian students to work with.

"It's definitely something we are interested in pursuing. We're looking for people who would want to work with us," she said.

The campaign, which is funded by an anonymous donor who was alarmed by the hostility facing Israel supporters on campus, is meant to support students who attend schools that don't have an active Hillel or don't have enough funding to promote events that educate others about Israel.

"If there is already a pro-Israel group that is doing well on campus, and a Hillel on campus that is educating students about Israel, we'll probably go to a different campus because we don't want to step on any toes. And if they are already getting enough resources, then that's great. We really want to focus on campuses that need help," Slomich said.

She said that while it's important to respond to anti-Israel programming on campus, such as the annual Israeli Apartheid Week, CCAP is presenting a proactive approach by working with campuses that may not be exposed to information about Israel at all.

"We're basically just here to educate people about Israel, and we're realizing that not enough people have information about Israel or realize how important Israel is as an ally to America," Slomich said. "That's one of the main reasons we want to get on campus – so that Jewish students and non-Jewish students can understand the fundamental relationship between Israel and North America, and why it is so important for us to support the country."

For more information, contact Slomich at aviva@camera.org or visit www.camera.org.

McGill student regrets violent web posts

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The McGill University student who tweeted about wanting to shoot people at a campus event that he deemed to be "a Zionist meeting" has formally apologized.

Haaris Khan now awaits the judgment of the university administration on whether he will be disciplined. After its investigation into the March 8 incident, Montreal police decided last week that it could not be proven that there was "criminal intent" behind the comments Khan made on his Twitter account.

"I am not an antisemite. I am not a terrorist. I am not a threat to my fellow students on campus," Khan, 20, an international development studies and software engineering student from Laval, stated. "I can be an idiot sometimes, though."

He did affirm that he is an "anti-Zionist," but that he realizes that anti-Zionism "tends to go hand in hand with antisemitism because of the complex relationship between Jewish identity and Israel. This creates a fine line when it comes to criticizing Israel and Zionism."

In an eloquent mea culpa, Khan said he now recognizes "the gravity of the situation considering the nature of my tweets, which were meant in jest." The text was published March 21 in the McGill Tribune, the newspaper published by the Student Society of McGill University, which broke the story March 14.

Khan made the series of tweets on his BlackBerry during a screening of the documentary Indoctrinate U, which deals with a perceived liberal political bias on North American campuses. The event was coincidentally held during Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW), and McGill was the scene of activities that were part of that international campaign.

Until last week, the McGill administration said little about the incident and has been guarded in any public comment. There has been criticism from some students that they should have been made aware of what happened sooner or that Khan should have been punished by now. The administration did say they last week that it finds Khan's messages "threatening and disturbing" and that it immediately contacted the police after the incident came to its attention and assisted in the investigation, according to Morton Mendelson, deputy provost for student life and learning.

The matter was also referred to McGill's "threat-assessment team" which decided that Khan posed no immediate physical risk. He continued to be allowed on campus, but he may still face suspension or even expulsion.

Mendelson also said McGill "does not support IAW. That said, we are staunch believers in free expression and the tolerance of diverse points of view. We have delivered this message to our community on a number of occasions and, indeed, are doing so again in light of the unacceptable Twitter messages."

Hillel Montreal president Corey Omer, a McGill law student, applauded the administration for taking the incident seriously and acting swiftly. He said he's confident it will come to a just decision. Omer said Hillel was pleased to see that Khan realizes the gravity of his words, but did not go so far as to say Hillel regards the matter as closed. Although the police have not laid charges, Omer said the matter may still be studied by the Crown prosecutor's office.

Not just another 'volun-tourism' experience

Jana Goodbaum

Guest Voice

Late last month, I was one of 11 students from Hillel Montreal who travelled to Nicaragua on an American Jewish World Service (AJWS) Alternative Spring Break trip.

Although we were gone only for a week, we returned with a lifetime of lessons, questions and ideas.

You may ask why we would choose to forgo the beach, or even the comfortable confines of our couches, to spend seven labour-intensive hours a day building ovens in the Nicaraguan countryside. While we may not have had valid answers for our skeptical friends and family members before we left, the answers are obvious now.

We spent our days working alongside families of campesinos, or rural farmers, in the community of Pedro Juoqim Chamoro, 20 minutes outside the town of Naindame.

Working alongside two very strong, very gracious families, and an NGO called Nochari – one of the 450 grassroots projects the AJWS supports – we built two ovens that the families will use to bring in consistent incomes. They will also sell their own products directly, rather than relying on exploitative middlemen.

However, we built a lot more than ovens. We built strong relationships, too. The feeling of solidarity that grew between ourselves and the families – who just a few weeks ago might have seemed very distant and different – was unbelievable.

We spent time observing the incredible impact of Nochari, and we were welcomed with open arms into the Naindame community, one that is amazingly vibrant despite dealing with decades of political injustice, revolution and civil war.

We visited a hibiscus plant that employs and empowers women in the community. The plant produces flor de jamaica, a juice made from dried hibiscus flowers that is popular in Nicaragua. We visited the organic farm of Nochari's president, Maria Eugenia Morales, who also provides free alternative medical services to the local community.

We also toured the town's hospital and learned about the day-to-day rewards and challenges of helping the sick without the resources we are accustomed to in Canada. We got to share the community's joy during the celebration of the town's patron saint and to share our Shabbat traditions with our new friends.

As if all of this wasn't enlightening enough, we spent more than two hours a day studying global issues, social justice, development, and significant Jewish texts that applied to the work we were doing.

You would think a group of hard-working students might want a break from studying during their spring break, but the debates and conversations were so engrossing that they went on long after the formal curriculum sessions ended.

We literally deconstructed each action we performed on our trip, to ensure that we embarked on this cross-cultural encounter responsibly and sensitively. I personally feel that I could have gone my whole life without considering some of the very difficult questions this experience brought up, but my worldview is now inextricably changed for the better having pondered them.

We are taught as Jews that to save one life is to save the world, and I truly feel that we are not only responsible for one another but also for everyone in need.

Despite acknowledging the responsibility to help, it is easy to feel overwhelmed by the prospect of facing the world's complex problems. However, participating in this trip, or partaking in any act of tzedakah at home or abroad, makes you realize that while you cannot do everything, every single act, big or small, makes a difference.

We returned from this trip feeling even more committed to and passionate about facing the world's challenges head-on, and I encourage you to fight the urge to retreat and start facing the challenges, too.

Why is Hamas ramping up the violence?

Last Wednesday's fatal bus stop bombing in Jerusalem that left one woman dead and 30 wounded, the first such attack in four years, brought media attention back to Israel.

The bombing followed the brutal murder of a family in Itamar and escalated mortar and missile attacks from Gaza. On the morning of March 19 alone, 50 mortars from Gaza were fired into Israel, forcing the Israel Defence Forces to respond.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Several foreign correspondents have addressed the issue of why Hamas has chosen to renew hostilities against Israel. Some have managed to get this profoundly wrong, such as Douglas Hamilton of Reuters. In a story carried in the National Post on March 24, Hamilton said that, according to officials, in the absence of a viable peace process "violence would almost certainly fill the void." This is absurd, since peace is the last thing Hamas wants to see – it's something it has tried to violently destroy since the early days of the Oslo process.

The same day, the Globe and Mail's Patrick Martin implied an equivalence between Hamas' assaults and Israel's counter-measures: "As the violent incidents continue to mount, both Israeli and Hamas leaders say they do not want the situation to escalate into all-out war. Yet neither side seems able to stop the attacks." Yet, significantly, Martin proceeded to undermine the equivalence by suggesting two reasons that explain Hamas' aggression. First, he cited former Canadian diplomat John Bell's assertion that Syria is goading Hamas to attack Israel as a way of distracting attention from turmoil in Syria itself. Second, Martin noted that according to some, Iran has taken advantage of the recent upheaval in Egypt to smuggle large amounts of arms into Gaza, thereby providing an increased incentive to use them.

Khaled Abu Toameh (Jerusalem Post, March 19) gave another explanation. He argued that Hamas has escalated its attacks in order to distract attention from its own internal difficulties, which include protests by thousands of Gazans for reconciliation with Fatah. Hamas has ruthlessly suppressed these protests and "targeted journalists, raiding press offices and confiscating cameras, laptops and other equipment." CNN, Reuters and Japanese TV station NHK were among those assaulted. The Palestinian (and Arab) intimidation of foreign correspondents who dare to report events deemed unfavourable to their regimes is itself one of the most under-reported stories in the entire region.

What is disturbing to Israelis, but largely ignored by the international community, is the toxic anti-Jewish atmosphere that has been fostered not only in Gaza, but in the West Bank, too. In its March 24 editorial, the Jerusalem Post noted that while Abbas deplored the Itamar attack, "he and his hierarchy continue to fete terrorists, demand their release, reward them financially, name streets and schools after them, extol them as role models and tolerate pro-terror indoctrination in the media, mosques and classrooms."

This incitement isn't confined to the parts of the Arab world. It's also a staple of UN bodies such as the ridiculously misnamed Human Rights Council, which is effectively devoted to lambasting Israel while ignoring massacres committed by

Arab member states. Only under intense, embarrassing glare was the council forced, against its nature, to evict Libya from membership when Gadhafi's crimes against his own citizens became too blatant to ignore. Still, no resolutions in the council were passed against Libya – those have been reserved overwhelmingly for Israel, including six last week alone.

The latest incitement came from the UN's "special rapporteur" on Palestinian human rights, Prof. Richard Falk, who can only be described as an anti-Israel fanatic – which is most likely the reason he was given the position in the first place. (Being a conspiracy theorist, notwithstanding his recent denials, in maintaining that the U.S. government is covering up its role in the 9/11 attacks, has failed to diminish his standing, despite a rebuke over this from UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon's office.) On March 21, Falk charged Israel with "ethnic cleansing" of Palestinians over its housing policies in east Jerusalem – the latest in a long string of inflammatory condemnations of Israel.

Montrealer helps in search for actor's ancestors

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Actor Gwyneth Paltrow's ancestral search, which will be told in a new episode of the NBC TV program Who Do You Think You Are? (WDYTYA), might not have happened if not for Jewish Records Indexing – Poland (JRI Poland).

Founded by Montrealer Stanley Diamond, JRI-Poland is an online searchable database of 4.2 million records related to Polish Jewry.

Gwyneth Paltrow

The April 1 episode of the celebrity documentary series will feature the Academy Award-winner's genealogical journey.

The late father of California-born Paltrow, 38, was Jewish. TV director and producer Bruce Paltrow (St. Elsewhere, The White Shadow) died in 2002. Her mother, actor Blythe Danner, is a Quaker of Pennsylvania Dutch background.

The Paltrow roots go back to a long line of rabbis named Paltrowicz from northeastern Poland and the towns of Suwalki, Lomza and nearby shtetls.

"The show's researchers tapped into into JRI-Poland's online database as the starting point in documenting Paltrow's ancestry," said Diamond.

"The website has 90 record entries for Paltrow's ancestors and the WDYTYA team said, 'JRI Poland is a wonderful resource for anyone researching Jewish Polish ancestry and was invaluable during the research for the Gwyneth Paltrow episode.'"

In addition, Diamond was able to point the show's researchers to other sources in Poland that are not yet online.

The producers of WDYTYA first contacted Diamond in May of last year. The show's first stop in their research is a private genealogical research company in Salt Lake City, which immediately pointed to JRI-Poland as the place to turn to look into Paltrow's paternal side.

Diamond, who was hired as a consultant on the project, was required to sign an agreement not to disclose the project. Only with the recent announcement by NBC of the upcoming episode was he able to make his involvement known.

He is, however, not at liberty to provide much detail on what was learned about the actor's forebears.

Founded in 1995, the non-profit JRI-Poland was an outgrowth of Diamond's need for access to Jewish vital records of the former Lomza Gubernia area of Poland for research into his family's genetic history.

Diamond is executive director and the organization has an international board, hundreds of volunteers serving thousands of researchers, and is funded by groups and genealogists around the world.

JRI-Poland is continually creating searchable online indices of Jewish records from current and former territories of Poland, comprising more than 550 towns. "The vast database of records going back to the late 18th century belies the misleading notion all the Jewish records of Poland were destroyed in World War II," said Diamond.

Thousands of new vital records and census information are added every month from the Polish State Archives and other sources, both inside and outside of Poland, he said. The database also includes army draft lists, cemetery burial indices, ghetto death records, and birth, marriage and death announcements in newspapers in Poland.

WDYTYA has sparked a lot of interest in family research, Diamond believes. Genealogy, among Jews and non-Jews, is no longer an obscure hobby, but something even celebrities find worthwhile.

"Genealogical websites are among the most visited of any," said Diamond. "Ancestry.com went public last year and its shares have doubled in value."

"JRI-Poland has been recognized by the medical and scientific communities for the potential benefit for Ashkenazi families trying to trace medical histories, particularly those at increased risk for hereditary conditions and diseases," Diamond added.

JRI-Poland is now creating a search tool for those who need answers to medical-related questions or require bone marrow or other transplants. It has received commendations from the Gift of Life Foundation and the National Marrow Donor Program in the United States.

Shul fails to get restraining order

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL —A Quebec Court judge has refused to issue a restraining order that would prevent an Outremont man from continuing to photograph activity outside a synagogue.

Michael Rosenberg, a leader of Congregation Gate David of Bobov, and his son, Martin, had sought an injunction against Pierre Lacerte, who for several years has been taking pictures and posting some of them on his blog.

Les Accommodements Outremont is Lacerte's chronicle of alleged violations of municipal rules by this and other chassidic communities in the borough.

The Rosenbergs testified that they felt harassed and feared for their family's safety. They also alleged Lacerte is motivated by antisemitism.

Judge Manon Ouimet decided March 21 that Lacerte poses no threat to their security, nor does the information that he posts on the Internet.

The quarrel between the two parties goes back to 2005. Lacerte, who lives across the street from the shul, located at 5363 Hutchison St., has complained that the congregation is routinely flouting construction and parking bylaws.

In her judgment, Ouimet did describe Lacerte as "an excessive, meticulous, and impassioned person."

Nevertheless, she said his blog is within his right to free expression and does not threaten, intimidate or harass the plaintiffs.

The dispute isn't over. The Rosenbergs are proceeding with a $375,000 civil lawsuit against Lacerte.

Scholarship named for retired police chief

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

A scholarship in multicultural studies at York University has been named in honour of Armand La Barge, the retired chief of York Regional Police.

The Armand and Denise La Barge Graduate Scholarship in Multiculturalism will support a graduate student whose work relates to multiculturalism, human rights, cultural diversity or racism.

Ron Smith, chair of the scholarship committee, called the scholarship a fitting legacy. "I'm not alone. Everyone whose life he touched has been supportive of this action."

Smith, a past president of Temple Har Zion, said the first time he saw La Barge was at an anti-racism rally about six years ago. "His total sincerity in his fight against racism touched me. I then started to learn more about what he stood for and how he walked the talk. He was always there for the community, in good times and bad."

At La Barge's retirement dinner, held this past December and attended by 850 people, Bernie Farber, CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, said La Barge considers everyone he served as friends and family.

"A few years ago, there was a serious antisemitic incident in Thornhill, where numerous homes in a predominantly Jewish area were spray painted with swastikas and Jew-hatred. Chief La Barge was first on the scene, [and] he attended at the homes of the victims, one in particular, a Holocaust survivor.

"He brought great comfort by simply being there and referring to the family as his good friends. One can understand how much comfort this brought to these elderly Holocaust survivors and the community in general," Farber said.

Farber thanked La Barge for the trail he has forged, "for your passion and your commitment to policing and to the community, and for the respect you have shown through words and deeds, to the people you serve and the people you lead."

Armand La Barge

La Barge, who grew up in southeastern Ontario, said in an e-mail that there was "absolutely no diversity within our community or school. I moved to York Region in 1973 when I joined the police force. However, even then, York Region didn't enjoy the rich diversity that it does today."

He noticed a change in the region in the 1980s, he said, and his interest in multiculturalism was sparked by courses he completed at Seneca College and York University.

"I completed my honours BA at York in the field of Canadian studies and was proudly the university's first graduate of the six course multiculturalism studies certificate program."

He said that as chief of police, he was able to put into practice what he learned at Seneca and York.

"I took it upon myself to learn more about and experience the different cultures and faiths that make up our region, and we set about to make York Regional Police more reflective of the multicultural community we serve.

"In the eight years that I was chief, our police diversity rate jumped from six per cent to almost 17 per cent, and we had officers that truly reflected our community in every rank up to and including superintendent."

Along with his wife, Denise, he said, he was welcomed with open arms into virtually every house of worship in York Region.

La Barge, who completed a master's degree in the field of Canadian and native studies and is pursuing doctoral studies in the field, said he is "passionate about multiculturalism. Simply put, we are a stronger, healthier, more resilient and more dynamic nation because of it.

"I was surprised and excited when I heard about the scholarship in our name. I am hopeful that [future] graduate students will come to understand how important multiculturalism is to the future of our nation."

York, he said, is one of Canada's largest and most diverse universities. "I can't think of a better university for young people to learn about the importance of respecting each other's faiths and cultures."

Montreal Jews strongly Israel-oriented: survey

Almost half listed services as top priority for funding

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Seventy-five per cent of Montreal Jews have visited Israel, the highest of any Jewish community in North America, according to an extensive survey conducted by Federation CJA.

That proportion is slightly higher than that of the Toronto Jewish community and well above that for the United States, where the average is about 30 to 40 per cent.

Sixteen per cent said visiting Israel had "the most impact on their life as a Jew," which, the federation feels, is significant given such other possible prime factors as family or education. That figure rose to about 28 per cent among those between 18 and 24 years of age.

Eighty-two per cent of the more than 2,200 respondents agreed that Israel needs the financial support of Canadians, and almost half listed services in Israel as the top priority for funding.

Only seven per cent said that it would make no difference to them if Israel ceased to exist.

The 79-question survey was conducted last year for the federation by Léger Marketing and is described as the largest attitudinal survey conducted by any federation in Canada. The sample is a representative one, with respondents chosen to accurately reflect such variables as Ashkenazi/Sephardi, age distribution, education, native/foreign-born, and where they lived.

The full results were to be made public this week.

There are not a lot of surprises. Half described themselves as Orthodox or traditional, and the great majority feel accepted by the community and/or have a strong sense of their Jewish identity. More than 80 per cent have had some form of Jewish education, and in excess of half had volunteered for a Jewish organization over the past year.

The interesting finding for the federation is the one-quarter who call themselves secular or "just Jewish." It is this group, those who do not define themselves by the traditional labels, that the federation believes is growing and that it has to do more to reach, said president Jack Hasen.

The survey is part of Imagine 2020, a "strategic revisioning" project involving sounding out the community in order to set the federation's direction and priorities. Launched in the fall of 2009, the goal was to get as many Montreal Jews as possible thinking about what they would like the community to look like a decade down the road.

Another 400 or 500 people offered their views through informal consultation, such as focus groups and a blog.

The conclusion that the federation is drawing from the data is that an increasing number of people expressing a Jewish identity and interest in the community or culture do not have a religious affiliation or feel connected to any community organization, not just the federation.

They are most likely to be the intermarried, secular, with little Jewish education or not living in the main areas of Jewish population.

There appears to be solid support for the federation paying more attention to those outside the traditional sphere. For example, 40 per cent said outreach to the intermarried, for example, should be a priority.

Overall, 40 per cent consider Jewish community life to be too expensive and a quarter find Jewish organizations old-fashioned. Eighteen per cent found them "too Jewish."

One question that wasn't asked was whether the respondents plan to stay in Quebec. That's because the federation feels the community's numbers have stabilized in recent years, said Andrew Myers, of the community planning department, which oversaw the survey.

Hasen said the federation must change, and it must listen more to people and provide the types of programming and services that people want.

"We recognize there are lots of ways of living a Jewish life in Montreal."

The federation is heartened that, by and large, the community thinks it is doing a good job and is needed. "Even if every program we had was endowed and we didn't have to raise funds, people still see us as having a pivotal role in the community, and able to take a global view," Myers said.

Hasen notes that the federation is already moving with the times. "I doubt you would have seen us, even five years ago, funding an environmental project or a chavurah in Mile End."

Jews targeted in York Region

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Hate crimes targeting the Jewish community in York Region more than doubled in 2010 over 2009, York Regional Police reported last week.

With a total of 41 incidents reported, Jews were the single most victimized group, making up 39 per cent of the 104 crimes tallied by police, police data indicate. Blacks were the next most targeted group, with 17 incidents reported, down from 20 the year before. Catholics were the victims in two incidents and Muslims in three.

The findings were part of a report on overall crime statistics, which dropped by 1.1 per cent in 2010.

Referring to hate crime occurrences, Det. Brett Kemp, head of York Regional Police's hate crimes unit, said, "The vast majority of the cases we have seen were mischief-related property crimes."

After conducting a preliminary examination of the crime data, Kemp said "I've been unable to find any violent offences that targeted the Jewish community."

The 2010 findings of crimes against Jews were the highest in five years. In 2007, 24 incidents were reported to police; in 2008 that rose to 27 and in 2009 the number dropped to 19, before jumping again last year.

Kemp believes the spike in incidents in 2010 corresponded to world events and other high profile developments.

Len Rudner

"There were recurring events like Israeli Apartheid Week, the Gaza aid ship incident and then, surprisingly, the municipal election caused some occurrences," he said.

Kemp said swastikas were employed against candidates during the campaign and "the swastika is a world known symbol of hate." Though the perpetrators' motives were unknown, police assumed an anti-Jewish intent, he said.

Len Rudner, Ontario regional director of Canadian Jewish Congress, cautioned the community to "not necessarily set its heartbeat by any set of statistics....The numbers should not be seen as a determination of how safe it is to be Jewish in York Region. We keep statistics of hate crimes but not of the good acts and the positive things that happen between communities.

"Are there people with a dislike of Jews in Canada? Yes there are," he said. "There have always been.

"Are there more than before? The statistics don't tell us that, only that in a particular year there were more events reported, collected and categorized by police."

Kemp said the occurrences "were widespread across the region" and while most perpetrators were not apprehended, "I can't say there was any pattern...Since the vast majority of cases were mischief-related, it's not unfair to say it's youth doing it, who don't understand the impact of hate messages."

Police try to deter criminal incidents during periods of tension by patrolling around Jewish institutions and making their presence known, Kemp added.

Rudner noted that the federal government had made permanent the Security Infrastructure Program, which enhances the security infrastructure of communities targeted by hate-motivated crime.

"But we should not allow our comfort in being citizens of Canada and residents of York Region to be affected by a single number," he said.

The NCC is the Crown corporation that acts as the steward of federal lands and buildings in the National Capital Region.

The monument committee has three years to raise money and decide on the specifics of the monument.

Any Canadian interested in joining the committee will be allowed to apply, Grossman said.

She added that applicants will be reviewed and chosen by the minister responsible for the NCC – currently the minister of transport, infrastructure and communities.

Congress CEO Bernie Farber said he was gratified by the Senate's support of the bill and thanked all parliamentarians for their support of the legislation.

"We've lost earlier versions of this bill under similar circumstances, and it would have been heart-breaking to see this one die on the order paper as well," he said.

Congress, which has helped Grossman and Uppal in an advisory capacity on the legislation, will continue to assist in the implementation phase of the bill, Farber said.

Farber said that he hoped other community institutions such as the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, B'nai Brith Canada and local federations will "come on board" to work on the project as well.

Farber said that while the committee will ultimately make the final decision on the design of the monument, Congress has the experience and the "template" to search for designers, since it recently helped create a monument in memory of the St. Louis.

That monument, the Wheel of Conscience, was created for the Canadian Jewish community by renowned architect and artist Daniel Libeskind and is at the Canadian Museum of Immigration at Pier 21 in Halifax.

In comments to the Senate, Yaron Ashkenazi, executive director of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, said he believed the National Holocaust Monument will be "a symbol of pride to all Canadians" and a way to honour many, including survivors of the Shoah, those who perished and the Canadian armed forces that helped end the World War II and "implement justice."

Farber said he knows of many Holocaust survivors who are "really anxious" to see the monument come to "final fruition.

"Time is our enemy here. We want to make sure that while there are survivors among us, we want to [erect] a monument in the nation's capital."

While Bill C-442 commits the government to donate the land for the monument, it does not oblige it to help fund it, a situation that Joe Volpe, the Liberal MP for Toronto's Eglinton-Lawrence, said was unacceptable.

Volpe had called on the Conservative government to fully fund the monument as a "national" symbol and not treat the Jewish community as "an ATM."

Asked if a new Liberal government would fund the monument, if elected, Volpe said he'd already spoken with Liberal leader Michael Ignatieff about the issue and that Ignatieff "agreed" that it should be funded by government.

If elected, Volpe said, "Michael Ignatieff and the Liberal party will put that thing up" as soon as possible.

"If it takes 48 hours to get the paperwork in order, then that's how long it will be before it gets [funded] and put up" under a Liberal government, he said.

The Conservatives left the door open to fund the monument late last year when a spokesperson for Transport Minister Chuck Strahl told The CJN that the government "would consider providing additional funding, if necessary, to realize the establishment of a national Holocaust monument."

Last year, the government gave Congress $500,000 to fund the Libeskind-designed sculpture memorializing Canada's 1939 refusal of entry to the St. Louis. That funding came from Citizenship and Immigration Canada's Community Historical Recognition Program.

Gaza presents Netanyahu with tough test

Aluf Benn
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The Grad missiles fired from Gaza at Be'er Sheva and Ashdod last week present Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu with the toughest test of his term so far. The prime minister said he would be "strong in the face of Hamas." Now, the time has come to make good.

Until the current crisis, Netanyahu and his supporters have been able to say we have no terror. Netanyahu explained, and perhaps even believed, that the enemy is afraid of his "zero tolerance policy" against terror; that his very presence in government, with his record as an expert in the war on terror, had deterred Hamas, Islamic Jihad and the Al Aqsa Brigades from renewing their armed struggle against Israel.

But the murderers of the Fogel family in Itamar, who have yet to be apprehended, probably did not consider the identity of Israel's prime minister before they embarked on their nighttime slaughter. The launchers of the rockets and mortars are also not impressed by him. It seems that the perpetrators of last Wednesday's bombing in Jerusalem were more interested in security and escape routes than in who was sitting in the nearby Prime Minister's Office.

Netanyahu's response to the murders in Itamar, accusing the Palestinian Authority of incitement and speaking of building hundreds of apartments in settlements, was intended to calm his power base on the right and satisfy the settlers so they would not take revenge. But when it comes to Gaza, Netanyahu is doing the same thing his predecessors did.

However, the diplomatic environment is more complicated than on the eve of Operation Cast Lead in 2008-9.

U.S. President Barack Obama will not be enthusiastic over an Israeli operation that results in numerous casualties, destruction and a besieged Gaza. Egypt is in a period of political transformation and governments of Arab countries are in danger of collapse, which would make it difficult for them to support a major Israeli campaign against Hamas.

In addition the "moral" line set by the war in Libya is clear.

Attacks from the air are allowed, but no boots on the ground, and no occupation. Netanyahu will certainly try not to exceed this pattern in dealing with Gaza.

The Grad missiles that fell in Ashdod and Be'er Sheva may serve Netanyahu's efforts to stop international recognition of a Palestinian state. For they are the proof that any area Israel gives up in the West Bank merely becomes "a base for the launching of missiles against Tel Aviv and Jerusalem."

The Israel Defence Forces last Sunday deployed the first battery of the Iron Dome anti-missile and rocket defence system near Be'er Sheva. [Israel Sun photo]

Western leaders will find this argument difficult to oppose and will have to pay at least lip service to Israel's security demands in the West Bank.

The political implications of escalation are also complex.

Terror strengthens the right and hurts the left. But the right is split now between Netanyahu and Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman. Israeli hesitation in the face of continued fire from Gaza will strengthen Lieberman. An effective response against Hamas will help Netanyahu but only if it is short and surprising, the right mixture of military action and diplomacy.

Netanyahu's test will be to find this middle way.

Anarchy in Gaza: IDF

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM—The Israel Air Force killed two Palestinians and wounded three more in an attack on the northern Gaza Strip on Sunday, according to Palestinian media reports.

The five Palestinians were clustered just east of the Jabalya refugee camp at the time of the attack, said the reports. The Islamic Jihad militant group claimed the casualties as its members.

A spokeswoman for the Israel Defence Forces confirmed that an Israeli aircraft fired a missile at a group of militants in the enclave but gave no further details. According to Israel Radio and witnesses, they had been trying to launch a projectile at Israel.

In public remarks to his cabinet on Sunday, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said Israel has "no desire to escalate the situation," noting the frontier had been relatively quiet since the end of the December 2008-January 2009 Gaza war.

But he said: "We will not hesitate to use the might of the Israel Defence Forces against those who attack our citizens."

The strike came a day after Gaza groups signalled that they would halt rocket fire at Israel if the IDF stopped carrying out targeted attacks as well. The surge in cross-border violence recently has prompted fears of a possible escalation into war.

Hamas spokesman Ismail Rudwan said Saturday that militant leaders were "committed as long as the occupation [Israel] was committed" to abide by an earlier de facto truce. His comments followed a round of talks in Gaza, after of a weeklong swell in attacks.

GOC Southern Command Maj.-Gen. Tal Russo on Saturday described the situation in the Gaza Strip as "anarchic," as the IDF prepared to deploy the first of the two Iron Dome missile defence systems in the south on Monday morning.

The army has described the step as an "operational experiment," saying the deployment of the Iron Dome and beginning its actual use will take some time. The Israel Air Force stressed that even the first two batteries will not be enough, and that at least three more will be needed to provide ample defence from Gaza rocket attacks.

Three rockets were fired from the Strip into southern Israel at the end of last week. No casualties were reported in any of the incidents.

On a visit to the south, Russo said: "There's anarchy on the other side right now. It will be difficult for Hamas to roll things back. I hope they'll come to their senses."

He added that the anarchy in Gaza has spread both within Hamas and the smaller armed factions, referring to internal disagreements within Hamas on the question of renewing rocket fire on Israel or forcing other organizations to uphold the ceasefire.

Ismail Haniyeh, the head of the Hamas political wing in Gaza and the Palestinian prime minister, is pushing for a return to the relative quiet in the south, but senior officials in the Islamist organization, including some in the armed wing, disagree.

It seems Hamas is also finding it difficult to enforce its authority upon smaller factions, with small groups now carrying out their own policies. The fact many more Grad rockets were smuggled into Gaza in recent weeks and distributed between the factions also makes the situation more difficult to control.

The deterrence achieved after Operation Cast Lead two years ago is eroding, Russo said Saturday. Both the government and the IDF believe it will be difficult to retain any calm for long and that another escalation may occur in the near future.

In related developments, U.S. Defence Secretary Robert Gates last Friday made the first trip by a U.S. defence chief to the West Bank city of Ramallah, meeting with Palestinian Prime Minister Salam Fayyad and continuing to push for peace despite the recent spate of rocket and mortar attacks.

Gates, who also met with Netanyahu on Friday, visited Fayyad in Ramallah to speak about a return to peace negotiations with Israel.

Gates said he looked forward to talking about progress toward a two-state solution. Fayyad said this is a time of great challenges throughout the region, and he was looking forward to a redoubling of the peace effort.

Direct peace talks that began in Washington in September 2010 froze within weeks.

Fayyad's party, Fatah, which is led by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, is a rival of Hamas and controls the West Bank. Hamas has ruled Gaza since seizing power in a five-day civil war against Fatah in 2007. As a wave of pro-democracy unrest reverberates through the region, both sides have faced growing calls to reconcile.

Israel should end the occupation of the West Bank by September, Fayyad told Gates.

Fayyad stressed to Gates the importance of meeting the September deadline set in what he called the "Ending the Occupation, Establishing the State" program, in a statement issued by PA Prime Minister's Office said.

According to this two-year program, the Palestinians would have completed building their state institutions and enforced security on the ground by the end of August 2011, to allow them to establish their independent state.

Poll results opposing Shoah gallery questioned

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Critics of the Canadian Museum for Human Rights, currently under construction in Winnipeg, are using the results of a what some say is a questionable poll to bolster their argument that the facility shouldn't contain one area dedicated only to the Holocaust.

The survey, by Nanos Research, was commissioned by the Canadians for Genocide Education and Ukrainian Canadian Civil Liberties Association (UCCLA). The latter organization has been lobbying hard to have the Holodomor – Josef Stalin's mass murder by starvation of Ukrainians farmers who refused to go along with collectivization efforts in the 1930s – get equal billing with the Holocaust.

The poll of 1,216 Canadians asked respondents if they would want one gallery for all genocides or one permanent gallery for a particular genocide while others are grouped together in a separate exhibit. Sixty per cent of respondents favoured the first option, 24 per cent the second and 15 per cent weren't sure.

"Preferential, prominent and permanent recognition for one or two groups in a national museum funded from the public purse is unacceptable to Canadians," UCCLA chairman R.W. Zakaluzny said in a statement. "It's time for the [museum's] board of trustees to take note – the people of Canada don't want their tax dollars funding partiality."

Canadians for Genocide Education describes itself on its website as "a multi-cultural coalition of almost 50 community organizations committed to equity and inclusivity in education on and commemoration of genocide. We believe that any other approach promotes racism and not human rights. Our focus areas are school curriculum and government funded projects relating to genocide and human rights. CGE also sponsors an annual speaker series."

The organization's executive director, James Kafieh, is a Palestinian Canadian and a past president of the Canadian Arab Federation.

An editorial in the March 24 edition of the Winnipeg Free Press criticized the poll's methodology, noting that the question about the exhibits was buried in a series of unrelated polling questions on an omnibus poll. No background or context was provided, and there was no mention of the Holocaust.

"It is not even clear that the respondents had heard of the Human Rights Museum or understood its mission," the editorial said. "The question was slanted to guarantee a negative response – who wouldn't support equality for all? – and it does not represent reliable or responsible research."

The editorial further argues that the Holocaust stands out because it was global in reach – the Nazis murdered Jews in most of the 30 countries they occupied and antisemitism was prevalent worldwide. Stalin's goal was not the extermination of all Ukrainians, only those who opposed his policies.

Angela Cassie, the museum's director of communications, questioned the small size of the poll. "You need to be careful in extrapolating results for all Canadians from a poll that is that small," she said. "We have met with thousands of Canadians, and we have had more than 6,000 donors. They understand the concept behind the museum.

She added that placing the Holodomor was taken into consideration during the planning process. The museum's configuration, she added, will include two permanent galleries – for the Holocaust and Canada's Aboriginal Peoples – and 10 other permanent zones. The Holodomor will have a permanent display in the "Mass Atrocity" zone, immediately adjacent to the Holocaust zone.

"This area will feature detailed information on the Holodomor and many other mass atrocities that have taken place worldwide, and will provide educational opportunities for visitors to learn more about these events. It is not to memorialize atrocities. Rather, we are focusing on the human rights lessons that can be learned from events such as the Holocaust," Cassie said.

"The goal of the museum is to educate people to respect human rights and dignity and take action to prevent abuses of human rights."

The Free Press editorial concluded by saying the "suffering of individual Jews was no greater than the pain of Ukrainians or others who have been targets of hatred, but the story of how they lost their rights, and how their neighbours – ordinary people – turned against them, is a unique cautionary tale about the fragility of democracy and human rights.

"Why does the Holocaust get a place in the front seat?" the editorial asked. "Only the uninformed ask questions like that."

Deal allows religious items in taxis

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Arieh Perecowicz couldn't have been happier.

It's been almost five years since he was issued the first in a slew of tickets for having prohibited items in his taxi – including Jewish religious objects – based on a taxi code bylaw. But an out-of-court settlement hammered out between his lawyers and the city, announced last Thursday, made it clear that he could keep his mezuzah.

And so could all other cabbies with religious items.

"It's a huge victory for me," said Perecowicz, 66, who sat on the news of the impending deal for about a week. "It was a long and difficult wait."

The directive, issued by the head of the Montreal Taxi Bureau, prohibits city taxi inspectors from ticketing cabbies who display religious objects in their taxis, as long as they don't use them to proselytize and they don't constitute a risk to passenger safety.

In Perecowicz's case, they included two mezuzot and a photograph of the Lubavitcher rebbe.

Even if inspectors perceive a physical risk, they must have citations approved by a superior.

"That is a huge deal," Perecowicz said. "Before, they had complete discretion."

The deal was negotiated between the city and Mark Phillips, Perecowicz's lawyer with the firm Borden Ladner Gervais, which agreed to take on the case pro bono in a Charter appeal in Quebec Superior Court.

As part of the settlement, Perecowicz is dropping the appeal of his Feb. 17 conviction in Montreal Municipal Court, which means he still must pay more than $1,000 in fines, but four outstanding tickets are cancelled.

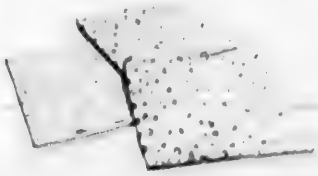
Perecowicz said he decided to accept paying the fines because even though Judge Dominique Joly ruled that he didn't "discharge his burden of proof" in his freedom of religion and expression defence, "she never actually addressed whether religious items are allowed or not allowed in taxis."

Abby Shawn, a lawyer and chair of Quebec Jewish Congress' human rights committee who closely followed the case along with QJC community relations director Enza Martuccelli, was "very pleased" with the deal.

"It's interesting because it's taking place against the backdrop of reasonable accommodation that's being debated in Quebec," she said.

"This is a way of saying that having religious symbols is a 'reasonable accommodation.' It gives life to the debate and answers we haven't had before."

The Quebec Human Rights Commission, where Perecowicz has lodged a separate religious freedom complaint seeking $25,000, is also expected to hand down a decision soon.



Passover Food Ideas

Time for family and friends

Just as we see the first hint of spring, we begin to see the first hints of Passover. Supermarkets start stocking their shelves, recipes appear in newspapers and magazines, and many of us begin thinking about food – what we're going to buy and what we're going to cook.

We also start reminiscing about the Passovers of our youth. Many of us remember the seders with our entire extended family. Our grandfather held fort at the head of the long table, trying to keep all the youngsters focused on the Passover story.

More often than not, we ate the same foods year after year, and erev Pesach we could already taste the chicken soup, fluffy matzah balls, carrot tzimmes and any other delicacies our mothers and grandmothers were known for.

Today, although menus may be complicated by those who are vegetarian, have allergies, are on a strict weight-loss program or are just plain fussy, we still look forward to gathering our family and friends and celebrating the holiday.

Many of us follow, with some modifications, the menus of our childhood, while others pore over cookbooks seeking something unique and fresh for their seder table.

In our upcoming Passover food supplements, we've tried to include recipes for everyone – those who are invited out and need mid-week ideas, those who want something brand-new to grace their seder table or those who are looking to tweak an old favourite.

Whether you're making your first seder or looking to pass the baton to a younger generation, you're sure to find something that will spark your interest.

The ingredients in all our recipes are acceptable for Passover use, and can be purchased kosher for Passover in most large Jewish communities.

From all of us at The CJN, enjoy your Passover meals, and we wish you a Chag Kasher v'Samayach.

Eliminate the 'Yuck!' factor

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

Every week before Passover begins the same way for me – in between all the cleaning and shopping, I'm planning meals that will make dinnertime different and exciting, keep hunger at bay all day long and keep the fridge stockpiled with food. Good food, I mean. The kind that doesn't make my children say, "Yuck! I'm not eating that!" and turn to yet another piece of bland matzah instead.

If this is happening in my house, I'm pretty sure the same scenario is playing out in Jewish kitchens all over North America. Which is why, every year, my plans and resolutions get tossed out by Day 2 or 3 of Passover, in favour of regular dishes that don't contain anything contraband to Passover, or variations on those dishes.

Like Passover buns. They're filling, they look more or less like regular dinner rolls and they're great for breakfast, lunch or dinner. With some 40 years in her Cape Town kitchen, my mother-in-law, Maureen Aginsky, has a no-fail recipe for Passover buns that generate excitement and disappear almost before they've had time to cool. I can't seem to make them fast enough.

One thing I miss most about Passover is my regular morning cereal, which is why Norene Gilletz's recipe for Passover granola has been a saviour the past two years. It's way superior to the ridiculously expensive and tasteless Toasty O's available at the grocery store. And while it's not a low-fat food, it fills that hunger hole in your stomach with heart-healthy food.

Once you've got breakfast covered, lunch is the next challenge. The buns are a good staple to have on hand, but it makes sense to keep a few containers of tuna salad and egg salad in the fridge. My go-to items for Passover lunches are thick vegetable soups coupled with filling greens like coleslaw and garden salad. Add some matzah and fruit and you can make it to dinnertime. Almost.

HEALTHY NEVER TASTED SO GOOD

Savour the mid-week meals

I'm not a fan of fried foods, but I make a few exceptions for items that aren't deep-fried, making sure I drain them well on napkins and newspaper before they come anywhere near my mouth. My late mother's salmon balls are one of those exceptions. Popular during the year and perfect for Passover, they are tasty, nutritious and one of those meals you can make in a half-hour of efficiently used kitchen time. Served with soup, salad and quinoa, they constitute a complete meal.

Another tried-and-trusted dinner favourite comes from a second page in Maureen Aginsky's cooking files – her version of "Kentucky Fried" for Passover. Provided the chicken is not frozen, this is an easy dish that always garners approval at the dinner table. Served with baked potatoes and salad, it makes great leftovers, too. And judging by hunger levels at my house on Passover, leftovers are never left over for very long.

PASSOVER ROLLS

2 cups matzah meal
2 tsp. sugar
1 tsp. salt
1 cup water
1/2 cup oil
4 eggs

Mix dry ingredients together, followed by water and oil. Mix well, and then add eggs, one at a time.

Allow the mixture to rise for one hour, then shape into rolls and bake at 375 for 40-60 minutes.

PASSOVER GRANOLA

3 tbsp. vegetable oil
1/2 cup honey
3 cups matzah farfel
1/2 cup chopped almonds
1/2 cup chopped walnuts or pecans
1/2 cup coconut, unsweetened
1 tsp. ground cinnamon
1/2 cup raisins or dried cranberries
1/2 cup chocolate chips

Preheat oven to 350 and line a large baking sheet with parchment paper.

In a large bowl, combine oil and honey. Then add farfel, nuts, coconut and cinnamon, mixing well. Spread on the baking sheet and bake 30 minutes, or until the mixture is toasted, stirring every 10 minutes. Remove from oven, transfer to a bowl and allow to cool, stirring to break up clumps. Now stir in raisins and chocolate chips. Add milk, yogurt and/or fruit for a complete meal.

PASSOVER SALMON BALLS

1 large onion, chopped and fried
1 red or yellow pepper, chopped
2-4 cans salmon, deboned
1 medium potato, boiled and mashed
1 egg
2/3 thirds cup matzah meal salt and pepper oil for frying

Mix together salmon, mashed potato, egg, onion, red or yellow pepper, salt and pepper.

With moist hands, form the mixture into fist-size balls and roll the balls in matzah meal.

Heat oil on medium heat and fry lightly, turning to ensure that the balls get fried on all sides.

Once the balls are fried, drain them on a dish layered with newspaper and a napkin to remove excess oil.

PASSOVER KENTUCKY-STYLE NO-FRY CHICKEN

1 whole chicken, in pieces
1 egg
lemon juice oil
matzah meal

Clean and portion the chicken. In one dish, beat the egg and add a quarter cup of oil, the juice of half a lemon and chopped parsley. In another dish, pour matzah meal for the second step in the recipe.

Dip chicken segments first into egg mixture and then into matzah meal. Then transfer chicken to a large, oven-proof bowl or pan lined with tin foil (shiny side up). Ensure the chicken segments are not on top of each other. Drizzle oil between the segments. Cover the dish well with tin foil, tucking in the sides to seal it. Bake in a 400-degree oven until fully cooked, removing the tin foil cover for the last five minutes.

Veggie side dishes complement the main course

Daphna Rabinovitch
Special to The CJN

During the Passover seder meal, all eyes and kudos tend to be rightfully heaped on the main course and the effort the host or hostess has gone to in making it delicious as well as beautiful. But where would the big bird or roast or brisket be without its supporting cast. It takes an entire crew to make a memorable repast. With that in mind, I've assembled four wonderful vegetable side dishes that are sure to please, without upstaging the star in the least. (OK, maybe a little bit!)

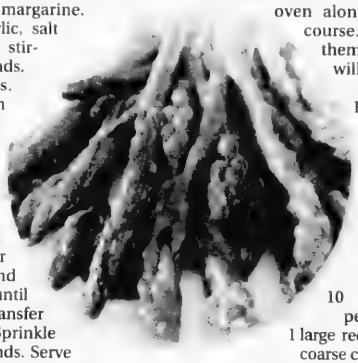
SAUTEED ASPARAGUS WITH CRANBERRIES AND ALMONDS

A delightfully different way to serve asparagus. The cranberries serve as a tangy, sweet foil to the earthiness of the sage and the toasted almonds. Try to buy asparagus that are more or less uniform in size so that they cook in the same amount of time.

2/3 cup dried cranberries
1 cup fresh orange juice
2 tbsp. olive oil
2 tbsp. unsalted butter or margarine
2 tsp. crumbled dried sage (not ground)
2 cloves garlic, minced
1/2 tsp.salt
1/4 tsp. pepper
2 lb. asparagus, trimmed
1/2 cup toasted sliced almonds

Stir together cranberries and orange juice. Let stand for 30 minutes. Reserving juice, drain cranberries.

Meanwhile in large heavy-bottomed skillet set over medium heat, heat together oil and margarine. Add the sage, garlic, salt and pepper; cook, stirring, for 30 seconds. Add asparagus. Cook, shaking pan often, for 5 minutes. Stir in 3/4 cup of the reserved orange juice. Cover and cook for 2 to 3 minutes or until asparagus are tender crisp. Stir in cranberries and cook for 1 minute until sauce is syrupy. Transfer to serving dish. Sprinkle with toasted almonds. Serve warm. Makes 6 to 8 servings.



ROASTED CAULIFLOWER WITH ONIONS, FENNEL AND RED PEPPER

Roasting vegetables is the easiest thing in the world and reaps such magical rewards. As the vegetables roast, all their natural sugars caramelize, leaving the diner golden-edged vegetables kissed by natural sweetness. This is especially true with the fennel, onion and red pepper in this particular recipe. Don't be afraid to make this dish ahead. You can roast the vegetables the day before and reheat them in a warm oven alongside your main course. Don't microwave them, however, or they will become mushy.

1 head cauliflower, cut into 1-in. florets
2 onions, cut into wedges
2 fennel bulbs, cut into thin wedges with core still attached
10 garlic cloves, peeled
1 large red pepper, cut into coarse chunks
1 tsp. each dried oregano and salt
1/2 tsp. pepper
1/3 cup extra virgin olive oil

Preheat oven to 425. In large bowl, toss together cauliflower, onions, fennel and red pepper, oregano, salt and pepper. Pour in olive oil, tossing until well-coated. Spread on foil-lined baking sheet, arranging in single layer. Roast in centre of oven for 45 to 55 minutes, stirring once, until vegetables are soft and tender and golden brown. Makes 6 to 8 servings.

PAN SEARED ARTICHOKES WITH VINEGAR AND FRESH THYME

This dish is the perfect foil to the richness of a meat-based main course. It's chipper and lively and acts as a wonderful harbinger of the season just peeking around the corner.

1/4 cup extra virgin olive oil
12 artichoke hearts, fresh or frozen
3 cloves garlic, minced
1 tsp. lemon rind
3 tbsp. sherry or balsamic vinegar
1/2 tsp. each salt and pepper
1 tsp. chopped fresh thyme

Heat olive oil in a heavy-bottomed straight-sided skillet over medium heat. Add garlic; cook, stirring, for 1 minute. Add artichoke hearts, concave side down. Cook for 5 minutes, or until nicely browned. Turn hearts over; sprinkle with lemon zest. Reduce heat to low and pour in vinegar and 1/2 cup water. Cook, covered, for about 5 minutes or until liquid has almost evaporated and hearts are tender. Stir in thyme. Serve warm. Makes 6 to 8 servings.

Seder led to rebirth of community

Beverly Levitt
Special to The CJN

At sundown on Erev Pesach, Jews will gather around the Passover table to celebrate a 3,000-year-old miracle.

In the harrowing chase scene from the film The Ten Commandments, Egyptian soldiers were chasing the escaped Jewish slaves through the desert. When they came to the Red Sea, Moses raised his staff, and the Red Sea parted, just long enough for the Jews to cross. The miracle was reinforced when the blood-thirsty soldiers were drowned as the raging waters resumed their roar.

Close, but not exactly how it happened in the Bible, says Rabbi David Baron of Temple Shalom for the Arts in Los Angeles.

"In the Torah, God didn't just give Moses the power to part the sea and save his people. He told his disciple to have the Israelites go forward – the first step of the faithful into the sea would save them," he clarified.

"It's the power of taking a leap of faith to stand up against a tyrant and declare your freedom," says the rabbi, who wrote Moses on Management (Simon & Schuster, 1999). "It was the belief of the people, not divine intervention alone, that freed the Jews from slavery and led them through the dry seabed to emerge free men."

California entrepreneur Severyn Ashkenazy understands such a leap of faith. A dozen years ago, Ashkenazy went to Warsaw, Poland, with a small group of American and Polish Jews – all of whom had fled their native land during the Holocaust – and hosted the first Passover seder in that city since 1945.

That Passover was the start of a rebirth of the Jewish community in Poland.

But Ashkenazy, whose brainchild the Warsaw celebration was, had a formidable time pulling it together. In fact, it was several years in the making.

There were 450 thriving synagogues and some three million Jews in the country-of-the-shifting-borders before World War II, but when the vibrant 66-year-old survivor went back to Poland in 1994 for the first time since he was a child, he found only a handful of haredi Jews.

It was springtime, Passover was coming, and the city was ablaze with lilacs and cherry blossoms. Not only couldn't he find a place to celebrate the holiday, Ashkenazy encountered a beleaguered, practically non-existent Jewish population. Even those who knew of their Jewish heritage denied their faith. Some had converted to Catholicism, others had no religion at all. They wanted nothing to do with something that had caused so much grief.

During the Holocaust, 90 per cent of the Jews in Poland were killed.

Ashkenazy thought that if there was a supportive, progressive Jewish community in Warsaw, these "quiet Jews" could reclaim their identity and make peace with their past. And so Beit Warshawa, the congregation of Warsaw, was born.

Ashkenazy's first order of business: to host a Passover seder. "It wasn't easy convincing anybody to attend," says Ashkenazy, comfortably seated in his art-filled home in Beverly Hills. "But we are a people who are constantly saved by miracles, so our group persevered.

"The first seder, which was held in a hotel, in a room near the garden," he says, "had just 20 people – eight Jews and a smattering of Poles. We were just happy to have anybody participate.

"We ate delicious dishes I remember my mother making – kugels, kreplach, tzimmes, gefilte fish, chicken soup with kneidlach, brisket, macaroons and compotes – beloved Passover recipes that had their origins in Poland. They were so comforting. It reminded me of a more innocent time," he says.

"We read from the Haggadah, we sang, we experienced a true feeling of camaraderie. But most importantly, we tried to create a place for people to feel safe being Jewish," Ashkenazy says. "Now we celebrate all the Jewish holidays, and more and more people just appear. We're never sure of the numbers, but they keep increasing."

Now, in its 12th year, and with the first full-time rabbi, Burt Schuman, arriving soon from Altoona, Pa., the congregation boasts more than 1,500 people, all of whom will be in attendance this Passover. And there are the beginnings of congregations in Krakow and Lublin.

"The services are primarily in Polish, the Hebrew text transliterated into English and Polish so everyone can understand. Various rabbis from the United States and Israel come to Warsaw to lead the service, always making sure that it's very personal, there's lots of story telling and everyone, especially the children, feel included. It's as much about feeling comfortable and making it pleasant, so they'll want to return.

"Once we feel an emotional tie to the holiday, the learning begins," he says with a smile.

The PICKLE BARREL SINCE 1971

Recipes from generations past

ASHKENAZI APPLE-NUT CHAROSET

4 apples (about 2 lb.), peeled and coarsely chopped
2/3 cup chopped almonds or walnuts
3 tbsp. sugar or more to taste
1/2 tsp. cinnamon
grated rind of 1 lemon
4 tbsp. sweet kosher red wine

Combine all ingredients, mixing together thoroughly. Add a little more wine as needed. In a food processor, combine ingredients; process until you reach the desired consistency. Nathan likes her charoset in large pieces, with a crunchy texture, but her husband's Polish family prefers theirs ground to a paste. Chill. Makes about 3 cups.

ROAST CHICKEN

Nathan's grandmother, Martha Kops Gluck, made this traditional chicken dish every Friday night for Shabbat. Nathan suggested it for this Passover menu because it is the perfect foil for the sweet tzimmes and beet eingemachts (preserves) and matzah stuffing. Because many Polish Jews were poor, the mama pulled out all the stops during Passover and served two entrées instead of one. So families had their choice – chicken or brisket. Most of the guests chose both.

2-3 1/2 lb. broiler chickens, quartered salt to taste
pepper to taste seasoning salt to taste
paprika to taste
2 large cloves garlic, peeled and crushed
24 pearl onions, left whole with skin intact
24 small white potatoes, left whole with skin intact
1/2 cup water
1/2 cup white Passover wine vegetable oil as needed

Preheat oven to 350. Season chicken with salt, pepper, seasoning salt, paprika and garlic. Lay chicken, skin side up, in a roasting pan. Douse onions and potatoes with oil and seasonings; place in pan with chicken. Roast 20 minutes. Add a little water if pan becomes dry. Turn chicken over and roast 20 minutes more. Add wine to pan drippings and baste chicken periodically. Turn chicken over once more and roast 20 minutes with skin side up. If you like the skin crisp, place chicken under broiler before serving. Serves 6 to 8.

MATZAH STUFFING

2 matzot, broken into small pieces
1 large onion, grated, then drained
2 stalks celery, finely diced
4 mushrooms, quartered
2 tbsp. chicken fat or pareve margarine
3 tbsp. matzah meal
1 tbsp. chopped parsley kosher salt and pepper to taste
paprika to taste

Preheat oven to 350. Soak matzah in hot water for 10 minutes, being careful not to let it get soggy. Drain thoroughly and squeeze out excess liquid. Combine onion, celery and mushrooms with matzah. Sauté mixture in chicken fat or margarine, until golden. Add matzah meal, parsley, salt, pepper and paprika. Place in greased baking dish. If desired, dot with chicken fat or margarine. Bake for 20 minutes or until golden and slightly crisp on top. Makes 4 cups.

Coconut, almond, chocolate and more

Sybil Kaplan
Special to The CJN

Sugar free. Banana. Chocolate chip. The varieties are endless for this little sweet whose Italian (or perhaps French) origins relate to the fine paste that is its basic ingredient – almond paste – as well as ground almonds, sugar and egg whites.

I'm referring to macaroons, which are associated with Passover. The word macaroon comes from the French macaron, which, in turn, came from the Italian word maccherone, a tubular pasta that was the same colour as the almond paste in macaroons.

Barbara Revsine writes in "Macaroon Migrations" (Chicago Tribune, April 16, 2008) that its origins go back to an eighth-century French monastery. Others say it was probably Italian Jews who adapted the cookie for Passover, based on one developed by Italian monks.

My research tells me that French macaroons are dense, chewy and flat. Parisian ones are light and they sandwich a creamy filling. American macaroons use coconut, not almond paste; and Italian ones, called amaretti and sometimes flavoured with bitter almonds, are crispy on the outside and chewy on the inside and are made with almond flour, egg whites and sugar.

How macaroons became associated with Passover is logical. Almonds are Middle Eastern and mentioned in the Bible. The basic ingredients of ground almonds, sugar and egg whites, as well as coconut, would fit the requirements for a flourless Passover dessert.

In The World of Jewish Desserts, Gil Marks writes that Ashkenazi macaroons were called makarondelach, and confirms that Ashkenazi Jews got the idea for the flourless cookies from the Italian Jews. He also writes that among Sephardim, there is a denser and softer cookie called marunchinos, also made with almond paste and egg whites, and eaten for Passover.

Faye Levy suggests in her book, 1,000 Jewish Recipes, that macaroon cakes baked in a springform pan are a Passover tradition. At the cooking school in Paris where she studied, she was taught to bake macaroons on a paper-lined baking sheet with a little water poured under the paper before removing the macaroons. In this way, they remain moist. Another secret to keeping them moist is to prepare Italian meringue with sugar and water boiled to a syrup then poured in a thin stream onto stiff egg whites.

Claudia Roden, in The Book of Jewish Food, writes that Jews of Iran and Iraq make macaroons in a Turkish turban style and add bitter almonds, cardamom, and sometimes rose water. Jews of Turkey and the Balkans do not add rose water. Moroccan Jews make a similar pastry dredged in confectioners' sugar, and serve them in paper cups.

Here are some interesting ways to make macaroons for Pesach.

CLASSIC ALMOND MACAROONS

1 1/2 cups blanched almonds*
1/4 cup sugar
2 egg whites
1/4 tsp. almond extract
3/4 cup sugar
4 tsp.confectioners' sugar

Preheat oven to 325. Line a cookie sheet with waxed paper or parchment paper. Grind almonds finely with 1/4 cup sugar in food processor. Add egg whites and almond extract and blend 20 seconds. Add 3/8 cup sugar and blend 10 seconds, add remaining 3/8 cup sugar and blend 10 seconds.

Wet hands, roll 1 tbsp. dough between palms into a smooth ball. Place on cookie sheet and continue until all dough is used. Flatten each to 1/2-in. high. Brush each with water. Sprinkle confectioners' sugar on top. Bake in 325-degree oven for 25 minutes until very light brown.

Remove cookie sheets from oven. Lift one end of paper and pour 2 tablespoons of water onto the cookie sheet. Lift the other end of the paper and pour 2 tablespoons of water onto cookie sheet. Tilt sheet to spread water. When water stops boiling, remove macaroons from paper with a spatula and cool on a rack. Yield: 20.

Note: To blanch almonds: Place water in a saucepan and bring to a boil. Add almonds and boil 10 seconds. To test if done, remove one almond with a slotted spoon, press with thumb and finger. If skin slips away from almond, it is done; otherwise, boil a few seconds longer. Drain and peel. Spread in a single layer on paper towels and pat dry. When dry, grind.

MINI CHOCOLATE MACAROONS

3 egg whites
2/3 cup sugar
1 cup coconut
4 oz. unsweetened baking chocolate
1/4 cup oil

Preheat oven to 325. Grease cookie sheets. Beat egg whites until stiff peaks appear. Add sugar and beat a while longer. Place coconut, unsweetened baking chocolate and oil in a mixing bowl. Fold in egg whites.

Drop by teaspoon onto greased cookie sheet. Bake in preheated oven for 30 minutes. Transfer to rack to cool. Yield: 40.

VEGETABLE MATZAH BALLS IN SPIKED TOMATO SAUCE

This Passover, you won't even miss pasta night! Vegetable matzah balls covered with delicious spiked tomato sauce are an appetizing alternative to pasta, and for that matter, meatballs as well. Lightened up with fresh vegetables, the mouth-watering, handmade matzah balls are easier to prepare than you may guess. The matzah balls also work well to switch up your chicken soup.

Matzah Balls
1/4 cup vegetable oil
1 medium onion, peeled
1 large carrot, peeled
2 large celery ribs
1 green pepper, stem and seeds removed
4 eggs, beaten
1/2 tsp. pepper
2 tsp. salt
1 tsp. dried basil
1 tsp. dried oregano
2 cups matzah meal

Start a large pot of water to boil. Chop the onion and vegetables to a fine dice. In a large frying pan, heat oil, then sauté the onion until soft and golden. Add vegetables and continue to cook until soft. Remove from heat and cool. In a large bowl, add salt, pepper, basil and oregano to beaten eggs. Add vegetables with the remaining ojl, and then the matzah meal. Mix well. Shape into balls and drop into the boiling water. Cook covered, on a medium heat, for 25 minutes.

Tomato Sauce
1 1/2 cups tomato sauce
1 tsp. basil
1 tsp. oregano
1/4 cup kosher for Passover sweet red wine.

Mix all ingredients together in a saucepan on stove or in a covered microwave safe dish in microwave, bring to a boil and remove from heat. Pour heated sauce over matzah balls before serving.

STUFFED CABBAGE ROLLS

These are tender cabbage rolls filled with beef, swimming in a saucy little bath of stewed sweet and sour tomato sauce. This comfort food is guaranteed to be number 1 on your list to stir up memories of family gatherings gone by.

1 large cabbage

Filling
1 lb. lean ground beef
1 cup matzah farfel
1 egg
1 small onion, finely chopped
1 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. pepper
2 tbsp. tomato sauce

Sauce juice of two lemons
1 1/2 cups tomato sauce
1 can stewed tomatoes, chopped
1/3 cup brown sugar, packed
salt and pepper to taste.

In a large bowl, mix together ingredients for filling. Refrigerate.

Rinse the cabbage and place on a plate in the microwave. Cook on high for 10 minutes or until leaves soften and become easy to move. Plunge into a bowl of cold water to cool and loosen leaves. Carefully peel leaf back from cabbage, cutting it away at the core. If inner leaves are not softened, replace the cabbage in the microwave for 3 minutes. Repeat if necessary.

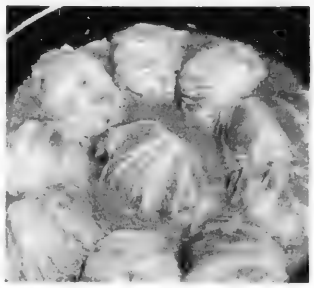
Cut out hard rib from the bottom of each leaf, set aside. When most of the leaves have been removed and all that remains is the centre of the cabbage, cut up the remaining cabbage. Place the cut cabbage along with the ends of each leaf at the bottom of a large, oven-proof Dutch oven.

Now start stuffing the leaves. Take about 1 heaping tbsp. of the beef filling and place it at the bottom of the leaf, where the hard rib was removed. First, roll up one time, then, envelope style, fold over one side then the other side. Continue rolling up until all the leaf is used and place seam down over the cut cabbage in the pot. Continue with the remainder of the filling and the leaves, placing the rolls, seam down, in rows on top of each other.

Pour sauce over cabbage rolls and cook, covered, on the stove at medium-high heat, for 2 hours.

Remove from stove, baste the top of the cabbage rolls with sauce from the pot, and place in a 350-degree oven, uncovered, for 1/2 hour.

May be made ahead. Reheat in the microwave.



OLD-FASHIONED BEEF STEW

Best made a day ahead, this hearty stew goes great with mashed potatoes.

3 tbsp. vegetable oil, plus 1 tbsp. vegetable oil
1 1/2 lb. stewing beef, fat removed, cut into 1-in. cubes.
4 tbsp. potato starch
4 large cloves of garlic, sliced
14 mini-potatoes, sliced in half
7 stocks of celery, sliced into 1/2-in. pieces
3 zucchinis, cut lengthwise into 4 pieces then chopped into 1/2-in. pieces
3 large carrots, sliced into 1/2-in. pieces
4 cups beef or chicken stock
2 tsp. dried thyme
2 tsp. dried rosemary
2 tsp. dried chives, or 2 tbsp. fresh chives, finely chopped
2 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. pepper
3 tbsp. kosher for Passover, sweet red wine

Heat 3 tbsp. of oil in a large nonstick pan. Coat beef in potato starch and, in two or three batches, brown in hot oil. Remove browned beef to a large Dutch oven.

Add 1 tbsp. oil to pan, and sauté garlic until soft. Add garlic and remaining ingredients to Dutch oven, and, stirring occasionally, simmer covered over low heat 1-1/2 hours, or until beef is tender. After cooking, skim off fat. Freezes well.

Note: Veal may be substituted for beef.

'Premium' wines for Passover

Yonatan Sternberg
Special to The CJN

With Passover only a few weeks away, it's time to start thinking about which wines you are going to serve on this festive holiday. An Orthodox friend of mine recently told me that on seder night, he always makes a point of buying at least one bottle of "premium" kosher Israeli wine to serve to his guests.

According to his philosophy, as drinking wine during the seder is officially a mitzvah, buying a special bottle of wine for the occasion is considered as a hiddur mitzvah, a beautification of the mitzvah. The concept of hiddur mitzvah is derived from Rabbi Ishmael's comment on the verse, "This is my God and I will glorify him" (Exodus 15:2) – "Is it possible for a human being to add glory to his Creator? What this really means is: I shall glorify Him in the way I perform mitzvot. I shall prepare before Him a beautiful lulav, beautiful sukkah..."(Midrash Mekhilta - a halachic midrash to the Book of Exodus).

Hiddur mitzvah basically means taking the time and making an effort to create or acquire (within budgetary constraints, of course) the most beautiful, most ascetic and highest quality object possible to perform a given mitzvah.

While certain wine-producing countries like France, Germany and Spain have set standards and categories for the different qualities of wines or vineyards, in Israel such categories do not exist. A "premium" wine is usually considered as such according to its price tag and the scores it receives from wine critics. It is important to remember that the fact that a wine sells for over $50 a bottle or received 93 points from critics does not necessarily mean that you will enjoy it, and at the end of the day, your taste is the one that counts.

Following are several holiday wine suggestions as well as tasting notes for a few "premium" wines currently on the market:

Barkan, Cabernet Sauvignon, Altitude +624, 2007, is produced using 100 per cent Cabernet Sauvignon grapes harvested from the Alma vineyard, situated at 624 metres above sea level. This full-bodied Cabernet offers layered aromas of black berry fruits, plums and cherries, along with spices, purple flowers, oak and a touch of vanilla.

Barkan, Cabernet Sauvignon, Superieur 2007 – The latest release from the Barkan Winery, Superieur, is considered the winery's flagship label and consists of several varietal red wines, namely: Merlot, Shiraz, Cabernet Sauvignon and a Pinotage-based wine. The Cab Superieur 07 is full-bodied and, in my opinion, more elegant than previous vintages. One hundred per cent Cabernet Sauvignon grapes from vineyards in the Upper Galilee, aged for 21 months in primarily French and some American oak barrels, still rather firm, the wine suggests black berry fruits, young plums, roasted coffee beans and vanilla followed by hints of fresh herbs and a touch of dark chocolate.

Binyamina, Avnei Hachoshen, Ya'halom, 2007 – A blend of Cabernet Sauvignon (50 per cent), Syrah (30 per cent) and Petit Verdot (20 per cent), in my opinion, is one of the best wines produced by Binyamina in recent years. Dark ruby in colour, the wine shows aromas of both red and black berry fruits, fresh herbs along with slight coffee and earthy notes, all leading to a long finish.

You can still prepare that dish – use substitutions

Eileen Goltz
Special to The CJN

At some point during Pesach preparations, we've all tried to convert a mainstream recipe into a Pesach one, only to discover that we don't have a clue as to what to substitute for a chametz ingredient. This panic moment is why I started compiling my complete list of Passover substitutes. I've added some great new substitutions this year. If anyone has any other substitutions that they would like to share please let me know at eztlog@gmail.com.

1 oz. baking chocolate (unsweetened chocolate) = 3 tbsp. unsweetened cocoa powder plus 1 tbsp. oil or melted margarine

16 oz. semi-sweet chocolate = 6 tbsp. unsweetened cocoa powder plus 1/4 cup oil and 7 tbsp. granulated sugar

14 oz. sweet chocolate (German-type) = 3 tbsp. unsweetened cocoa powder plus 2-2/3 tbsp. oil and 4-1/2 tbsp. granulated sugar

1 cup confectioners' sugar = 1 cup granulated sugar minus 1 tbsp. sugar plus 1 tbsp. potato starch pulsed in a food processor or blender

1 cup sour milk or buttermilk for dairy baking = 1 tbsp. lemon juice in a 1 cup measure, then fill to 1 cup with Passover nondairy creamer. Stir and steep 5 minutes

Butter in baking or cooking – use pareve Passover margarine in equal amounts. Use a bit less salt

1 cup honey = 1-1/4 cups granulated sugar plus 1/4 cup water

1 cup corn syrup = 1-1/4 cups granulated sugar plus 1/3 cup water, boiled until syrupy

1 cup vanilla sugar = 1 cup granulated sugar with 1 split vanilla bean left for at least 24 hours in a tightly covered jar

1 cup flour – substitute 5/8 cup matzah cake meal or potato starch, or a combination sifted together

1 tbsp. flour = 1/2 tbsp. potato starch

1 cup corn starch = 7/8 cup potato starch

1 tsp. cream of tartar = 1-1/2 tsp. lemon juice or 1-1/2 tsp. vinegar

1 cup graham cracker crumbs = 1 cup ground cookies or soup nuts plus 1 tsp. cinnamon

1 cup bread crumbs = 1 cup matzah meal

1 cup matzah meal = 3 matzot ground in a food processor

1 cup matzah cake meal = 1 cup plus 2 tbsp. matzah meal finely ground in a blender or food processor and sifted

3 crumbled matzot = 2 cups matzah farfel

1 cup (8 oz.) cream cheese = 1 cup cottage cheese pureed with 1/2 stick butter or margarine chicken fat or gribenes = 2 caramelized onions. Saute 2 sliced onions in 2 tbsp. oil and 2 tbsp. sugar. Cook until the onions are soft. Puree the onions once they are golden.

1 cup milk (for baking) = 1 cup water plus 2 tbsp. margarine, or 1/2 cup fruit juice plus 1/2 cup water.

1-1/4 cup sweetened condensed milk =1 cup instant nonfat dry milk, 2/3 cup sugar, 1/3 cup boiling water and 3 tbsp. margarine. Blend all the ingredients until smooth. To thicken, let set in the refrigerator for 24 hours.

1 cup wine = 13 tbsp. water, 3 tbsp. lemon juice and 1 tbsp. sugar. Mix together and let set for 10 minutes.

For frying: Instead of chicken fat, use combination of olive oil or vegetable oil and 1 to 2 tbsp. pareve Passover margarine.

Italian seasoning = 1/4 tsp. each dried oregano leaves, dried marjoram leaves and dried basil leaves plus 1/8 tsp. rubbed dried sage. This can be substituted for 1-1/2 tsp. Italian seasoning.

Curry powder = 2 tbsp. ground coriander, 1 tbsp. black pepper, 2 tbsp. red pepper, 2 tbsp. turmeric, 2 tbsp. ground ginger. Makes 2/3 cup.

Pancake syrup = use fruit jelly, not jam, and add a little water to thin. I always like to combine the jelly and water in a microwave safe bowl and heat it gently before I serve it.

Seasoned rice wine vinegar = 3 tbsp. white vinegar, 1 tbsp. white wine, 1 tbsp. sugar, 1/2 tsp. salt. Mix to combine. Makes 1/4 cup Flavoured vinegar = lemon juice in cooking or salad, grapefruit juice in salads, wine in marinades.

Water chestnuts – substitute raw jicama

Orange liqueur – substitute an equal amount of frozen orange juice concentrate

SOY SAUCE SUBSTITUTE

This soy sauce substitute doesn't taste exactly like the real thing, but it makes a flavourful alternative for Pesach stir fry.

2 tbsp. beef broth
1 tbsp. red wine vinegar
1 tsp. balsamic vinegar
1 tbsp. brown sugar
1 tsp. oil
1/8 tsp. garlic powder
black pepper to taste
1/4 cup boiling water

Combine all the ingredients. At this point, you can either (a) use the sauce as is, leaving for an hour to give the flavours a chance to blend, or (b) for a thicker, richer sauce, boil the liquid until it is reduced by half, about 3 tablespoons. Store in a sealed container in the refrigerator. Makes 2/3 cup. Use the sauce within 3-4 days.

CASHEW SOUR CREAM

This is creamy and you can use it in any recipe that calls for sour cream. It refrigerates well.

1 cup raw cashews (must not be roasted or salted)
1/4 cup cold water
1/4 tsp. salt
1-2 tsp. apple cider vinegar
1 small lemon, juice only

Cover cashews with water and soak for a few hours, or overnight. Pour off all water, and place nuts in food processor. Add 1/4 cup cold water, salt, vinegar and lemon juice. Puree for 3-4 minutes or until completely smooth and creamy in consistency. Use in any recipe that calls for sour cream. Refrigerate in an airtight container for up to a week. Makes 1 cup.

Carmel, Limited Edition, 2007 – A blend of 57 per cent Cabernet Sauvignon, 31 per cent Petit Verdot, five per cent Merlot, five per cent Malbec and two per cent Cabernet Franc, it is dark ruby with purple reflections, full-bodied, with good acidity, on the first attack notes of green pepper followed by pleasant aromas of dark berry fruits, black cherries and toasted oak leading to a long and pleasant finish.

Carmel, Mediterranean Blend, 2007 – steering away from the everyday Cabernet Sauvignon and Merlot, last year the Carmel winery released a blend based on Mediterranean grape varieties: Carignan, Shiraz, Petit Verdot, Petite Sirah and a dash of Viognier. The wine offers generous aromas of both black and red berry fruits, cherries and violets, followed by toasted oak and dry herbs.

This is part of a welcome trend, set by several Israeli wineries, to grow grape varieties that better suit the local climate. Carmel's Carignan, old vines and the Petite Sirah of the winery's Appellation label are definitely worth a try. The Binyamina Winery also recently released a very enjoyable Carignan as part of the winery's Reserve label.

Dalton, Matatia, 2006 – This is an elegant and well-balanced Bordeaux-style blend of Cabernet Sauvignon, Merlot and Cabernet Franc. Full-bodied and almost garnet in colour, the wine offers layered aromas of various black and red fruits: plums, cherries and blackberries come to mind, along with hints of fresh herbs, black pepper and dark chocolate, all leading to a long and satisfying finish.

Domaine du Castel, Grand Vin 2007 – Full-bodied and well-balanced, this elegant red blend offers layered aromas of various black and red berry fruits, plums, chocolate covered citrus peels, with in the background, hints of fresh herbs and just a touch of anise. By the way – since the 2003 vintage, all of the Castel wines have received kashrut certification.

Ella Valley, "E," 2007 – Last year, the winery officially released its new flagship vino simply titled "E," in a limited edition of 2,200 bottles. Dark ruby in colour, full-bodied, offering layered aromas and flavours of ripe plums, blueberries and black berry fruits, all followed by notes of black pepper, cloves and oak, leading to a long and generous finish.

Galil Mountain, Yiron, 2007 – A blend of 62 per cent Cabernet Sauvignon, 31 per cent Merlot and 7 per cent Syrah, full-bodied, the wine is fruit forward and a bit bombastic, showing generous aromas and flavours of dark berry fruits, sweet spices, plums and cherries, followed by notes of vanilla and bittersweet chocolate.

Golan Heights, Rom, 2007 – The winery recently released the Rom 07 which like the Rom 06 was also produced with the assistance of internationally recognized wine consultant Zelma Long. A full-bodied, concentrated blend of 53 per cent Cabernet Sauvignon, 24 per cent Merlot and 23 per cent Syrah, it opens with plenty of fruit – red cherries, blackberries and blueberries come to mind. These are followed by sweet spices, cinnamon, toasted oak and bittersweet chocolate that come together nicely to a long and satisfying finish.

The Golan Heights Winery also released the new Katzrin red blend from the 2007 vintage, which is definitely up to par compared to previous Katzrin releases – good structure, generous fruit and pleasant spices but still rather firm and not yet approachable. If you are thinking of serving it on Passover of 2014, it is advised to pick up a bottle and keep in the cellar for a few years. As time goes by, this wine is not always easy to find.

Golan Heights, Cabernet Sauvignon, El Rom Vineyard, 2007 – Full-bodied, the wine suggests concentrated aromas of dark berry fruits, dried cherries, purple flowers and slight earthy and dark chocolate notes, all coming together nicely and leading to a long finish.

Segal, Cabernet Sauvignon, Unfiltered, 2007 – Segal's flagship vino was produced that year using 90 per cent Cabernet Sauvignon from the Dishon and Dovev vineyards and 10 per cent Merlot from Dovev as well. Aged for 19 months in a mix of French, American and Central European oak barrels, the wine is full-bodied, displaying pleasant dark and red berry fruits alongside notes of black pepper, dark chocolate and just a touch of smoked meat, all leading to a long and satisfying finish. It's a rather food friendly wine, but very enjoyable on its own as well.

1848, Special Reserve, 2006 – A new release from a newly established winery, the 1848 Special Reserve is a blend of 78 per cent Cabernet Sauvignon and 22 per cent Petite Sirah. The wine was aged for 30 months in both new and used French oak barrels. Dark and concentrated in colour, full-bodied, the Special Reserve suggests various berry fruits, ripe plums, raspberries followed by notes of leather and toasted oak.

Yanofsky to perform at Crohn's, colitis fundraiser

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

Singer Nikki Yanofsky is the headliner at this year's All That Glitters Gala, in support of the Crohn's and Colitis Foundation of Canada.

As well, some talented up-and-comers are also featured at the event, called A GLEEful Gala. More than 1,000 guests are expected to attend the fundraiser to be held in May at Exhibition Place in Toronto.

Ronda Taylor has been a volunteer and fundraiser for the Crohn's and Colitis Foundation of Canada (CCFC) since her daughter, Jessica, was diagnosed with Crohn's colitis eight years ago. This year, Taylor has taken on the position of chair for the event.

"Research has shown evidence of a genetic predisposition to chronic IBD [inflammatory bowel disease] among Jews of eastern European descent. After seeing first-hand how very debilitating these illnesses can be, I decided it was my time to help," she said.

The CCFC will fund more than $5 million worth of research this year, but the organization still had to turn down at least 11 applications. "We are committed as a foundation and committee not to stop raising the necessary funds for these illnesses until there is a cure," Taylor said.

Over the past 15 years, the All That Glitters' Toronto chapter has raised over $8 million, she said. "The gala is an important tool in raising awareness for these debilitating illnesses. By educating Canadians about IBD, we can lift the veil of silence that often surrounds Crohn's disease and ulcerative colitis."

Issues such as the lack of awareness of IBD as a chronic disease, social stigma and the lack of equitable access to expensive IBD medications are prime focuses in the CCFC's national and international awareness campaigns, Taylor said.

In the past 18 months, Taylor witnessed the horrors of Crohn's disease, with the death of her aunt, Gail Fein-Simcoe, from complications of her illness. One of the committee's most dedicated fundraisers and volunteers, Mimi Greenspoon, also suffered the tragic loss of her son, Lee Greenspoon.

"We have an amazing executive and general committee that work tirelessly for our successes," Taylor said. "We are thrilled with the response to our event this year. We anticipate having the best All That Glitters' Gala to date and raise the much-needed funds so no one has to know the horrors of losing a child or a loved one."

The CCFC was founded in 1974 by a group of parents whose children were diagnosed with IBD. They were concerned about the lack of funding for IBD research, and they were interested in learning more about Crohn's disease and ulcerative colitis.

CCFC has grown to become a world leader in IBD research funding. Through the support of sponsors and donors, CCFC funds research projects that probe the mysteries of IBD. Life-altering treatments have been developed as a result of these discoveries.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Syrian forces fire upon protesters, witness says

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Syrian security forces opened fire on hundreds of demonstrators chanting against emergency laws in the southern city of Daraa on Monday, a witness said.

The demonstrators had converged on a main square in the city, chanting, "We want dignity and freedom," and, "No to emergency laws," the witness said.

Syria has been rocked by more than a week of demonstrations that began in the southern city of Daraa and exploded nationwide on Friday.

In a move to quell the unrest, Syrian Vice-President Farouq Shara said on Monday that President Bashar Assad would announce important decisions that will "please the Syrian people" in the next two days.

Bashar Assad

Shara was speaking to Lebanese Hezbollah's Al-Manar television. The station did not give further details. Assad has been facing the biggest challenge to his 11-year rule after two weeks of anti-government protests spread across the country.

Assad pledged several reforms after the unrest began in the country, but his efforts failed to appease protesters who are enraged after a violent crackdown on demonstrations in several cities.

At least 55 people are believed to have been killed in and around Daraa alone, as secret police and special forces try to quell the protests.

Earlier in the day, Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan said that he had spoken to Assad twice in the past three days and advised the Syrian leader to answer the people's calls with a reformist, positive approach.

Syria is working on reforms, including lifting emergency rule and restrictions on political parties, Erdogan said.

But activists continue to call for protests ahead of Assad's expected speech.

"We call for daily demonstrations and will not announce a place for protesters to gather because police will turn these areas into military zones," activists said on the Facebook page The Syrian Revolution 2011.

> At least 55 people are believed to have been killed in and around Daraa alone

On Sunday, the Interior Ministry urged Syrians on Sunday not to respond to calls to protest near Damascus' Umayyad Square.

"These messages you are receiving on your phones are the work of the people who want to incite strife in Syria," state television said.

Assad has convened the leadership of his Baath party to consider the steps to take to quell the unrest. Hezbollah's Al-Manar television in Lebanon reported that a shake-up of the Syrian cabinet was one of the moves being debated, along with the release of political prisoners.

Bashar Assad has been president since 2000, taking over after the death of his father, Hafez.

Canada condemns Jerusalem bombing

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

The deadly Jerusalem bomb blast that killed one woman and sent dozens to hospital on March 23 was immediately denounced by Canadian officials and representatives of the Canadian Jewish community.

Two of the injuries in the attack, which took place shortly before 3 p.m., were considered serious, according to news reports citing Magen David Adom. One of the injured went straight to surgery at Hadassah Hospital. Five others were reported in moderate condition, injured by shrapnel packed into the one-to-two-kilogram bomb.

The woman who died was Mary Jean Gardner, a 59-year-old British national. The evangelical Christian and Bible translator was studying Hebrew at Hebrew University.

Police said the bomb was left in a bag either in a telephone booth next to a busy bus stop or at the bus stop itself, along a main artery in central Jerusalem, near the International Convention Center and about a block from the city's central bus terminal. The blast blew out the windows of two buses picking up passengers.

In a statement, Foreign Affairs Minister Lawrence Cannon called the attack "an act of terror against the Israeli people."

"Our thoughts are with the victims and their families, and with the people of Israel. These heinous acts of terror must not be tolerated. Those behind this criminal act must be held accountable," he said.

Cannon also urged Israelis and Palestinians not to let this event derail the peace process and noted that Canada "stands ready" to assist with peace negotiations "if asked."

Also in a statement, Liberal leader Michael Ignatieff also referred to the bombing as "an act of terror" and expressed his party's sympathy to those affected in Israel.

"At a time when the region faces great challenges and is undergoing momentous change, all actors and states must also condemn this affront to peace, security and human life," Ignatieff said.

In a joint statement, the Canada-Israel Committee and the Canadian Council on Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), said "extremists" were not only behind this attack, but also the renewed firing of rockets into Israel from Gaza and the recent brutal murders of five Israeli family members in Itamar.

CIC chair Moshe Ronen said the extremists "are cynically trying to provoke Israel into a military response that will no doubt be used as an excuse by the Palestinian leadership to continue avoiding peace negotiations, and to further isolate Israel in the international arena."

Steven Cummings, national chair of CIJA, added: "Now more than ever, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas must accept Israel's offer to negotiate a comprehensive [peace] agreement immediately."

B'nai Brith Canada CEO Frank Dimant said in a statement that the bombing's timing "clearly suggests that this was a thinly veiled attempt by Islamists to try to refocus the international community on Israel and away from the brutal attempts by Libya and Arab regimes to quell the struggle for democracy in the Middle East and Northern Africa."

In a statement, Canadian Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center (FSWC) called the bombing the "most serious" of recent attacks by "Gazan terrorists."

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who delayed by several hours leaving on a planned trip to Moscow, said following the attack that his government has had a clear and successful policy on security, including "a vigorous response to any attempt to harm Israeli citizens, and systematic and assertive preventive measures against terrorism," which have led to two years of relative quiet.

U.S. President Barack Obama, in condemning the bombing, stressed that "Israel, like all other nations, has a right to self-defence" and "in the strongest possible terms." In the same statement, Obama offered condolences for the March 22 deaths of Palestinian civilians in Gaza that were caused by Israeli tank fire.

Palestinian terror groups in Gaza praised the bombing. Islamic Jihad spokesman Abu Ahmed called the attack a "natural response to the enemy's crimes. It is a clear and powerful message to Israel that her crimes won't be able to break the resistance."

She went straight to the ER

By the time she arrived on the scene, her friend, quite shaken and scared, had already taken a ride back to her seminary. Kaye stayed to help, but soon realized she could be of most assistance at the hospital where she was a volunteer. Many of the wounded, who had been hurt by the flying shrapnel of steel balls, nails and screws embedded in the bomb, had been taken to Shaare Zedek, with the balance going to the Hadassah Ein Kerem Medical Center, Hadassah-Mount Scopus and Bikur Cholim hospitals. Kaye ran back to the hospital.

She went straight to the ER, where she was immediately put to work. "All hands were on deck," she said.

The severely injured were rushed into surgery, while the less severe cases were treated in the emergency ward. Kaye found herself in a room with five victims who had already received initial treatment.

"They had bandages around their legs, and there was lots of blood. It looked as though their legs had been badly burnt," Kaye said. She comforted one teenaged victim who was waiting for his mother – stuck in traffic – to arrive at the hospital. "He used my cellphone to call her, and I held the phone to his ear because his hands were bandaged. Seeing this kid in pain and shock was terrible."

As a regular volunteer helping the elderly in the geriatric rehabilitation ward with their meals, she is often confronted with death. "People die every day. Just today, three people died on my ward," Kaye said, the day after the terror attack. "Working in the ER during a terror attack was very different. It was scary. But I don't want to dwell on it. Thank God there was only one death."

Kaye said she was surprised to discover how efficiently the ER operated in response to the attack. "They are very organized, thank God. If this happened anywhere else in the world, it would not have been as organized as it was. They are very on top of things."

According to Kaye's friend, Vivi Stahl, an interning physician at Shaare Zedek, the hospital's efficiency can be attributed to its staff's extraordinary experience in dealing with multi-casualty incidents.

"It was so efficient last night because they know exactly what they're doing. Everybody is prepared," said Stahl, 29, "Most of the staff are seasoned veterans and worked through the last intifadah, when [terror attacks] like this happened on a regular basis."

Stahl, originally from Teaneck, N.J., helped a few victims of the bombing who were rushed to the internal medicine ward where she works. She said the strangest part of the event was having to continue working side-by-side with Arab colleagues.

"The truth is that it was really hard to look them in the face. It was tense," she said, adding that usually, the Jewish and Arab doctors and nurses not only work together, but are great friends. "But we had to move past it very quickly, because when you're trying to save a patient, nothing that's going on outside matters. That's just the way medicine is."

For Stahl, it was strange just to be there. "I wasn't watching it on TV. I was actually [there]," she said.

The experience affected her deeply. "I went into the volunteer program to make a contribution, and for the first time, I really felt needed by my country," she said.

Israel sends medical delegation to Japan

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TOKYO — An Israeli medical delegation landed in Tokyo late Sunday as Israel prepares to open a field hospital in Japan's quake-ravaged Miyagi prefecture. Miyagi is one of the areas worst hit by the March 11 earthquake and tsunami which destroyed parts of the country.

The Israeli field hospital is to operate in Kurihara for a month, the Israeli military said on Monday. The closest hospital, a small one, is 1-1/2 hours away by car.

> An estimated 10,000 people were killed and over 17,000 people remain missing

"This is not a life-saving mission, like that of Haiti," said chief medical officer, Brigadier Nachman Esh, but the delegation would do important work attending to mostly older farmers living in the area.

The plane transporting the 50-member medical corps team was followed by a cargo plane carrying tons of equipment, including blankets, coats, and portable toilets.

Although Israel offered aid on the first day of the disaster, it took some time for Japan to accept the offer, on the condition that the delegation function independently, without logistical help from Japanese authorities, who are dealing with many other problems.

The delegation will help victims who survived the 9.0 magnitude earthquake and subsequent tsunami which swept through the area.

Despite widespread international assistance sent to Japan, Israel is one of the first countries to dispatch a medical delegation to the country.

An estimated 10,000 people were killed and over 17,000 people remain unaccounted for in the combined earthquake tsunami disaster that struck Japan.

The Israeli embassy in Tokyo and the foreign ministry will help co-ordinate communications between the Japanese authorities and the IDF.

Almost 15,000 homes across northeastern Japan have been destroyed by the disaster, and more than 100,000 damaged.

At the request of the Japanese National Disaster Center, the Israeli Foreign and Defence ministries also has sent 10,000 coats, 6,000 blankets, 6,000 pairs of gloves and 150 mobile toilets to the stricken area.

Dylan to perform in Israel

Bob Dylan will hold a single concert in Israel on June 20 at the Ramat Gan stadium, where Leonard Cohen and Elton John recently performed, it was confirmed last week. Dylan, who turns 70 in May, will arrive in Israel as part of a world tour that begins in Asia two weeks earlier and will conclude in Denmark in late June. This will be his third performance in Israel, following a concert in 1987 and another in 1993. He also visited Israel on his own in the 1960s. Dylan is expected to perform songs from all five decades of his musical career. Justin Bieber is scheduled to perform in Israel during the Passover holiday.

Facebook purchases Israeli start-up

Facebook is purchasing its first Israeli company, a start-up called Snaptu. Facebook will pay an estimated $60 to $70 million, according to reports citing market sources. The deal is expected to be finalized in the next few weeks. The company, established in 2007 with offices in London, Tel Aviv and northern California's Silicon Valley, has developed applications that allow mobile phones, including non-smartphones, to access the Internet. The applications could apply to about 80 per cent of all mobile phones in use around the world.

Remove intifadah page, minister urges Facebook

An Israeli government minister has called on Facebook founder Mark Zuckerberg to remove a page calling for a third Palestinian intifadah. Yuli Edelstein, minister of diplomacy and Diaspora affairs, in a letter sent last week called Zuckerberg's attention to the Facebook page "Third Palestinian Intifada," which calls for a third Palestinian uprising to begin May 15. The page, which has more than 230,000 friends, includes quotes and film clips calling for killing Jews and Israelis, and for "liberating" Jerusalem and Palestine using violence. "As Facebook's CEO and founder, you are obviously aware of the site's great potential to rally the masses around good causes, and we are all thankful for that," Edelstein wrote. "However, such potential comes hand in hand with the ability to cause great harm, such as in the case of the wild incitement displayed on the above-mentioned page."

Katsav sentenced

Former Israeli President Moshe Katsav was sentenced by a panel of three Tel Aviv District Court judges last week, after being convicted weeks ago of rape and sexual assault, to seven years in jail. He was also ordered to pay compensation to his victims. The sentence came nearly five years after he was first accused. Katsav, 65, reportedly began sobbing after the verdict was read and then yelled out several times, interrupting the judges, saying "It's all lies."

Hadracha helps young Jews get self-sufficient

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

It's not exactly the Dragon's Den – no-one is going to pony up big dollars for a piece of an innovative product – but getting young entrepreneurs to stand up and pitch their ideas to a business planning consultant is certainly an important step on the road to economic self-sufficiency.

At least it is according to the brain trust behind Hadracha, a relatively new entry into the field of career counselling and business development. Launched in November 2010, Hadracha is a non-profit organization aimed at helping Jews, mainly from the Orthodox community, embark on a career or start a business.

Part of its mentoring strategy is to have prospective entrepreneurs make a pitch before a specialist who can guide them toward possible business opportunities.

But that stage is already further down the checklist of interventions being proposed by Hadracha. According to Yis (short for Yisroel) Cohen, Hadracha is proposing a "triage" approach to its clients that will help them determine the best course of action toward achieving their career goals.

"Our hope is that Hadracha will be a point of entry for folks who need some attention and who are insecure or uncomfortable going to other service providers," Cohen said. "They need someone or some program to help them build their confidence and clarify if they are really cut out for business."

Hadracha's involvement begins with an intake interview in which the prospective client is asked to outline his or her goals, strengths and skills. From there, those expressing an interest in running a business may be given an appointment with a professional industrial psychologist who can perform a career assessment test. A meeting with a business plan expert could follow.

If they are deemed to be a better fit for traditional employment, they may be directed to subsequent interviews with other community services such as JVS Toronto or Kesher Employment Services.

While other community agencies should play a role, Cohen believes many in the Orthodox community will do better with Hadracha's involvement. "They need more hand-holding, private conversations, the sensitivity and understanding, so that the client is made to feel comfortable," he said.

Managing each client's case "from the get-go, getting a feel for the individual from a personal business perspective is the linchpin here," he added.

Hadracha's game plan is to follow the clients throughout their journey through the agency maze, to receive reports and help integrate the services to best meet the clients' needs. "Over time, we will take them to a point that is close to the realization of their aspirations," he said.

Cohen, who worked in a similar field with Chassidim in Brooklyn, acknowledged that making the transition to gainful employment or starting a business can be difficult in the religious community.

The five volunteers who started Hadracha are themselves young professionals who wanted to ease the move for others.

"They recognized that there is economic pressure, particularly in the Orthodox community, where at a young age, they have a few children and the wife is not working and the husband is transitioning from intensive Torah studies to having to go into the workforce to get a secure job to meet the growing family's needs."

Mayer Plonka is one of the five. He works providing logistics for the trucking business, but four or five years ago, he was "stuck looking for a job and feeling lost." Though he managed through his own initiative to become gainfully employed, he feels that "I could have saved time if there was someone to talk to and get advice."

Many in the Orthodox community are unaware of resources that could help them, including those in the Jewish community such as JVS. Hadracha "is all about communicating and helping them navigate the system," Plonka said.

What Hadracha is attempting to do is "to create a mechanism to allow the Orthodox community to find their way to mentoring from people who have been through the ropes, with solid, successful business experience," Cohen added.

Hadracha's first program last November saw close to 200 people gather for a conference where speakers discussed the economy, innovation, creativity and the application of social media to business. That was followed by a number of workshops on starting businesses and financial literacy. Hadracha has contracted with the Toronto Business Development Centre and George Brown College to offer their programs off-site – once at a Jewish high school in the Bathurst Street and Lawrence Avenue area, and another time at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Synagogue (BAYT) in Thornhill. Participants are not charged any fees.

Participants feel more comfortable at those venues and they can network with each other, Plonka said.

Sixty-five men and 35 women have attended the workshops so far and three have gone on to meet with business consultants.

With an annual budget of $140,000, Hadracha is planning to hold mini-conferences for about 300 people and 48 workshops for 960 more this year.

"Our funding plan is to assist 60 people with career counselling and 60 with business consulting," Cohen said.

Assisting people to stand on their own two feet not only helps the individual, but has community-wide repercussions, Cohen said. It is expensive to juggle all the elements that go into a Jewish lifestyle – including private school, synagogue membership and kosher foods.

"Our mission statement references the fact this is nothing less than building a stronger community by building individuals and families," he said.

Researchers warn of Israeli housing bubble

Shlomit Tzur
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A paper by researchers from the Faculty of Architecture and Town Planning at the Technion – Israel Institute of Technology concludes that price levels in the local housing market are showing signs of reaching bubble proportions similar to those elsewhere in 2007, before the global economic crisis.

The researchers do not, however, expect that prices will collapse here, as they did in other places then, thanks to the structure of the mortgage market and the current housing supply.

The paper, by Danny Ben-Shahar and doctoral student Yakov Varshavsky, will be included in a compilation of essays published by researchers from University of California at Berkeley. In it, the two examine the patterns of housing prices, focusing on the affordability of homes in Israel between 1989 and 2010 in terms of average net monthly household income.

The researchers found that between 1989 and 2008, the number of monthly incomes required to cover the price of an average dwelling rose from 47 to 60, or by 28.8 per cent. However, while for the top 10 percentile of income-earners this rose from 25 to 28 monthly earnings, or 13.6 per cent, for the bottom 10 percentile it soared from 109 monthly wages to 170 – a 56.7 per cent increase.

In analyzing affordability in different cities, the researchers found that for the wealthiest 10 per cent of the population, the number of monthly household incomes required to purchase a home in Tel Aviv rose from 1989 to 2010 by 10 to 43, while for the poorest 10 per cent, it rose by 120 months' salaries to 264 over the period.

In Haifa, the poor fared better: purchasing a home there required "just" 112 monthly earnings in 2008 for the lowest 10 per cent of earners, up 19 from 1989.

The researchers think that rising home prices in 2009 and 2010 have probably led to an even more extreme situation than the situation they found in 2008.

"We have found that the ratio of housing prices to income has recently reached not only an all-time high, but diverges dramatically and consistently from its long-term trend," Ben-Shahar said. "Potential homebuyers and policy-makers must carefully examine this disturbing phenomenon in comparison with worldwide housing markets in 2007, just before their collapse, so that it won't occur in Israel too."

Tovah Feldshuh brings Golda Meir to life

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

Tony-nominated actor Tovah Feldshuh is bringing her Broadway hit Golda's Balcony to the Richmond Hill Centre for the Performing Arts.

The one-woman show, at the centre on April 4, for one night only, is about the life of former Israeli prime minister Golda Meir.

"The play shines a light on a woman who never expected to become prime minister and the greatest agony of her entire political career, which was the 1973 war and the surprise attack by [Egyptian president] Anwar Sadat across the Suez Canal on Yom Kippur," Feldshuh says.

"And, it shows how a mother and a wife, who also happens to be prime minister, deals with the possible annihilation of her country."

Feldshuh, a multi-award winning actor of stage, film and television who was nominated for her first Emmy for playing the freedom fighter Helena in the 1978 NBC mini-series Holocaust, takes us on Meir's journey from childhood to death's door at 78.

For Golda's Balcony, written by William Gibson, she portrays 36 different characters. The original concept of the play didn't involve playing all these characters. It was reconstructed to suit what the actor so enjoys, and thinks edgy and daring – portraying multiple characters – as she demonstrated in 2000, in her one-woman show, Tovah: Out of Her Mind!

"The reason her [Meir's] journey is so arresting is because she goes from under the staircases of Kiev, hiding from a pogrom, to the halls of the Knesset," Feldshuh says.

"She goes from a poverty-stricken life in Milwaukee and Denver, to helping to found the Jewish state, to tilling the soil, something she knew nothing about, and never getting sick... others were dropping like flies. Her husband, Morris, got malaria, but not she.

"The play will bring to life her relationship with Israel as her primogeniture. Israel was her most important child, and Golda was pulled between her personal and her state life, and she chose the state for the greater good. She was a true utopian socialist," Feldshuh continues.

"She loved her children dearly, but if it was between being with them when they were sick or trying to save the state, there was no choice, she went to the latter."

Feldshuh, who is married to New York attorney Andrew Harris Levy and has two grown children, Garson Brandon and Amanda Claire, relates to Meir as a mother.

"I think Meir sacrificed a great deal for the birth of the Jewish state, and the substance of the Jewish state. You think it is hard to create a Jewish state? Try to sustain it... now you're talking!

"Sometimes we have to make big choices if we are prime ministers, surgeons or generals. Happily for me, I'm but an artist and I'm not faced with a career in the military or the medical. Lives don't depend on it."

Feldshuh first played the role of Meir in 2002, and other than a 2003 charity performance in Montreal for a Jewish fraternity house that had been destroyed, the Richmond Hill performance is the only Canadian stop on her tour to date.

"I just think it will be a rare artistic opportunity for the audiences in the Toronto area to witness, on a very personal level, the agony and dilemma of military conflict," Feldshuh says.

"The choice to engage in it and the sacrifice it means, and the dilemma of Israel being chosen as an enemy of her neighbour states, unnecessarily, of course... I think for pride alone. I think this play is moving art. If I was invited to see Golda's Balcony with the original Broadway actor, I would go and I would take my children and my parents."

Tovah Feldshuh stars in the one-woman show Golda's Balcony at the Richmond Hill Centre for the Performing Arts.

Matisyahu to star in Chabad benefit concert

Marvin Glassman
Special To The CJN

Matisyahu singing and dancing in his black hat, black suit and yarmulke, with his tzitzit flying, doesn't look like most reggae stars.

An American chassidic artist, Matisyahu has fused the musical styles of reggae, rock, hip hop and band box rhythms to the poetry of words from the Torah. He has crossover appeal to Jews and non-Jews alike, especially among the under-30 age group.

Matisyahu, 32, has created unique songs such as One Day and King Without a Crown, which became a Billboard top 40 hit song in 2006. Matisyahu is so popular that he has performed several times on TV talk shows hosted by Jimmy Kimmel, Jay Leno and David Letterman.

"All my songs are influenced by teachings of Chassidim that inspired me," said Matisyahu in a phone interview.

"I want my music to touch people and make them think. Chassidim teaches that music is the quill of the soul. I have many fans because the music taps into a very deep place and speaks to us in a way that regular words can't."

Born Matthew Miller in West Chester, Pa., Matisyahu (his Hebrew name) was raised a Reconstructionist Jew but became Orthodox in 1996 while attending Alexander Muss High School in Israel.

Matisyahu became a ba'al tshuvah in 2001, affiliating with Chabad Lubavitch in Crown Heights in Brooklyn, where he now lives with his wife and two sons. Inspired by diverse musical artists such as Bob Marley, the rock band Phish and Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach, Matisyahu has performed all over the world, including Israel.

"When I was a teen, I felt like I wasting my time playing music as nobody was paying attention. I prayed that God would show me what's real and true, then a whole path just opened up for me," Matisyahu said. "I am trying to be the person I am on stage and people respect that."

Matisyahu is a gentle soul who has crossover appeal "because he is an exciting performer with unique music," said Yael Mamann, who chairs a benefit concert Matisyahu will perform for Uptown Chabad at the Toronto Centre For The Arts on April 5.

"He doesn't just say he is Jewish," Mamann said. "Matisyahu leads by example by spreading the words of the Torah in music that touches the soul and moves you, Jew and non-Jew alike."

Chabad will sponsor a pre-concert dinner with Matisyahu at 6:30 p.m. in the centre's lobby. Following the concert, a dessert meet-and-greet photo reception will be held with the performer.

Matisyahu looks forward to meeting his fans at concerts. "I feel it is important to greet people and know them like family. Without my fans, I would not have a career," he said.

"Learning that my concert will benefit a worthy organization like Uptown Chabad makes it sweeter to perform," he added.

Matisyahu performs in an acoustic concert with guitarist Adam Weinberg on April 5. For tickets, $40 to $250, go to www.uptownchabad.com or call 416-635-9696.

Creativity is most important to actor who played in Incendies

Cara Stern
Special to The CJN

It's been a successful year for actor/designer Allen Altman, with two of his projects winning a slew of awards including eight Genie Awards, and one Oscar nomination.

The Montreal native who now lives in Toronto plays an Arabic notary in Incendies, the Canadian film nominated for Best Foreign Film at this year's Academy Awards.

The movie tells the story of twins who travel to Lebanon to unravel the mystery of their late mother's past. Altman plays the notary who helps them.

Incendies, shot in Montreal and directed by Denis Villeneuve, also won nine Jutras – the Quebec movie awards – on March 13.

"It's just such a wonderful story of humanity, of letting go of your anger, and all these messages that I think people really often don't want to discuss," Altman said in an interview. "But when they're put in a tableau of such a beautiful piece of art like this film, then they're discussed in a different way."

He calls his character, Notary Maddad, one of his most challenging to date. First, he had to learn to speak French with an Arabic accent. For that, he called on his childhood memories.

"I'm a Sephardic Jew, so my mom and dad spoke a little bit of Arabic when I was growing up," he said. "I knew the tonality that I was looking for, and what I was comfortable with."

Through mimicking an Arabic friend's accent and extensive training with a dialect coach, he was able to master a convincing accent.

Other challenges included learning the relatively large amount of dialogue that went with the role and not presenting it with a heavy hand.

"I think that was probably the most challenging part, finding the balance between giving justice to the importance of the situation but keeping it light and human," he said, explaining that his character often had to give intense, life-altering information.

Canadian films are not often nominated for Academy Awards – in the last 10 years, there have only been two others: The Barbarian Invasions (2004) and Water (2007).

He said the support for the film reminded him of the feelings of national pride in the Olympic gold medal men's hockey game against the United States.

"Everyone was just so proud to be Canadian – and I felt the same thing from the movie," he said.

In addition to helping him learn the accent, he said being Jewish, as an important part of him, would always affect or influence his roles.

"As a Jewish man, I grew up with traditions and core values that I often had to question, and the same thing happens in the movie," he said. "Every aspect of my being had a part in this film, and I put all of that in there."

His other recent roles include a profiler who helps capture a serial killer in a TV film called Wandering Eye.

"I really like to tell a story in that manner," he said, adding that his hope for the future is to go to Vancouver for a few months, and he would like to get a regular lead on a criminal or law-based television series.

When Altman's not acting in films or television, he practises Bikram yoga, a form of hot yoga done in a heated room.

"Often, life goes really, really quickly, and you need to find way to slow everything down and focus on yourself," he said.

He also runs an interior design company called Allen Altman Design, which he said is not so much a way of making money as another method of channelling his creativity.

"It all comes from the core essence of creativity, and for me… that's probably the most important aspect of my life," he said. "If I'm not creating something or working on something, I don't feel like I'm completely alive."

Israeli writer to screen his award-winning film

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

Israeli writer-filmmaker Etgar Keret is headlining a precursor event for the Ottawa International Writers Festival that includes a screening of Jellyfish (Meduzot).

Keret made the award-winning film with his wife, writer Shira Geffen.

A prolific short-story writer born in August 1967, Etgar Keret has certainly made his mark. Although his name may not yet be quite as recognizable as that of Amos Oz, David Grossman or A. B. Yehoshua, he's been hailed as a "genius" by the New York Times, the "voice of the next generation" by Salman Rushdie, and "Israel's most extraordinary writer" by the Observer.

His numerous story collections include Suddenly a Knock on the Door (2010), The Bus Driver Who Wanted to Be God (2003), The Nimrod Flip-Out (2002) and Missing Kissinger (1994). They have been variously translated into many languages, including Arabic.

A child of Holocaust survivors, Keret seems to return to dark themes with occasional cruel twists, no doubt as a result of living with Israel's existential "situation." His stories unfold by an internal subjective logic rather than an outward realism.

Jellyfish, which won a top prize at the Cannes Film Festival in 2007, shows the strange interconnectness of a disparate group of residents of Tel Aviv – an assemblage of "functionally depressed types stuck in mildly ridiculous situations not entirely of their own making," the Los Angeles Times noted. The film marked Keret's notable directorial debut.

His stories have inspired numerous short and feature films, such as the 1998 feature Wristcutters: A Love Story, which deals with the afterlife for suicides. The Huffington Post called it "a romantic comedy with no comedy and very little romance... a movie about death with very little death."

Contacted by e-mail as he was about to depart for Europe and America, Keret demonstrated his native wit in response to four e-mailed questions from The CJN. His answers came back in less than an hour.

First, has he ever been to Canada before? "I've been to Toronto a couple of times and to Montreal once and had a great time," he replied. "Canadians seem to be some sort of upgraded Americans which makes me wonder: why did God give them horrible weather as a reward?"

Second, does he consider his writing to be specific to the Jewish people? "I've been so heavily influenced by writers like Kafka, Sholem Aleichem and Bashevis Singer (as well as chassidic tales) that if my fiction would come out goyish, in the end it would be very disappointing :-)," he replied.

Third, which does he enjoy more, writing or making movies? "I love writing fiction and it is basic as a reflex for me, but after writing for years, taking part in a collaborative attempt like filmmaking can be a great change," he replied. "Yet, by the time the film is done, I already start missing again the solitude of writing."

And fourth, what is his advice to young writers? "Stay young! All this older-and-wiser stuff is so heavily over-rated," he quipped.

The film screening and a discussion with Keret, in Ottawa on April 3, are being hosted and moderated by the CBC's Adrian Harewood. See the websites writersfestival.org and etgarkeret.com for further details.

Singer marries Yiddish, Middle Eastern influences

Jordana Divon
Special to The CJN

Singer Lenka Lichtenberg has immersed herself in the thick, Old Country glottals and umlauts of Yiddish song for the past three decades.

Last year, she released her fourth studio album, Fray (Free), a collection of haunting, original Yiddish compositions that marry Yiddish and Middle Eastern influences, and she's gearing up for a performance at Lula Lounge in Toronto. It's a strange departure from the Czech-born artist's early beginnings as a child star with little connection to her Jewish roots.

"I was no genius, but I could hold a note," she recalls, sipping orange tea in her Toronto home. "So when I was eight years old, my mother responded to a request on the radio to apply for an audition [at Prague's famous Semafor Theatre] with Jiri Suchy, who's a household name back home. I got the part, and together with him I recorded a bunch of hits."

The eight-year-old became a full-fledged sensation, and Lichtenberg grew up performing those hits on the radio and in front of live audiences. It seemed a given that she would transition into an equally successful career as an adult.

Then, as a young woman, she made a startling discovery: she is Jewish.

It wasn't that she didn't know she is a Jew, as she sang at the Prague Jewish Community Centre every year for Chanukah and Purim. But the traditional songs she performed were for her simply words and melodies she memorized and "parroted" back.

As for the meaning behind the songs – and her religious identity – that had purposely been kept from the young girl. Fearful of the anti-Jewish sentiment circulating around eastern Europe at that time, Lichtenberg's mother felt she was protecting her child from the fate she and millions of other Jews had suffered.

"My mother was in the Terezin camp for 2-1/2 years," Lichtenberg says. "My father died in Auschwitz. My mother and grandmother had survived, and my mother had survivor's guilt. She never gave me any details of my Jewishness. In many ways, she blamed her Jewishness on all the horrible things that had happened to her, and she was protecting me by not telling me more."

Lenka Lichtenberg

Once Lichtenberg began to delve into her family history, however, she felt a powerful draw toward Judaism. During a trip to Masada in 1987, she had her personal epiphany. "I had been a rock singer and a folksinger," she says. "But then I had my moment in Israel where I discovered that I needed to be a Jewish singer."

And not just any kind of Jewish singer. With no prior exposure to the old Germanic tongue, the petite blond decided she would sing primarily in Yiddish, and soon became adept enough to start translating lyrics from the English.

"I still need some help, but I'm definitely getting more proficient," she admits with a self-conscious smile.

Recently, Lichtenberg has started exploring her attraction to Middle Eastern sounds, a genre she'd once overlooked because she didn't feel the exotic melodies fit with the thick, heavy Yiddish words. On Free, Lichtenberg threw the mantle off musical convention and created a collection of songs that fuse Yiddish and Middle Eastern influences with radical abandon.

"The CD's title is Free, which is fitting because I finally felt free to take my music into my own style. A lot of Yiddish music style is not caught up to where it should be," she says.

The album's success has inspired Lichtenberg to continue smashing boundaries and focus on a more collaborative approach to songwriting. So perhaps it's fitting that her upcoming show, aptly titled Bridges, features a selection of the singer's Yiddish songs merged with music by Palestinian-Canadian artist Roula Said.

With a performance schedule full enough to keep anyone busy, the mother of three has somehow found time to also explore Jewish liturgical music. Her upcoming project, Songs for the Breathing Walls, combines recordings taken from concerts at more than a dozen European synagogues, many of which are located in towns whose Jewish populations have been wiped out.

"I suppose it's somewhat ironic, as I was brought up an atheist, but this project is possibly the most significant thing I may ever get to do, and one unbelievably deep in my heart," she says.

So with Lichtenberg's adult life dedicated to exploring Judaism through song, how does her mother – who struggled so deeply with her own Jewish identity – feel about her daughter's chosen path?

"She doesn't understand it," Lichtenberg admits. "But I think by now she's used to it."

The Lula Lounge is at 1585 Dundas St. W. For tickets to Lichtenberg and Said's show, on April 7 at 9 p.m., call 416-588-0307.

Liz Taylor was a strong supporter of Israel

JTA

Academy Award-winning actor Elizabeth Taylor was buried at Forest Lawn in Glendale, Calif., on March 24, the day after she died, in accordance with Jewish law.

The popular actor, known for her violet eyes and her plethora of husbands, died March 23 of congestive heart failure at Cedars-Sinai Medical Center, where she had been hospitalized for about six weeks. She was 79.

Taylor converted to Judaism following the death of her third husband, Mike Todd, who was Jewish, in a plane crash and before marrying Jewish singer Eddie Fisher.

She denied that she had converted because of her Jewish husbands, saying that she had wanted to do it "for a long time." Her 1959 conversion at Temple Israel of Hollywood was well attended by the press.

Taylor made a point of travelling to Israel and fundraising for the Jewish state during the Arab boycott in the 1970s. Her films were banned in much of the Arab world. She was a supporter of the Kabbalah Center in Los Angeles.

She reportedly offered herself as a hostage for the more than 100 Air France hijack victims held by terrorists at Entebbe Airport in Uganda in July 1976.

In 2007, the U.S. Supreme Court refused to hear a lawsuit challenging Taylor's ownership of a Van Gogh painting that was claimed by a Jewish family. The family said the painting was looted from their relatives during the Holocaust.

Taylor won two Oscars, and is remembered for her roles in National Velvet and Cleopatra, among many others.

She also supported with her time and money several AIDS-related charities, including founding the Elizabeth Taylor AIDS Foundation.

Coetzee's novel is a semi-fictional biography

J.M. Coetzee won the Nobel Prize for literature in 2003, but in his recent autobiographical novel, Summertime (Harvill Secker), an intimate sums up the author this way: "After Disgrace I lost interest. In general, I would say that his work lacks ambition. The control of elements is too tight. Nowhere do you get a feeling of a writer deforming his medium in order to say what has never been said before, which is to me the mark of great writing."

Reviewed by Norman Ravvin

In Summertime, "John Coetzee" is dead. The novel is made up of discrete sections, each an interview conducted by a biographer struggling to understand his biographical subject before "Coetzee" became a writer of renown. Among the interviewees is Sophie, who offers the devastating critique quoted above. A Frenchwoman with whom the young "Coetzee" taught a course in African literature at the University of Cape Town, Sophie, knew him in the early 1970s, when he returned from the United States after American authorities denied him permission to stay.

Other interviewees include Martin, a teaching colleague who abandoned South Africa for England; "Coetzee's" cousin, Margot, who remains entangled with her family, many of whom live in obscurity on the barren landscape of the Karoo, north of Cape Town. Among them, too, is Julia, whose Jewishness is expressed through her easy use of Yiddish slang and with whom "Coetzee" has a short, failed affair. For each female interviewee, "Coetzee's" unfinishedness, or naiveté in relation to women is a constant and unsettling theme.

What, readers might wonder, is the point of presenting a semi-fictionalized "John Coetzee" in a novel rather than writing a memoir? By penning his own mock biography Coetzee may succeed in short-circuiting efforts by critics and literary journalists to mine his life for their own work. And Coetzee might argue that novels are often thinly veiled autobiography, without any overt acknowledgment of this.

Summertime offers glimpses that resonate with Coetzee's earlier work. Martin tells us that the writers that "mattered deeply" to his compatriot include "the 19th-century Russian novelists." To find out more we might turn to Coetzee's fictional portrait of Dostoyevsky in The Master of Petersburg. When Sophie is asked about her response, upon reading Coetzee's second work, In the Heart of the Country, she admits her surprise at not finding herself in it, at being excluded from the writer's "imaginative universe."

The South African predicament comes sharply into focus in Summertime, both as it stood in the early 1970s and in its transformed condition in recent years, when the novel's interviews take place. "Coetzee's" bond to his homeland is expressed in the interview with Margot. Having grown up together, they share the same sense of connection with the harsh landscape of their childhood, the kontrei, as the Afrikaans language designates the particular character of the Karoo.

Margot believes they were "granted to spend" their "childhood summers in a sacred space. The glory can never be regained..." This is one of the few passages where the novel's title takes on clear relevance. Margot's farmhouse kitchen on the Karoo has an almost sacred quality, as a place "she married into and has come to love, with its huge old fireplace and its ever-cool, windowless larder whose shelves still groan with jars of jam and preserves she laid in last autumn."

In Margot's recollection of her cousin we learn of the young John's decision to do work for himself, in a country with a "long history of making other people do our work for us while we sit in the shade and watch."

There is nothing programmatic about "Coetzee's" politics in relation to his homeland. Sophie describes him as "anti-political," frustrating her interviewer's aim to uncover his subject's relation "with black people in general." These themes are introduced in ambiguous and devastating ways. The Afrikaans language is an important presence in Summertime. And "Coetzee" expresses an urge to learn the largely lost Khoi dialects: "I am interested in the things we have lost, not the things we have kept," he says. His goal is to "speak with the dead... who otherwise are cast out into everlasting silence."

As part of the interview with Martin, we are offered a summation of one view of South African identity held by "Coetzee's" generation: "our presence there was legal but illegitimate. We had an abstract right to be there, a birthright, but the basis of that right was fraudulent. Our presence was grounded in a crime, namely colonial conquest, perpetuated by apartheid. Whatever the opposite is of native or rooted, that was what we felt ourselves to be."

This is a devastating indictment from an author who left his parents' country in 2002 to teach and write in Australia. It is a view that has gained Coetzee his share of detractors in South Africa. But the craft and impact of its presentation in fiction marks him as a writer who deserved the Nobel Prize for his writing alone, and not for the positions that his writing takes on political or social issues.

Norman Ravvin chairs the Concordia Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies. His new novel, from Gaspereau Press, is The Joyful Child.

Jewish sports program has 'grown exponentially'

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

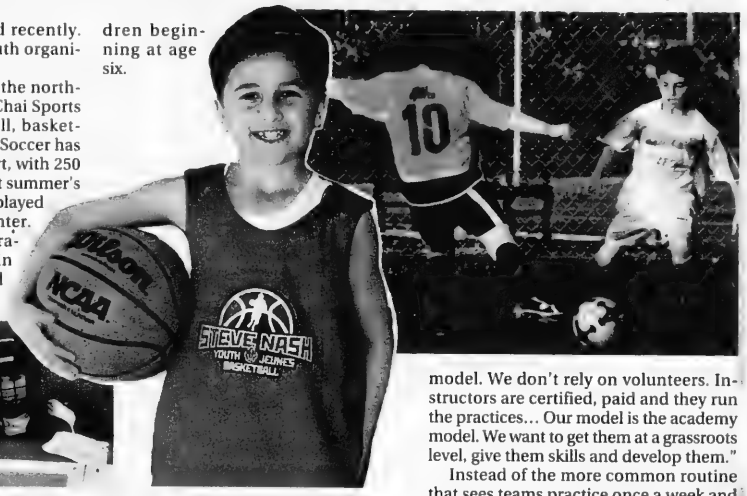
It seemed like a good idea at the time. Offer Jewish youngsters a variety of sporting activities, give them good quality coaching and an environment in which they compete with other members of the Tribe. Create, in effect, a Jewish sporting community that instils pride and develops community affiliation.

Three years into the sporting venture, Alex Voihanski is reporting that the program has exceeded expectations.

More than 1,300 boys, girls and even adults have signed up for sports programs offered by JCC Chai Sports, a partnership of Voihanski's Chai Sports and Toronto-area Jewish community centres.

"We've grown exponentially," Voihanski said recently. "We're the largest Jewish youth organization in the country."

Catering largely to kids in the northern reaches of Toronto, JCC Chai Sports offers soccer, baseball/T-ball, basketball, flag football and hockey. Soccer has proven the most popular sport, with 250 youngsters participating in last summer's schedule and another 60 who played the indoor game this past winter. In 2009, the first year of operation, only 40 kids enrolled in the outdoor league. Entry level programs are geared to children beginning at age six.



Hockey is likewise quite popular and could be even more so but for the shortage of available ice time. Playing out of the Pavilion, JCC Chai Sports offers three divisions for youngsters aged five to 10. Altogether, 125 kids play in the league with another 27 on the waiting list. In the first year, a total of 35 skaters participated.

Basketball likewise stresses a "learn to play" program for the younger set, with 160 kids from ages six through 17 playing. A further 60 are expected to enrol in the spring session.

Almost 80 young batters take part in the baseball and T-ball programs, and last season, 30 older kids eight to 13, enrolled in the NFL flag football program. "We expect to double that" this year, Voihanski predicted.

JCC Chai Sports also offers an adult hoops league, with 180 guys playing on 24 teams. The organization has also put together the Jewish team in the Canadian Multicultural Hockey Championships – the Israeli Stars of David have won the championships twice in the last three years, including last December. It is also responsible for assembling the Toronto team for the JCC Maccabi Youth Games, which are held in North American cities every August.

"Our goal is to become the one-stop shop for the Jewish sporting community," said Voihanski.

Take hockey, for example. Voihanski's vision is to develop a full house league system with kids staying with the program as they get older.

"Why we've become so popular in a short time is that we've taken a European model. We don't rely on volunteers. Instructors are certified, paid and they run the practices... Our model is the academy model. We want to get them at a grassroots level, give them skills and develop them."

Instead of the more common routine that sees teams practice once a week and play later the same week, JCC Chai Sports offers one longer (75-minute) practice and play session. That makes it easier on parents who no longer have to schedule two weekly events, he said. Topping it off for the hockey champions is the "Kiddush Cup," a miniature version of the Stanley Cup.

Though the programs have proven quite popular, Voihanski sees room for expansion. To date, most of the sports venues are in northern rinks, gyms or playing fields. "We're developing more programs to cater to the south, but hockey is tough," he said. "You just can't find the ice time."

But it's not just the on-ice or on-field program that is proving attractive to parents, Voihanski believes.

"There are no [other] legitimate programs for Jewish youth specifically," he said.

Modern Orthodox families have taken to the program – they make up about 35 per cent of the enrolment – since none of the sports are held on Shabbat. And, "a lot of kids without major connections to the Jewish community are enrolled. That's why their parents put them in."

The programs "are top end" and offered "at a reasonable price."

Wrapping up the whole experience is "a phenomenal banquet at the end, with 500 people," hosted by a MC, complete with videos of athletes, slide show and lots of fun, Voihanski said.

What more could kids – or their parents – want?

Kiss singer calls boycotters 'fools'

JTA

Gene Simmons

Shout it out loud: Gene Simmons thinks Israel boycotters among his rocking colleagues are "fools."

Simmons, the Kiss co-founder known for his seemingly endless tongue, returned to Israel recently as part of his TV reality show, Gene Simmons Family Jewels.

Simmons, born Chaim Witz, left Israel 50 years ago as a child with his mother, and settled in New York.

In an interview with the Associated Press, Simmons blasted rockers like Elvis Costello, the Pixies and ex-Pink Floyd frontman Roger Waters, who are boycotting the Jewish state because of its West Bank settlement policies and other policies.

He said they were "fools" for boycotting the region's only democracy.

"The countries they should be boycotting are the same countries that the populations are rebelling," he said.

Kiss, a glam-rock band known as much for its outrageous costumes and makeup as for its anthemic music, scored huge fame and hits in the mid-1970s with the songs Detroit Rock City, Shout It Out Loud and I Wanna Rock and Roll All Nite (and Party Every Day).

Rock hall inducts Neil Diamond

JTA

The Rock and Roll Hall of Fame inducted singer Neil Diamond earlier this month.

Diamond, 69, who launched his career as a songwriter in the 1960s in the Brill Building songwriting factory penning hits for groups like The Monkees, was inducted at a ceremony in New York.

He soon launched a solo career, and his rich baritone coupled with his lively onstage presence earned him the sobriquet "the Jewish Elvis" with hits such as Solitary Man and Cherry, Cherry.

Diamond addressed his Jewish roots and the conundrum of assimilation when he starred in the 1980 remake of The Jazz Singer. The film was a box office success but was panned by the critics.

Another Jewish singer-songwriter, Paul Simon, who already is a member of the Hall of Fame, introduced Diamond.

Other inductees at the March 14 ceremony at the Waldorf Astoria Hotel included Darlene Love, the Phil Spector protege whose Christmas (Baby, Please Come Home) is a seasonal classic, Alice Cooper, Dr. John, Leon Russell and Tom Waits.

The Rock and Roll Hall of Fame is located in Cleveland, Ohio.

Both non-performer inductees this year are Jewish: Jac Holzman, who founded Elektra Records and signed The Doors; and Art Rupe, who founded Specialty Records, a pioneering soul label.

Childhood friends run popular Out of the Cold art program

Jordan Press
Special to The CJN

Every Tuesday night during the winter, two old friends, Melanie Cheskes and Marni Wolf, spend some time together and time with those less fortunate than themselves.

And they wouldn't have it any other way.

Cheskes, 26, and Wolf, 24, volunteer their time with the Out of the Cold program, an Ontario-wide program that provides a warm meal, a welcoming environment, clothes and a bed for those in need.

But what is different about the Out of the Cold program that Cheskes and Wolf volunteer with – jointly run by Beth Sholom Synagogue and Beth Tzedec Congregation each Tuesday until the end of March – is that since last year, an art program has been put in place.

Cheskes and Wolf, childhood friends who decided to become involved with the art program, said they have bonded with the artists who stop in.

"It's become a commitment to the people. At the end of every week, they tell me they look forward to it, and I look forward to it," Cheskes said.

"They're so appreciative that you're there, and it's nice to feel that way. It's a very warm and peaceful atmosphere amidst the chaos of whatever else is going on outside. It's a nice little break from life."

The success of the arts program makes Wolf and Cheskes believe it could bear similar results at other Out of the Cold programs.

"There's so much opportunity for growth," Cheskes said.

Marni Wolf, second from the left, and Melanie Cheskes, beside Wolf, run Out of the Cold's art program.

In late 2009, volunteers at Beth Sholom asked Cheskes if she would be interested in volunteering two hours a week to run the arts program that was a year old. The synagogue is close to her home, and Cheskes said the idea caught her attention.

"There was really no reason to say no," she said.

She started with about three participants. Now, there are 15 regulars and new people participate all the time.

"As I started going to do art with the participants every week, I realized this was a really beautiful program, and the participants were doing something special... and we could take this further," Cheskes said.

In an effort to raise money for both the Out of the Cold program and the people who benefit from it, they decided to organize an art show to present the work created by the program participants.

The plan was to have 80 per cent of the proceeds go to the artists and the remaining 20 per cent to the program, but the artists would hear none of it. They wanted all the funds to go to the program.

Last year, the first art show raised more than $4,000.

"People that came were touched by the artwork," Cheskes said. "They were surprised that these people were so poor."

Many attendees, Cheskes said, were confused about why some artists didn't have more opportunities for work. Many have had opportunities for work presented to them, Cheskes said, but mental health issues have stepped in the way.

"Most of them struggle with mental issues. Some are more obvious than others," Cheskes said.

This year's art show is scheduled for April 10, and the art will remain on display at Beth Sholom until April 15.

"It's just a way to raise awareness and raise money for the program," Cheskes said.

Each painting will be sold for $35, and Elgin Picture & Frame on Dupont Street is matting paintings for free to give the artwork a professional look, Cheskes said.

"That is pretty wonderful and a huge help," she said.

The group of artists that works with Cheskes and Wolf ranges in age from a high school girl who comes in with her mother to a man in his 60s.

When Wolf and Cheskes speak of their group of artists, you can tell immediately that they are pleasantly surprised each week with their artistic skills.

Take Freddie, one artist who Wolf said attracts the attention of others in the program. A formally trained artist, Freddie grew up in El Salvador. People watch him paint, but he doesn't notice them, Wolf said, because he's focused on depicting the Mayan folklore in his head.

"He'll sit there and talk to you about the story for 20 minutes," Wolf said.

"You can see when he paints that he is completely and utterly absorbed... He's just clearly extremely talented."

Freddie helps with the setup and clean up of the arts table, and has also taken on the role of teacher, helping others who have just started and are not as sure of their skills.

Then there's Michael, the man who is there to make art and socialize. Cheskes said Michael, who is in his 30s, helps the volunteers in handing out clothes and food to all those coming in the door and makes sure the art program is organized and artists have everything they need.

When he sits down to draw, he produces caricatures of men with top hats and spectacles, Wolf said.

"You can see him thinking and laughing at what he's drawing. He's his own entertainment. You can see how much he loves it."

It's this attachment and sense of community that Wolf and Cheskes have built with their fellow artists that makes them believe they will be back with the program when it starts again next winter.

"There's such a warm, genuine feeling from a lot of the people," Wolf said. "How could you not go back to that?"

For more information, visit www.bethsholom.net/out-of-the-cold.htm.

Out of the Cold is holding an art show/fundraiser at Beth Sholom Synagogue on April 10.

Slave to the mega-seder

Dear Ella,

My most dreaded Jewish holiday is upon us, and it's getting worse every year. Passover. People think our enormous annual family seder is wonderful. For me, it's anything but wonderful. We have a large family, and it's getting bigger every year. I realize that's a good thing, but for a our Passover seder, it spells disaster.

We started with 30 people, and we're up to 76 this year. Traditionally, I have always hosted the seder, because I live in a condo with a large party room. Everyone is in charge of a different task. One person decides on the menu and delegates the cooking. This in itself has become a nightmare because of food allergies, diets, kashrut, etc. Another is in charge of ordering chairs, tables, dishes and still another in charge of wait staff. The list seems endless. I feel like I should open my own event-planning company.

Ask Ella

Ella Burakowski

On the day of the seder, I am drained, running between the condo and the party room. Then comes the seder itself. Not everyone is speaking to each other.There is whispering and gossiping. Someone inevitably brings an inappropriate dish. The invited gentiles are often given the cold shoulder by some family members.

I'm too old for this. It takes me a month to recover. After this year, I will no longer be hosting the Passover seder. I know this will be a huge blow to the family. Any suggestions on how to let them down easy would be appreciated.

Exodus

Dear Exodus

Passover is a time for family. However, not all connected families have to get together in one place.

In theory, your seder sounds wonderful – having the entire extended family celebrating together – but the logistics of making it work, and staying calm and happy in the process, are challenging.

It would be a shame to dissolve this family tradition, but the seder has to take a back seat to your health.

Make your announcement, but offer a couple of alternative ideas, so the decision isn't yours alone.

You're right when you say it requires an event planner. Short of a live band, everything else has to be organized: food, drink, dishes, linens, decor, wait staff, invites, head counts, set-up, clean-up and payments. Perhaps renting a venue would solve the problem of where to hold the seder. Your family could even take it one step further and hire a caterer to plan and execute the entire event from start to finish. Obviously the cost would be much higher, but the caterer would be responsible for supplying everything. All that would be required from one of your family members is a head count and input on the menu.

By offering these suggestions, you take the onus off of you and force everyone to make a collective decision.

As for the family politics, you can't control that. Just sit back and enjoy. It adds flavour to the event.

Chag Samayach!

More to hearing than sound

It was one of many geriatric meetings that I have attended as part of my academic professional activities. The speakers and the audience were all health-care professionals committed to the care of the elderly.

The session focused primarily on issue of driving and aging, but the question of hearing and cognitive impairment came up. An audience member, a speech-language pathologist, asked one of the speakers about the importance of confirming a patient's hearing capacity before a decision was made about his or her cognitive abilities.

Senior Side of Life

Michael Gordon

A well-respected geriatrician, contrary to what I would have thought to be a reasonably suitable answer, discounted hearing as playing an important role in the symptomatology and evaluation of people with cognitive impairment. The questioner reiterated her concern that it was an issue, expressing some degree of incredulousness at the physician's answer, and from the murmuring in the audience, it seemed that she was not alone in her connecting compromised hearing with compromised cognition.

After the session, I went up to the therapist and expressed my surprise at the answer and told her of our practice at Baycrest in which we try, whenever possible, to evaluate hearing as part of an assessment, at least initially, of a person with symptoms of cognitive impairment.

I was, therefore, elated to read recently of a research study that implicated hearing impairment in the development of dementia and suggested that hearing loss is perhaps linked as one component to be considered in its causation.

To quote Dr. Frank R. Lin of the Center on Aging and Health, Johns Hopkins Medical Institutions, the first author of the study published in the February 2011 issue of Archives of Neurology, "Whether hearing loss is a marker for early-stage dementia or is actually a modifiable risk factor for dementia deserves further study."

From an article by Megan Brooks, published in Medscape Medical News on Feb. 16, Lin is quoted as saying, "A number of mechanisms may be theoretically implicated in the observed association between hearing loss and incident dementia. Dementia may be over-diagnosed in people with hearing loss; alternatively, people with cognitive impairment may be over-diagnosed as having hearing loss. It's also possible that the two conditions share an underlying neuropathologic process."

He goes on to say, "Another option is that hearing loss may be causally related to dementia, possibly through exhaustion of cognitive reserve, social isolation, environmental deafferentation or a combination of these pathways." Environmental deafferentation is a complex medical term that means the freeing of a motor (movement) nerve from sensory components. How do we translate this into our ordinary clinical activities and how should individuals experiencing cognitive decline and their families address the issue? One important step in the assessment and evaluation of cognitive impairment is to ascertain a person's level of hearing, and if there is any doubt whatsoever, a proper audiology evaluation should be done. A rough test of hearing is not enough because sound as well the ability to discriminate sounds into words and meanings must be evaluated.

If there is any question of hearing impairment, it's always worth addressing it, even with a Pocket Talker, a low-cost amplification device that can usually help determine if some degree of amplification will enhance hearing and, at the same time, cognitive capacity. Don't hesitate, just get it done.

Dr. Michael Gordon is medical program director of palliative care at Baycrest and co-author with Bart Mindszenthy of Parenting Your Parents (Dundurn Press). His latest book, Moments that Matter: Cases in Ethical Eldercare, follows his previous book, Brooklyn Beginnings: A Geriatrician's Odyssey. Judge Goldstone recants anti-Israel conclusions in report

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Judge Richard Goldstone said last week that if Israel had co-operated with the UN fact-finding commission looking into activities in Operation Cast Lead, the charges levelled against Israel in his report, including those of alleged war crimes and the intentional targeting of civilians, would have been different.

Writing in a Washington Post column published Friday, Goldstone pointed to Israeli efforts to investigate wrongdoings by soldiers and commanders during the war in Gaza 2-1/2 years ago. War crimes allegations against Israel would have been influenced by the evidence provided by such probes, he said.

"We know a lot more today about what happened in the Gaza war of 2008-09 than we did when I chaired the fact-finding mission appointed by the UN Human Rights Council (UNHRC) that produced what has come to be known as the Goldstone report," Goldstone wrote, adding: "If I had known then what I know now, the Goldstone report would have been a different document."

The former South African jurist said that while "Israeli evidence that has emerged since publication of our report doesn't negate the tragic loss of civilian life, I regret that our fact-finding mission did not have such evidence explaining the circumstances in which we said civilians in Gaza were targeted, because it probably would have influenced our findings about intentionality and war crimes."

While Israel has been shown to probe itself "to a significant degree" over its actions in Gaza, Goldstone wrote, Hamas, which has been in control of the coastal enclave since 2007, "has done nothing."

Goldstone also criticized the UN Human Rights Council's anti-Israel bias, saying he had hoped that the report could "begin a new era of even-handedness at the UN Human Rights Council, whose history of bias against Israel cannot be doubted.

Seder in Sherbrooke

MONTREAL — Quebec Jewish Congress, the Université de Sherbrooke, the Canadian Center for Ecumenism and the Sherbrooke Agudath Achim Society hosted a communal seder on Monday, April 4, at the university, presided over by Archbishop André Gaumond. The seder was dedicated to the sharing of cultural traditions and intercultural dialogue. People from the political, cultural and business sectors of Quebec's Eastern Townships shared a special meal, traditionally held on the first and second nights of Passover in celebration of freedom and tolerance.

WORLD

Art To Be Returned

LOS ANGELES — The Getty Museum in Los Angeles will return a 17th-century Dutch painting looted by the Nazis to the heir of a Jewish art dealer. Jacques Goudstikker left 1,400 works of art in his Amsterdam gallery when he fled the Nazis in 1940. He died during the escape. His gallery was looted by Hermann Goering shortly afterward. In 2006, the Netherlands returned 202 paintings from its national collection to Goudstikker's sole heir, Marei von Saher. In returning the painting Landscape With Cottage and Figures by Dutch artist Pieter Molijn, the Getty Museum becomes the first U.S. institution to restitute von Saher, the widow of Goudstikker's son.

Camp Restoration

VIENNA — Austria will renovate the site of the Mauthausen concentration camp in a $2.4-million (US) restoration project. The two-year project will include creating a hall of names in memory of the camp's victims, a new display about the Holocaust and upgrading the permanent exhibition, according to reports. The project was announced March 29 by the Austrian interior ministry.

BBI Leader Charged

WASHINGTON — Dennis Glick, who abruptly resigned as president of B'nai Brith International, has been indicted on federal charges of tax fraud. Glick, a certified public accountant who held a variety of positions over the years at B'nai Brith, including treasurer, was arraigned last Thursday and released on $50,000 bail after entering a plea of not guilty. He was arrested March 23 on charges of falsifying tax returns for a client and lying about it to investigators. If convicted, he faces up to 15 years in prison and a fine of $1.2 million. Glick, 67, had been president of the organization since December 2009 and has a 40-year history with B'nai Brith.

Peace Plans

WASHINGTON — Israeli President Shimon Peres on a visit to Washington reportedly will present the outlines of a peace plan that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu expects to unveil in May. Peres will be in Washington this week, the Israeli Embassy said in a release and arrangements for meetings with "government leaders" are under way.

Yemen's Jews Reportedly Staying Put

SANAA —The 250 or so Jews remaining in Yemen insist on staying despite the upheaval in their country, Jewish organizational officials say.

Long a target of campaigns by Jewish organization officials in the United States and Israel to get them to emigrate, the Jews remaining in Yemen simply don't want to leave, according to a Jewish organization official involved in the effort.

Last month, Yemen's president, Ali Abdullah Saleh, blamed violence and unrest in his country and around the Arab world on "an operations room in Tel Aviv" that is "run by the White House." Despite his statement, he's given protection and support to Jews at a compound in the capital Sanaa, where most of Yemen's Jews live.

Saleh recently indicated he might be convinced to step down, but the developments have not prompted an exodus of Jews from the country.

"They refuse categorically to leave," said the Jewish official, who insisted on anonymity. "They have been under a barrage of phone calls from relatives encouraging them to leave. Prominent ex-Yemenite rabbis were drafted as well and asked to call them, saying leave now before things get hectic and you can't leave."

Some seem to be making contingency plans to leave, the official added, but so far they're sticking together.

Campaign launched on behalf of Gilad Schalit

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

A Toronto woman is spearheading what she hopes will be a GTA-wide awareness campaign for Gilad Schalit, to take place at Saturday morning services on Shabbat HaGadol, April 16.

Marlene Black Rattner – a teacher who spent more then 15 years in bank management before becoming a stay-at-home mom – told The CJN she has never taken on an activist role before, but that she is "pretty much fed up with the injustice of the terrorists. I think it's time we all took a stand."

Schalit, who was born in 1986, was abducted from his IDF unit by Hamas in June 2006. In an information sheet, Black Rattner noted that he has been held in isolation for just under five years, and – in contravention of international law – Hamas has not granted visitation rights, permitted correspondence or demonstrated humane treatment to him.

Black Rattner, who has a 20-year-old son, said Schalit's abduction bothered her "to no end."

But it wasn't until last summer, when she read a column about him in The CJN called "Time to end the silence" that she was galvanized into action. Rabbi Benjamin Friedberg – rabbi emeritus of Beth Tzedec Congregation, where Black Rattner is a longtime member – was the author.

Another influence for her was hearing Harvard law professor Alan Dershowitz and MP Irwin Cotler speak at Beth Tzedec a few years ago. In addition to organizing the upcoming Shabbat initiative, last fall Black Rattner started an ongoing awareness campaign, and has gathered more than 450 signatures on a petition she prepared under the name "Concerned Canadians for Gilad Schalit." She has been assured that it will be read in the House of Commons, she said.

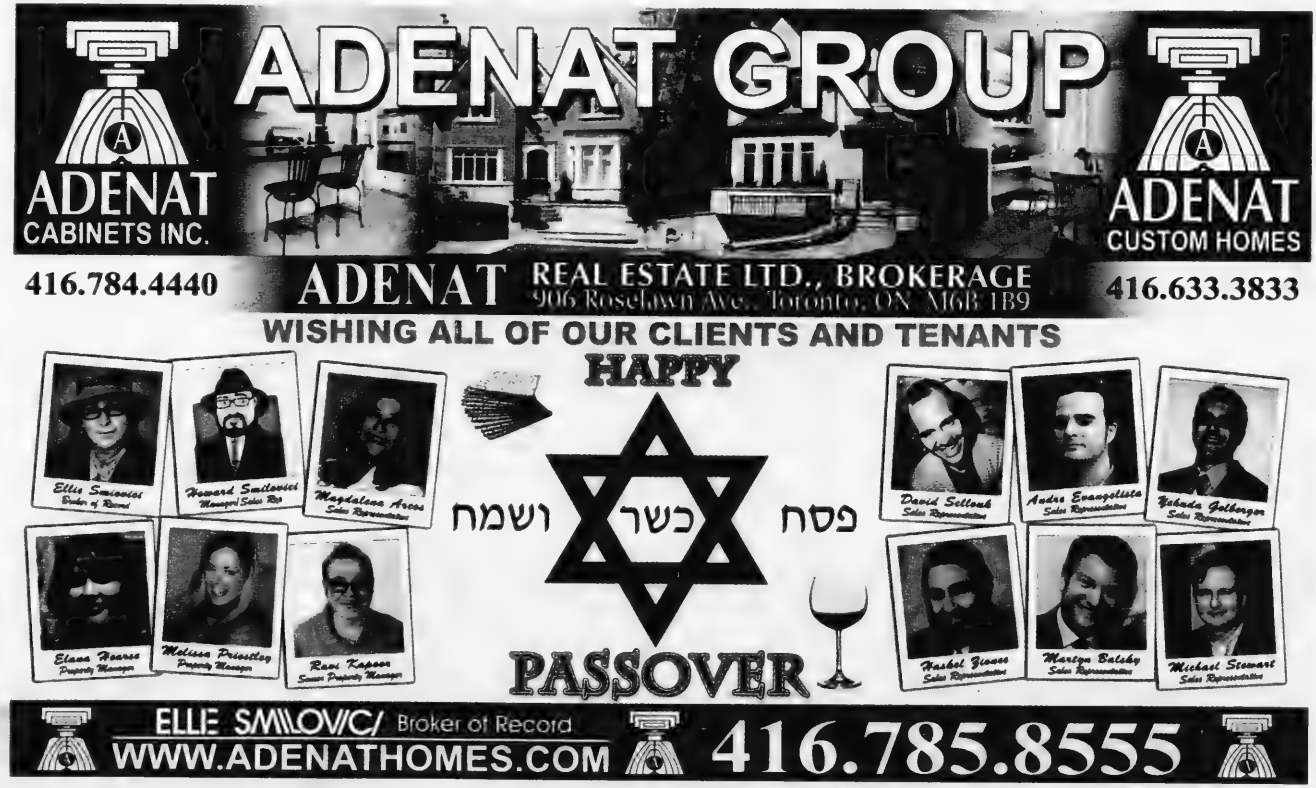
To raise awareness for the petition, she prepared a multimedia display that has been rotating among Toronto shuls. An oil painting of hers, depicting Schalit under the banner, "Help Bring Gilad Shalit Home," is on display at Beth Tzedec.

Marlene Black Rattner's painting of Gilad Schalit is on display at Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto.

The Shabbat HaGadol date – the first Shabbat before Passover – was chosen because of its symbolic nature, Black Rattner said, referring to the theme of the Israelites' freedom.

In a letter to rabbis and cantors that she sent to the Toronto Board of Rabbis, the Toronto Council of Hazzanim and the Vaad Harabonim of Toronto for distribution last week, Black Rattner said she knows that many local synagogues have ongoing awareness campaigns for Schalit and that synagogues have their own schedules and may not be able to participate on the same day. But, she added, "by the same token, I feel that if we as a total community can approach this together here in Toronto it will achieve a greater message."

She said in an interview she hopes the Schalit family, and ultimately Gilad, will know about the effort "so that he can be brought home and made aware that he has not been forgotten."



Damage already done

Judge Richard Goldstone regrets what he wrote in his infamous report for the United Nations about Israel's conduct in its war in Gaza, 2 1/2 years ago against Hamas.

"We know a lot more today about what happened in the Gaza war of 2008-09 than we did when I chaired the fact-finding mission appointed by the UN Human Rights Council that produced what has come to be known as the Goldstone Report. If I had known then what I know now, the Goldstone Report would have been a different document." (My emphasis)

Thus began Goldstone's public disavowal of the judgment he rendered in such harsh and harmful terms 18 months ago at the behest of the absurdly named, sadly surreal and dangerously demonic Human Rights Council of the United Nations.

The volte-face appeared as an op-ed essay last Friday, in the Washington Post entitled Reconsidering the Goldstone Report on Israel and War Crimes.

"Our report found evidence of potential war crimes and possibly crimes against humanity by both Israel and Hamas,"Goldstone wrote. "That the crimes allegedly committed by Hamas were intentional goes without saying – its rockets were purposefully and indiscriminately aimed at civilian targets." (My emphasis)

"The allegations of intentionality by Israel were based on the deaths of and injuries to civilians in situations where our fact-finding mission had no evidence on which to draw any other reasonable conclusion. While the investigations published by the Israeli military and recognized in the UN committee's report have established the validity of some incidents that we investigated in cases involving individual soldiers, they also indicate that civilians were not intentionally targeted as a matter of policy."

Goldstone vindicates Israel's claims that it did not intentionally target civilians.

So scathing were the findings of the original report against the conduct of the Israel Defence Forces, Israel's enemies reaped a cornucopic harvest of punishing anti-Israel propaganda.

The images of the war had been horrendous, as images of war always are. Yet the report "proved" that the images actually attested to a cruel, indifferent Zionist state that had deliberately targeted innocent civilians.

The IDF was brutalized in the minds of so many as a malicious, sadistic fighting force, and the very moral underpinning of Israeli society at large was called into doubt. Israel's democratic institutions, too, were challenged as probably inadequate to give answer to the questions demanded by the report. Not surprisingly, some of Israel's "friends" too, not wishing to appear meak and demurring in the face of Israeli "crimes", also rushed to judgment.

SO WHO IS CONDEMNING IT NOW?
GOLDSTONE

The damage to Israel's standing as a state governed by law and whose citizen army operated under civilian control according to the rule of law, was considerable.

In an exhaustive two-part assessment of the report published in the Jerusalem Post in August 2009, Irwin Cotler, called it "tainted to the core."

Given the wide international purchase of the anti-Israel calumny when it first appeared some 18 months ago, the single venue release by Goldstone of his conscience-stricken postscript last weekend is quite curious and also, it must be added, quite disappointing.

As David Horovitz, the editor of the Jerusalem Post, pointed out on the weekend, "Unfortunately, Goldstone's 'reconsideration' will not garner a thousandth of the publicity or have a thousandth of the impact that his original, baseless accusations against Israel drew. Governments – including, to what should be their abiding shame, self-styled friends of Israel in Europe and beyond who failed to vote against this report – will not rush to deliver the apology they owe our government and our soldiers. They will not rush to recalibrate their policies.

"They will not now rush to issue statements expressing their confidence in Israel's capacity to properly investigate allegations of misdoings by its military, even though the man who had previously given cover for their criticisms has now reversed himself and penned an article endorsing Israel's processes for self-investigation."

The Palestinian Authority and Hamas have reportedly dismissed the judge's addendum .

Even as it braces to deal with a second "freedom flotilla" to Gaza, the impetus for the first of which stemmed in great part from the original Goldstone report, the government of Israel has asked the UN to discard that document, now discredited by its own author.

It can only be hoped that Goldstone will be vociferous and dedicated in the dissemination of his amended point of view.

There is just so much harm he must now try to undo.

Pilot program aimed to 'lift' families out of poverty

Rent bank, scholarships among future projects

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

The Jewish Poverty Action Group (JPAG) has just come to the end of its poverty reduction pilot project aimed at the working poor, but it's continuing to address issues of poverty, said Janis Roth, executive director of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services Toronto (JIAS.)

Comprising representatives from JIAS Toronto, Kehilla Residential Program, Jewish Family & Child and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the group was started six years ago after the 2005 national conference on the poverty of Canadian Jewish families initiated by the Association of Jewish Family and Children's Agencies, Canadian offices.

Roth said the group was so charged up after attending the conference, they decided that something had to be done to change the way families who live in poverty in our community are assisted.

She said that financial assistance is different from a poverty reduction program in that those on financial assistance often have certain life conditions that keep them from rising above their situation. "They will likely require the community's support – funded by federation and managed by JF&CS and JIAS – over long periods of time."

Poverty reduction, she said, looks at the root causes of poverty and tries to implement strategies to lift people out. "We wanted to look at reasons why they were stuck in low-paying jobs or were under-employed, and provide them with opportunities for change."

Eric Kirsh, supervisor of the financial assistance and rehabilitation program at JF&CS, said that about 11 per cent or 21,575 Jews in the Toronto area live in poverty and about 5,000 are defined as working poor.

After obtaining a $200,000 grant from the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, they hired co-ordinator Dalia Margalit-Faircloth to look at 10 families – clients of JIAS or JF&CS – who were transitionally poor as a result of having immigrated or because of health or family circumstances, Kirsh said. "By investing in these families up front, we are breaking the cycle. The long-term implications are huge."

Janis Roth

Roth said that one family in the JPAG program was supporting five people on $36,000 and saw its income rise by 66 per cent after the mother was provided with funds to write a recertification exam.

"Many of the families are reporting an increased sense of pride and hope because the community saw them as important enough to invest in. One woman said she was even able to lose weight because her family was eating better. This points to the ripple effect."

Kirsh said that every family saw an improvement. "Half have been lifted out of poverty and do not rely on assistance, and some are on the route."

Kim Smiley, director of capacity building for community social services for UJA Federation, said that they are looking into other pilot projects, with the help of developer and philanthropist Joseph Lebovic, "a champion for the vulnerable in our community."

She said that one such project, a rent bank, is aimed at people who spend more than 50 per cent of their income on housing. "Some people spend up to 75 per cent of their income on housing, and they are at risk of becoming homeless. Some people have to choose between rent and food. We are looking to reduce this risk factor so that they only spend 40 per cent of their income. This can make a miraculous difference."

Roth said that scholarships for educational and career advancement are also important, "because if you invest in someone up front you are helping them towards self-reliance and setting the stage for their [family's] future."

To that end, JIAS offers the Shindman/ShaRna Foundation scholarship to newcomers who want to continue their post-secondary education, she said, and Lebovic's donation will also go towards vocational training.

JVS, she said, was also instrumental in helping the families in the pilot project find their work path.

Through JPAG, she said, "we've shown that with collaboration, sharing of resources, developing purposeful strategies and, most importantly, putting people first, we can provide opportunities for lifelong changes. JPAG is looking for additional resources and opportunities to expand its poverty reduction efforts on behalf of community members."

Broadcasters' betrayal

The consortium of broadcasters from CBC/Radio Canada, CTV, Global and TVA that has designed and arranged the televised leaders' debate on April 12 (English) and April 14 (French) has once again decided to bar the door to the Green party leader Elizabeth May. Her participation will not be allowed.

Tory Reeb, a spokesman for the consortium, told the Globe and Mail last week that the "decision is final and the decision is unanimous. It will not be reconsidered." May must now turn to the courts of justice to find a place in the leaders' debate.

We urge the consortium to reconsider its decision. The broadcasters justify their exclusion of May because her party held no seats in the recently dissolved Parliament. But in a "first-past-the-post" electoral system such as ours, where pluralities not majorities of votes usually rule the day, their reasoning does not stand up. It is just plain wrong – fundamentally unfair to May and egregiously offensive to Canadians and Canadian voters.

Rather than the harshly absolutist, single criterion that the consortium used to deny May a place at the podium, we suggest they rethink their decision using the following criteria: the credibility of the party, its relevance to the debate of national issues and the formulation of national public policy, and the extent of its popular acceptance among the voters. When applied to these criteria, the results from the last election in 2008, as tabulated by Simon Fraser University, persuasively argue on behalf of May's inclusion in the debates.

The Green party received seven per cent of all votes cast; the Bloc Québécois 10 per cent and the NDP 18 per cent. Nearly one million Canadians – 937,613 – voted for the Green party. The party fields candidates in each federal riding. It is truly a national party. By obvious contrast, the Bloc is decidedly not, fielding candidates in Quebec only. May and the three other national parties campaign the length and breadth of the entire county; Gilles Duceppe, the Bloc leader, campaigns the length and breadth of one province alone. The Green party was the only party of the five to receive more votes in 2008 than in the preceding federal election in 2006. This strongly suggests that Canadians are increasingly serious in weighing the "green" aspects of matters of public policy.

Prohibiting May's participation will likely further alienate already alienated younger voters as well as Canadians still too young to vote but not too young to be interested in "green" issues. It will likely further sour them on involvement in a political system that seems so petty and not relevant to "their" issues and vindicate the apathy that holds them in grip.

Participation strengthens democracy. The broadcasters, it seems, do not agree. By denying May the microphone, they have fallen far below the duty they owe all of us – not just prospective Green party voters – to enhance that participation. They have betrayed their responsibilities. We should tune out these debates.

Women in a minyan

Kol Hakavod to Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl and Beth Tzedec Congregation on their decision to be the first large Conservative synagogue in Toronto to include women in the counting of a minyan ("Women to be counted in Beth Tzedec minyan," March 31). It is more than 50 years since the Jewish law and standards committee of the Rabbinical Council of America decided to permit – but not mandate – the inclusion of women in a minyan and to allow them to have aliyot. Most U.S. Conservative synagogues have followed this practice for many years.

Thirty years ago, a group of members of Adath Israel Congregation in Toronto made an effort to achieve these reforms in their synagogue, and although their efforts were initially welcomed and some progress was being made, they were eventually quashed by the powers that be. A number of these reformers were welcomed into Congregation Darchei Noam, an egalitarian Reconstructionist shul that has grown into a major presence in Toronto Jewish religious life and is now probably the fastest-growing synagogue in Toronto. Its success is due not only to its inclusion of women in all aspects of ritual life, but also to its welcoming of all Jews, without distinction.

It is unfortunate that Beth Tzedec has not decided to allow women to participate in the leading of religious services. Since a service leader is a shaliach tzibur, a representative of those attending a prayer service, I would venture to guess that if those attending a minyan were asked to vote on the matter, a large majority would welcome a woman leading the service.

Another victory for CJC

Canadian Jewish Congress has another victory for Canadian Jews under its belt ("Shoah monument law given royal assent," March 31). Working with student Laura Grosman, CJC convinced the Senate to speed up the royal assent needed to pass a bill ensuring a Holocaust memorial in Canada's capital. This followed the awarding of a plaque of special recognition to Congress by the federal government recognizing its service to Canada and Canadian Jewry. And yet, there are still a number of leaders in our community who continue to be seen as trying to dismantle the organization. Sometimes we are our own worst enemy.

Israeli medical team in Japan

Yair Lootsteen wrote in his column that "Israelis felt great sympathy for Japan and its people. We offered search-and-rescue teams. The Japanese declined" ("Only talking can end the hostility," March 31). However, it was reported on various news sites, including CNN's, that Israel did send trauma specialists and medical care personnel to help after the March 11 earthquake and tsunami in Japan. I found the Lootsteen article to misrepresent Japan, and in turn create more controversy and anger in a situation that does not need it.

Rabbi Stephen Wise

Editor's note: Japan accepted no search-and-rescue aid from any country. However, Israel was and remains the only medical team that arrived in and helped Japan.

The boat to Gaza

Editorial reference is made to the BDS – boycott, divestment and sanctions – intent to challenge Israel's blockade of Gaza by launching the "Canadian boat to Gaza" ("Sanctimony, not integrity," From the editor's desk, March 24). This name is a misnomer.

It is interesting to note that Israel's connection to Gaza goes back to biblical times. From 1948 to 1967, Gaza was ruled by Egypt which at one time was ruled by an Israelite, Joseph, he of "the coat of many colours." Therefore, it would seem most appropriate for the BDS vessel to be called "the boat of many dullards."

Israel needs a pre-emptive diplomatic strike

Ari Shavit
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The writing is on the wall: 2011 is going to be a diplomatic 1973. In September and October, the UN General Assembly will decide whether to establish a Palestinian state in the 1967 borders. The international community will recognize a Palestinian state.

At that moment, every Israeli apartment in Jerusalem's French Hill neighbourhood will become illegal and every military base in the West Bank will be contravening the sovereignty of an independent UN member state. The Palestinians will not be obligated to accept demilitarization or peace with Israel.

The gap between the declared situation and the situation on the ground will inevitably create friction. The conflict will quickly become a popular confrontation. The Palestinians will march on Jerusalem, and Israel will be condemned. A diplomatic siege from without and a civil uprising from within will grip Israel in a stranglehold.

Also in 2011, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu will become Golda Meir and Defence Minister Ehud Barak will become Moshe Dayan. Both will be remembered as leaders who, even though they saw the iceberg, insisted on sailing straight into it. You don't have to be a diplomatic genius to understand that we need a pre-emptive diplomatic strike. You don't have to be a strategic genius to understand that Israel must come out with an initiative that will reshuffle the cards in the game it's about to lose.

However, the diplomatic genius Netanyahu and the strategic genius Barak are standing on the deck and keeping silent. They see the iceberg coming closer, and they're not doing anything. Netanyahu and Barak are still refusing to understand that what held true in the spring of 1973 holds true now: there is no time. History will have no mercy on anyone who doesn't act now. Israel will not forgive anyone who doesn't steal the thunder. Under these blue skies the paralysis is not just irresponsibility; the paralysis is a crime.

When the Middle East is boiling over, it's impossible to end the occupation peacefully. Not even politicians on the left of the political spectrum such as Yossi Sarid and Yossi Beilin can do this. However, nor can politicians on the right such as Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman and Vice Prime Minister Moshe Ya'alon ensure security. When the Middle East is boiling over, there is no possibility of clinging to the status quo. Creative thinking is needed. A realistic Israeli initiative is needed.

The following is an example of such an initiative.

Israel at long last distinguishes between the occupation and peace. As a result, Israel declares that if the Palestinians agree to a complete demilitarization, true mutual recognition, significant border amendments and a total end to the conflict, Israel will end the occupation peacefully. Also, Israel declares that if it emerges that the Palestinians do not accept these basic conditions, it will have to act unilaterally.

In this case, too, the aim will be decisive: an end to the occupation. But in this case, the way to ending the occupation will be long. In the absence of a Palestinian partner for peace, the Israeli withdrawal will have to be gradual and phased. It will entail getting the approval and backing of the international community.

A realistic Israeli initiative would immediately hand over to the Palestinians sizable chunks of the West Bank while evacuating about 20 isolated settlements. In this way, Israel will prove its seriousness and the Palestinians will be challenged. They will be able to establish a state on 70 per cent of the West Bank without ideological concessions they can't yet make. They will be able to advance the process championed by Palestinian Prime Minister Salam Fayyad before they are compelled to make difficult historic decisions.

But this not enough. The Israeli initiative must offer a gradual withdrawal to a separation line in the West Bank in exchange for recognition of that line as an interim border between Israel and Palestine. The separation line must be the border until peace is made.

It is acceptable for our leaders to think of other, different initiatives but it is not acceptable for them to adopt a policy bereft of any initiatives.

Israel needs a diplomatic Iron Dome (anti-rocket and missile safety system) as much as a military one. If Netanyahu and Barak are not capable of giving Israel a diplomatic Iron Dome, they must go.

We will not wait again the way we waited on Oct. 6, 1973.

Israel bids to thwart recognition of Palestinian state

Barak Ravid
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Isaac Molho, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's senior adviser and top negotiator with the Palestinians, made a secret trip to Moscow two weeks ago and met with Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov. The purpose of the visit was to dissuade Russia from supporting the European Union's intention to present a plan next month for the establishment of a Palestinian state within the 1967 borders.

Molho was accompanied on the trip by the Foreign Ministry's legal adviser, Daniel Taub, and spent more than an hour with Lavrov. Taub and Molho also met with the Russian envoy to the Middle East, Sergei Yakovlev, and other senior Russian officials. A senior Israeli official told Ha'aretz that Taub and Molho used the visit "to present new Israeli ideas for re-launching the peace process with the Palestinians."

The visit came just two weeks before the foreign ministers of the Quartet – the United States, Russia, the European Union and the United Nations – were to meet. France, Germany and the United Kingdom are pushing for announcing a new international peace initiative. The principles of the initiative known so far include setting up two states on the basis of the 1967 borders with territorial swaps; a fair, realistic and agreed-upon solution to the predicament of the Palestinian refugees; Jerusalem as a capital for both states and security arrangements that would protect Israel but not infringe on Palestinian sovereignty.

U.K. Foreign Secretary William Hague said that interim arrangements alone cannot end the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, and progress must be made in the peace process before September. He also called on the United States and the rest of the Quartet to present clear principles for the process, based on the new initiative, as soon as possible.

The European initiative is strongly supported by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, who is lobbying all members of the Quartet to have it officially endorsed in the upcoming meeting. However, Abbas has yet to confirm whether he will return to the negotiating table if the lobbying succeeds.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu met two weeks ago in Russia with Russian Prime Minister Vladimir Putin. Last week, Netanyahu sent an emissary to meet with Russian officials on what was described as a secret mission. [Avi Ohayon/GPO photo]

The U.S. administration has yet to comment on the initiative, but it has already won the support of the UN and, it would seem, Russia.

Netanyahu had planned to dispatch Molho to a round of talks in London, Paris, Berlin and Brussels to persuade the Europeans to postpone the initiative's launch. That trip was cancelled at the last moment, after the prime minister understood Molho was unlikely to persuade the European governments to withdraw from the plan without new diplomatic statements on the peace process coming from Israel itself.

Molho's Moscow trip appears to indicate that Netanyahu thought the Russians would prove more attentive to Israel's objections, and could be persuaded to oppose or at least stall the move.

The results of Molho's mission remain to be seen, but Lavrov's statements during the meeting may mean Russia will be reluctant to block the initiative. Lavrov told Molho that continued efforts to find a way out of the impasse were important, and that trust between Israel and the Palestinians needed to be restored. Quartet envoys were expected to visit Israel this week to prepare the foreign ministers' summit. They were to meet Molho and the Palestinian negotiators. Netanyahu was expected to meet German Chancellor Angela Merkel this week in Berlin.

In related developments, French Foreign Minister Alain Juppe said recently that EU recognition of a Palestinian state could be a "possibility that should be kept in mind," according to AFP.

"There's no point recognizing the Palestinian state on our own. It must be done together," AFP quoted Juppe as saying about recognition by EU countries. "Personally we're not there yet, I think that it's a possibility that should be kept in mind," he said.

As a response to the deadlock in peace negotiations between Israel and the PA, a number of countries have started upgrading the diplomatic status of Palestinian representatives in their countries, Denmark being the latest one to do so by upgrading the PA from general delegation to mission.

Britain's Foreign Office said it would upgrade the status of the Palestinian representation in London as an "administrative step." In recent months, France, Spain, Portugal, Ireland, the United States and other countries have announced similar upgrades to PA diplomatic delegations.

Two holidays, two messages of redemption

Jean M. Gerber

in Vancouver

The period between Purim and Passover is an interesting psychological time. We just had a wonderful party, and suddenly we're wandering around the house deciding how to arrange the Passover dishes, which must crowd onto the few shelves set aside for them.

Purim was fun. We put on silly wigs, dressed up like Lady Gaga and sashayed around the synagogue while children dressed as a princess/queen Esther/ Cinderella or Spiderman/Darth Vader/ Lord Voldemort (oooh, mustn't say his name.)

Passover, in the lead-up, is hard work.

Kosher stores entice you with new products, most of which you'd never eat during the year – yet the thought of Passover makes you hungry, as if one breadless, eight-day week was similar to the famine in Canaan that drove the Israelites down to Egypt in the first place.

I feel that my time will be taken up with cleaning and cooking – not that my wonderful husband doesn't help, but I have an established routine and end up giving orders like a drill sergeant.

It seems to leave little time to reflect on the juxtaposition of these two holidays, Purim and Pesach. Each reverberates with the themes of deliverance, redemption and renewal, with the situation of Jewish communities caught between an enemy whose sole intent is to bury us and a tenuous promise of rescue.

I don't mean to compare the hilarity of Purim with the solemnity of Passover, or maybe I should say the more sober parts of Passover, since there's plenty of happiness around our seder table.

In the Purim tale (I don't want to debate its historicity here, let's just go with the story), the Jewish community needs no urging to rally around Mordechai and the edict of the threatened queen. "Fast and pray for me," she demands, and everyone immediately does just that.

This in a country where Jews are, by implication, well regarded and assimilated.

In fact, they did what the Jews of Egypt, according to the midrash, never did: they changed their names and their clothes, so that no one imagined that Esther-Ishtar was a Jewess, and no one but Haman cared that Mordechai-Marduk is a Jew.

The city of Shushan is perplexed – of course. What's the reason behind this sudden exercise against their Jewish neighbours? They're good citizens of Persia, just like everyone else!

For a community seemingly so assimilated, the Jews take no time whatsoever to realize their dangerous position. No great thunderbolt needs to sound. They get the message loud and clear.

And the heroine comes through, unmasking Haman and his evil plan, and winning the lumpen king over. Redemption and renewal, with light, joy and gladness all around (except for the fallen enemies).

In The Jewish Way, Rabbi Irving Greenberg calls Purim the ultimate Diaspora holiday, one that gives Jews living outside the land of Israel hope in redemption. It's the holiday that celebrates the salvation of a community outside the Promised Land and stands in for all the dangers through which, over the centuries, Diaspora Jewish communities have had to pass. Rabbi Greenberg calls it "the holiday for the post-Holocaust world."

Purim is the holiday when Jews save themselves. Passover is when they need a miracle. Pesach is the epitome of the promise of redemption.

The Israelites weren't an easy crowd to redeem. The initial message of Moses and Aaron falls flat. Not only is Pharaoh scornful – the Israelites themselves resent and resist efforts to rouse them from their torpor. We can imagine them saying to themselves, "Well, it can only get worse – and here comes this dreamer to tell us there is a way out if we just wait for it. Fat chance!"

I reflect for a moment on the trajectory of redemptive moments in our collective history. At times we have been comfortable in our circumstances, at times totally alone and at risk. Sometimes we have had a rescuer, sometimes we were thrust into the kingdom of night.

Two holidays, both in their own ways bringing a message of redemption. At Purim, we celebrate with the community in sacred carnival. God has turned us loose to find our own salvation. At Pesach, we surround ourselves with family and friends, assuring each other through recognition of God's mighty hand and outstretched arm that hope is still alive.

Asenath Barazani: a history lesson

Norma Baumel Joseph

in Montreal

I met the descendants of Asenath Barazani in synagogue one Sabbath, and I was elated. They, too, were excited. From both vantage points, we were amazed to know of each other's interest in this obscure 16th-century woman. Perhaps our mutual awareness of her existence was a sign that she's not so obscure.

The family knew lovely stories of her magical talents. They weren't aware of scholarly attention or academic publications.

Let me introduce you to Asenath.

She was the daughter of a great rabbi in Kurdistan from the second half of the 16th century. Rabbi Samuel ha-Levi had no sons. He taught this daughter Bible, Talmud and more. She helped him run his yeshiva in Amadiya, Kurdistan. When she married Rabbi Yaacov ben Yehudah Mizrahi, her father made one demand. Fortunately, we have her own words explaining some of the transactions that rendered her life extraordinary. In a letter, she proclaimed that her father "made my husband swear that he would not make me perform work."

The deal was that Asenath wouldn't be obligated, as most Jewish wives were, to perform household chores. Rather, her father insisted, and her husband agreed, that she was to spend hours each day studying Torah. Amazing! What would a modern ketubah look like with such clauses? Asenath taught in her father's yeshiva and later in her husband's yeshiva in Mosul. When her husband died, Asenath took over his role as head of the yeshiva, a rosh yeshiva. We have letters in which she writes as head of the school soliciting funds to help the yeshiva.

What is so amazing? Here is an example of an extremely well-educated woman. To be sure, others came before her, such as Bruriah, Rashi's daughters, Miriam Benayah the Yemenite scribe, Deborah Ascarelli, Hava Bachrach, Bat Halevi, Sarah Copia Sullam, Fioretta. (There are many more. If you don't know them, follow Hillel's advice: go out and learn.) All these women were learned, some even teachers, but Asenath was unusual.

With her example before us we can see that history is not as progressive as we might like to think. Certainly in terms of women's lives, much has improved. Particularly in the specifics of Jewish women's lives, such as participation in communal structures and rituals, the patterns have usually become more inclusive. But not always and not in every way.

There's much to learn from history and many lessons from lives lived in the past. Thus, Asenath was a rosh yeshiva for boys. Let that sink in. Additionally, we need to consider her title. According to records, she was called a tannit, the female equivalent of tanna, the title given to a sage who discussed the Mishnah. In other words, the Jews of Kurdistan used this distinguished title when referring to her father as well as to her. They also accepted her in a male role and didn't seem to object to her being a teacher in a male environment. Finally, no one objected to her as leader or asked her to take a lesser title.

All of which has happened with women's leadership in our modern period. Asenath Barazani stands out as a model to us in the 21st century: a Jewish woman functioning in a male world using all her God-given talents as a leader, with Torah knowledge and wisdom and without controversy. She may not have had all the financial success she needed to keep the institution afloat, but she had the respect and following a leader needs.

Let me be clear about my point: when it comes to memories of her great skills, we hear a different trope. The stories told about her focus on magical moments in her life, times when she supposedly would call upon special powers to stop thieves or discern evil. As with many learned women in the past, legends abound, and they reflect a reverence of the mystical rather than the scholarly. Understanding that is part of our complex gendered disequilibria.

Additionally, I'm not confronting the complex legal issues, nuances of public policy, pressures of unity without uniformity, and the divisiveness of communal diversity that inhere in the subject of female rabbis.

I am pointing to her presence in our past and her potent example for understanding our rich heritage.

Israel greets Arab uprisings with ambivalence

With peaceful popular uprisings and rumbles of discontent convulsing the Arab world, Israel is hopeful yet apprehensive about what lies ahead. The unrest, spearheaded by frustrated youths fed up with dictatorship and galvanized by social media, already has had a profound effect. Supposedly impregnable authoritarian regimes in Tunisia and Egypt have been toppled. Revolts have shaken Yemen, Bahrain, Jordan and Syria. Stirrings of dissension have bubbled up in Saudi Arabia. In the wake of a revolt in Libya, a full-blown civil war has erupted, and Libya is now subject to a United Nations no-fly zone and bombing raids by the United States and its NATO allies.

The protesters want to shatter the stultifying status quo – which has nurtured dictatorship and stifled democracy and progress – and to root out the malaise of endemic corruption.

Weary of totalitarianism and economic stagnation, Arabs from the Mediterranean Sea to the Gulf of Aden have awakened to challenge entrenched, self-serving elites that have enriched themselves at the expense of the masses. The historic upheavals echo the 1848 revolutions in Europe and signify an important break with the past. Defiant of authority, Arabs no longer fear the repressive aura and intimidating security apparatus of the states that have oppressed them.

Clearly, change is in the air, but the situation remains fluid, with the endgame uncertain because some Arab regimes have chosen to fight back, regardless of the cost in lives. In Tunisia and Egypt, the respective presidents, Zine el-Abidine Ben Ali and Hosni Mubarak, were swept away in a matter of weeks as the will of the people triumphed in unprecedented populistic revolutions.

But in both countries, the army, an integral component of the old regime by virtue of its previous toleration of autocracy, is still very much in charge. In Bahrain, the mainly Shiite protest movement was summarily crushed, underscoring the maxim that the pendulum can swing either way and that reactionary forces can retaliate to maintain the status quo ante.

Watching these developments from afar, Israel has monitored them with ambivalence. As Israeli President Shimon Peres suggested last week, the current uprisings can produce better neighbours for Israel if they lead to democracy and prosperity in Arab states. But democracy is a two-edged sword, as Israel has discovered.

Free and fair elections in 2006 enabled Hamas – an organization committed to Israel's destruction – to gain a deeper foothold in the Gaza Strip.

Sheldon Kirshner

in Toronto

The armed forces in post-Mubarak Egypt have promised to uphold the 1979 peace treaty, a cornerstone of Israel's security doctrine. But an Egyptian opposition leader, Ayman Nour, has said that the accord should be renegotiated.

Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak, meanwhile, has disclosed that his Egyptian counterpart, Gen. Mohammed Hussein Tantawi, told him that voters in forthcoming elections may favour candidates who are hostile to Israel.

During the three-decade Mubarak era, Egyptian politicians, intellectuals and journalists regularly demonized Israel. However, Mubarak, no lover of Zion, scrupulously respected the peace treaty and kept Hamas in check by laying siege to Gaza.

Since he provided stability for Israel on its southern border, Israelis generally viewed his demise with angst. Now that he is gone, Israel is concerned that a new Egyptian government, chosen in democratic elections, may alter Mubarak's policies.

Israeli strategists also worry about the ripple effects that the Arab uprisings may have on Israel's relationship with Jordan, the second Arab country after Egypt to have signed a peace treaty with Israel. If the Hashemite monarchy falls, a remote possibility at this moment, Israel's assumptions about its non-belligerent Arab neighbour would have to be drastically revised.

The Palestinians in the West Bank pose problems as well. Since 1987, they have launched two violent intifadahs in an attempt to achieve statehood and sovereignty. The Palestinians, having drawn lessons from the non-violent revolutions in Tunisia and Egypt, may also decide to choose the path of non-violence. Given the international climate, Israel would be hard-pressed to squelch a peaceful Palestinian campaign for statehood.

Barak, having read the political tea leaves, said recently that Israel could be buffeted by a diplomatic tsunami should talks with the Palestinian Authority not be resumed. As he ominously put it, "It's a mistake not to notice this tsunami. Israel's delegitimization is in sight ... It is a very dangerous situation, one that requires action."

Taking heed of Barak's comment, U.S. Defence Secretary Robert Gates, on a visit to Israel last month, linked the ongoing Arab rebellions with the impasse in the peace process, reportedly telling Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu that Israelis have "a very deep strategic interest in getting out in front of the wave of populism that's sweeping the region." In Gates' view, Israel should be proactive by restarting direct negotiations with the Palestinian Authority.

The turmoil, having transformed politics in the Middle East, has forced Arab rulers to pay far more attention to the basic needs and demands of their citizens.

Egypt is a good case in point.

In a referendum sanctioned by the army, Egyptians voted for nine constitutional amendments in advance of legislative and presidential elections later this year. In the meantime, the army has eased rules on the formation of political parties.

The army has pledged to lift the hated emergency law, but no date has been announced. Nor can it be divined what role the Muslim Brotherhood, the best organized political and social movement in Egypt, will eventually play.

King Abdullah II of Jordan has reacted to calls for reforms by approving cosmetic adjustments. But it remains to be seen whether he is prepared to overhaul the system and share power with the toothless parliament.

Syrian President Bashar Assad

President Bashar Assad of Syria, a self-styled reformer whose forces have killed more than 60 demonstrators, has made no concessions apart from dismissing his docile cabinet and allowing his spokesmen to deliver nebulous speeches about pending reform. In a bombastic speech on March 30, he condescendingly called the protesters dupes, claimed that foreigners aligned with Israel are behind the rioting and completely ignored demands to abolish the nearly five decade old emergency law that ensures the Baath party's monopoly on power.

In Bahrain, King Hamad bin Isa al-Khalifa declared martial law and chased demonstrators away after calling in 2,000 troops from neighbouring countries and Saudi Arabia (which has tolerated no dissent within its borders). In Yemen, the embattled president, Ali Abdullah Saleh, has refused to leave his post, despite the defection of a senior army commander and numerous officials and ambassadors. In Libya, Moammar Gadhafi's refusal to implement meaningful reforms has triggered a civil war that could yet end with foreign troops on the ground and Libya's partition or Gadhafi's death.

Change is afoot in the Middle East, but some Arab leaders are resisting it.

Canadians urged not to forget about Darfur

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Canadians should remember that millions of people in Darfur are still suffering, said panellists speaking about the ongoing conflict in that region of Sudan.

In attracting only about 15 people, the March 29 panel discussion, titled "Referendum, Revolutions, Genocide: A Turning Point for Darfur," emphasized the goal of bringing the crisis in Darfur back into the media limelight.

"The fighting is still happening. The government is still attacking villages and different areas," said Mahjob Abdalla, the Darfur Diaspora Association director.

The panel, organized by the Holy Blossom Temple's social action committee and moderated by Ben Fine, the founder of Students Taking Action Now: Darfur (STAND) Canada, also included Tag Elkhazin, an international consultant on conflict analysis in Darfur for the SubSahara Centre, and Kyle Matthews, the lead researcher at the Montreal Institute for Genocide and Human Rights Studies at Concordia University.

"In the last two years or so, Darfur has completely come out of the international community's mind," said Abdalla, who still has family living in Sudan.

Since 2003, Darfur has been the site of mass murder, rape, starvation and displacement. In an attempt to exert control over a country divided by religious and ethnic backgrounds, the pro-government Arab militia has murdered more than 400,000 and displaced about 2.5 million more in refugee camps where the threat of starvation and disease are constant.

Abdalla said Darfuris aren't even safe in refugee camps, which are subject to violent raids.

He added that even the aid that's distributed to refugees by advocacy groups is harming them.

"My niece said most of the aid materials that they get are all expired. She read the label of cooking oil and it expired in 2001... Another woman told her, 'Every time that I eat this specific oil, I get stomach problems.'"

Elkhazin agreed that although it's been eight years since the genocide began, the situation on the ground is still dire.

He said that late last month, four women who were moving from one refugee camp to another near El Fasher were spotted by militiamen walking along a road.

"They were arrested, they were tied to trees, they were severely beaten and repeatedly raped," Elkhazin said. "The situation and the atrocities are still happening. The problem is that there is no political will [to stop it]."

He said there are about 22,000 peacekeepers in the region. That translates to about one peacekeeper per 26 square miles.

"There is no way you can actually keep the peace with that many. But the government of Sudan has refused the participation of seasoned, experienced peacekeepers."

Abdalla said his only wish is that the war-torn regions come under the protection of the United Nations, because "under the current situation, there is no solution that I can see."

He added that he wished international governments had intervened in Darfur as quickly as they did in Libya, where a no-fly zone was enforced last month to protect civilians from the violence of Libyan leader Moammar Gadhafi.

"Years ago, people were pushing for a no-fly zone in Darfur because the government in Sudan was [dropping] and continues to drop rockets on people," Fine said.

"Fast forward six years and the Libyan government attacked its own people, and within hours, the international community, including Canadian fighter jets, are now bombing Libya."

During the question and answer period, a Sudanese immigrant expressed her anger that Darfuris didn't get the same protection.

"Darfuris are being slaughtered right now while we are in this room and [U.S. President Barack Obama] knows that. And Canada never did anything. I'm a proud [Canadian]. I've got my citizenship and this year I'm going to vote, and I will vote for the party that will work there," she said.

Another Sudanese audience member said the only people who can help end the crisis in Darfur is the Jewish community.

"Not because they are Jews, but because Jewish people have experience. They feel the injustice, they feel the pain, they have felt the killing before."

Matthews, co-author of Mobilizing the Will to Intervene: Leadership and Action to Prevent Mass Atrocities, said that "in order to prevent future genocides from taking place... we have to mobilize international governments."

Matthews said that last year, Obama's administration implemented two of the book's recommendations that deal with taking a proactive approach to preventing genocide and he hopes that other countries, including Canada, will follow suit.

Fine said the best way to push Canadian politicians into action is to "pick up the phone or knock on the door of a candidate or member of Parliament and simply say that you care about what is happening in the Sudan."

Israel urged to present peace plan

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

A former Israeli cabinet minister has called on Israel to immediately unveil a peace plan based on a two-state solution.

With the Palestinian Authority expected to take its case for statehood to the United Nations in September, Israel should be proactive, said Ami Ayalon, speaking at Beth Tzedec Congregation last week.

Ayalon, a minister without portfolio in Ehud Olmert's coalition government and a Labor party member of parliament until 2009, said that since the Palestinians will likely win global support for statehood and be perceived as freedom fighters, Israel would be wise to pre-empt them by presenting its own parameters for peace.

'We have to define where we want to go'

"We have to define where we want to go," said Ayalon, a former commander-in-chief of the Israeli navy, and director of the Shin Bet, Israel's internal security service, after Yitzhak Rabin's assassination in 1995.

Israel's strategy should be driven by demographics and based on preserving its current status as a Jewish democratic state and permitting the Palestinians to form a demilitarized state with eastern Jerusalem as its capital, noted Ayalon, the newly-appointed chair of Haifa University's executive committee.

A one-state solution, he warned, would imperil Israel's existence.

To maintain its character as a Jewish democratic state, Israel should be ready to withdraw to the pre-1967 borders and trade territory with the Palestinians in land swaps.

Under his proposal, Arab refugees would return to a Palestinian state rather than Israel, and Jewish settlers who leave their homes in the West Bank would receive immediate compensation. He estimated that 20 to 25 per cent of the settlers would seriously consider accepting such an offer.

Calling the settlers "pioneers" who have fought for Israel, Ayalon said they must be "brought home."

Before a formal peace treaty is signed and sealed, the Israeli army should be stationed in the West Bank, and settlement construction on the eastern side of the separation fence should be completely frozen, he said.

An agreement would be guaranteed by the international community, he noted.

Ami Ayalon

Ayalon's concept of peace resembles The People's Initiative, launched in June 2003 by Ayalon and Palestinian academic Sari Nusseibeh.

According to Ayalon, 450,000 Israelis and Palestinians have endorsed it with their signatures.

"From a security point of view, we wouldn't be taking any risks," he said of his proposal. "I believe most Israelis would accept it."

Asked in a question-and-answer session whether Israel has a leader who would subscribe to his tenets, he replied, "I believe in the power of the people. Every politician, no matter where he comes from, has to respond to the voice of the people and react to the international community. I believe the Israeli people understand the reality of what is in front of us."

In a reference to the current popular uprisings in the Arab world, Ayalon chided Israeli intelligence agencies for having failed to anticipate them. "We couldn't feel them coming. We knew nothing about it."

But if Israeli analysts had read Arab Facebook pages, they would not have been taken by surprise, he observed.

Peering into the future, Ayalon predicted that radical movements and ideas would percolate to the surface in the region.

Ayalon does not expect Egypt to play a role in regional politics following the ouster of its president, Hosni Mubarak. "Egypt will be concerned mostly with domestic issues."

As a result of the upheavals, he speculated, Turkey and Iran will compete for dominance in the Middle East.

With Iran's hegemonic ambitions in mind, he urged Israel to repair its tarnished relationship with Turkey and form a new regional alliance to counter Iran.

Ayalon suggested that an alliance like this cannot be established unless Israel lowers Arab-Israeli tensions.

Ayalon's appearance was sponsored by the Canadian Friends of Haifa University.

Senior spreads word on 'buying' cemetery plots

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Ruth Goldsmith, 81, vice-president, communications, of the Association of Jewish Seniors, is trying to spread the word about an emotional topic – cemetery plots.

Ruth Goldsmith

A widow for nine years who recently moved into a retirement home, Goldsmith, a native of London, England, said that many women in her generation don't realize that when they purchased a cemetery plot from their synagogue, they were only buying the right to a plot.

"They are only entitled to that plot as long, as they are a paid-up member of the synagogue," she said.

This particularly affects those who want to be buried alongside their late husband, she said. "Synagogue fees have risen considerably in recent years, making it prohibitive for many families to remain members, especially retired seniors.

"Unfortunately, most husbands die before their wives and leave the widows alone to bear these costs. Even when paying a single membership, synagogue fees can become a major financial burden to widows on a fixed income."

In her own case, she said, she and her husband, Ernest, joined Shaarei Tefillah Congregation when they bought a house nearby about 45 years ago. "We were recent immigrants – they met in England after he left Germany in 1937 – and we became very involved in the synagogue. It became the centre of our social life."

About 15 or 20 years ago, she said, the cemetery chair at the synagogue approached them and said the synagogue was running out of plots. "We purchased two adjacent plots at Bathurst Lawn Cemetery, and we got a receipt. We didn't realize at the time, though, that we had only purchased the right to a plot."

She used her husband's plot when he died, she said, "and I assumed that I would eventually be next to him. It is unthinkable not to be with my husband."

As she aged however, she decided to move to a retirement home in order to be near her children and grandchildren. "I was no longer walking distance to the synagogue, and it was not feasible for me to remain a member. I was shocked to discover, though, that if I left Shaarei Tefillah, I was no longer entitled to a plot."

She stressed that she does not blame the current cemetery chairs, because they "inherited" this situation. "This policy was established years ago, and it is the same in most synagogues of every denomination. It is not at all illegal. It is just misleading."

Sy Baltman, cemetery chair at Shaarei Tefillah, confirmed that in order to be entitled to a plot, the deceased must have been a paid up member in good standing. "Members do not purchase plots. They are entitled to one as allocated by the cemetery committee."

Goldsmith said Baltman was sympathetic to her situation, and because of her history with the shul, allowed her to purchase the plot next to her husband's for $5,200. "That is a lot of money for me, but I had no choice. It is imperative that I be with my husband."

Now she owns her own plot, she said, "but I want to warn everyone to check with their synagogue. Some do sell them outright, and some don't."

The association recently held a meeting to discuss the issue, she said. "Part of our mandate is to keep seniors informed."

Joy – the essential ingredient

Rabbi Uri Kaufman

The night of the Pesach seder is the quintessential chinuch – teaching moment – when Jews around the world recount the story of our birth as a nation and the special role HaShem gave us to play in human history.

As we read in the Haggadah, the story had an auspicious beginning – God Himself came into the Egyptian exile, suspended the laws of nature and history, performed miracle upon miracle, redeemed his beloved people from bondage and slavery and made them His nation.

On this night, we transmit this narrative to our children, fulfilling the Torah's commandment: "And you shall tell this story to your son on this day."

The essence of the night provides examples of cutting edge educational pedagogy.

The Talmud states that we give treats to the very young children at the beginning of the seder to maintain their interest and increase their excitement (a good anticipatory strategy that is impactful to begin a lesson).

And there is no lack of active participation. Teaching in the format of questions and answers is, according to the Maharal of Prague, the key to acquiring new information. Only when you are questioning and puzzled will you be able to internalize the answers. For those familiar with more recent educational trends, the different answers given to the four sons qualifies as a perfect Differential Instruction lesson. We do this every year to ensure that our children will be imbued with Jewish values and Jewish identity.

There is, however, a more critical ingredient that is needed, both on Pesach during the seder and all year, to help ensure that the lessons of our tradition take seed in our young, and that ultimately we are successful in raising committed and inspired Jews. This final pedagogical element is joy. Our children must consistently see in our words and, more importantly, in our deeds, simchah shel mitzvah, the excitement and joy in being Jewish and living our lives according to the Torah's values and direction.

Rabbi Moshe Feinstein, a great Jewish leader of the past century, was asked why so many Jews who came to America and, in spite of great hardship, remained faithful to their Jewish observance, were unable to raise their children as Orthodox Jews.

Rav Moshe explained that those Jews who remained true to Orthodox Sabbath observance did so at great personal sacrifice, often with a complaint about their lot, but if there is no joy in a home around practising Judaism, observance is not easily transmitted to the next generation.

Only sharing joy in living a Jewish life will guarantee success with children. We emphasize the great historical tragedies in our teachings, neglecting the message of the specialness of our people and the personal fulfilment and happiness of living with a commitment to Torah values.

A local educator once opened a talk on "Success in Jewish Education" saying in real estate there are three conditions for property value – location, location, location. So, too, in Jewish education, there are three requirements for success with our children – joy, joy and more joy.

Integrity matters, in business and politics

Technological advances are rapidly changing the nature of almost everything we do. Many of the careers that our children will pursue have yet to be invented. The end results of the political rumblings of the Arab world are impossible to discern, adding additional layers of uncertainty to the world of tomorrow.

Our sages well understood the folly of predicting the future by asserting that the only "prophets" of today are children and fools. Yet there is one thing that never changes: human nature. Almost equally unchanging is the inability of man to learn from past mistakes, dooming us to repeat them over and over. Thus it is old news to read, once again, of a warning – this time from the federal Office of Superintendent of Financial Institutions – that financial institutions are engaging in risk at "pre-recession levels." It's precisely this uncontrolled risk that led to the last recession and will undoubtedly lead to the next.

Left to our own devices, nothing stands in the way of seeking more money now. As Chuck Prince, former CEO of Citigroup, said in July 2007, just prior the near financial meltdown, "When the music stops, in terms of liquidity, things will be complicated. But as long as the music is playing, you've got to get up and dance. We're still dancing." It should surprise no one that Citigroup shares later fell by more than 95 per cent, while Prince left the bank, but not before receiving millions of dollars.

It takes a great moral leader to demand that we stop the music

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

while the profits are still rolling in.

It's precisely when things are going well that government regulators must ensure that the music is playing at the right speed. Initiatives such as "too big to fail," in which governments guarantee to prevent the bankruptcy of key economic players, even were they to have economic benefit – something that's highly debatable – are morally problematic.

Allowing others to pay for someone else's mistakes undermines the most basic principles of moral behaviour. In a society in which people too often look to blame others for their own failures, it's even more imperative that we model lessons of personal responsibility.

When one combines the uncertainty of the future with the consistency of human nature, it's apparent that the key characteristic we should be demanding of those who seek political office is moral integrity. Unfortunately, there is little evidence that such motivates many politicians, nor will it unless we demand it. Perhaps even more so than in corporate boardrooms, in the area of political manoeuvring, decisions are based on what's best for the present, and, all too often, little regard is given to the implications years down the road.

However, as a Jewish Canadian, I am most proud that in one area at least, our government has taken the morally proper path, despite the political fallout. The moral leadership that our prime minister has shown in supporting Israel is a model of principled leadership. While it's not my place to endorse a specific candidate, I do think that we need to look not only at policies, but more importantly at the people that we have the privilege and obligation of electing to serve us.

Medieval rabbis differed about women

Anyone who teaches pre-modern Jewish texts is often forced to confront the large gap between attitudes to women in those texts and our current values.

I often remind my students that it is unreasonable to expect to find egalitarianism before the 20th century. I suggest that they hold their noses, as it would be narrow and ignorant to refrain from reading old texts from any culture just because they fall short of our understandings of race, freedom of speech, sexual standards, and a host of other topics.

But a new book by one of the foremost living scholars of medieval Judaism, Prof. Avraham Grossman of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, is making me rethink my approach. His 600-page Hebrew book, Vehu yimshol bakh? (And He Shall Rule Over You?), is a careful study of the attitudes toward women of 21 medieval Jewish rabbis and scholars (all male). Grossman proves that medieval Jewish scholars had a variety of views about the status of women; apparently, not all medieval rabbis were benighted sexists.

The book does contain some very troubling lines about women, penned by leading medieval Jewish thinkers. Don Isaac Abarbanel (1437-1508) wrote that only men, not women, were created in the image of God. The works of Joseph ibn Kaspi (circa 1280-circa 1340) are filled with misogynistic comments. He discouraged all forms of contact between men and women and believed that the sexual act belonged in the same category as urination and defecation – a necessary evil that should fill men with embarrassment. Levi ben Gershon (Gersonides; 1288-1344) wrote explicitly that women were inferior to men and were here on Earth to serve men. Curiously, Gersonides noted that this was not the case in any other species. In other mammals, for example, he saw no intrinsic distinctions between the female and the male. But he argued that humans were different.

As disturbing as these texts are, Grossman notes a pattern: generally the most sexist attitudes were found in the writings of those Jewish thinkers, like the three rabbis mentioned in the previous paragraph, who were most strongly influenced by medieval secular philosophy. Philosophers of all religions in that period who followed in the footsteps of the Greek philosophers taught, like the Greeks, that women were incapable of doing philosophy – allegedly the pinnacle of human intellectual achievement – and hence they were intrinsically inferior to men.

Grossman shows that many of the medieval rabbis who had no contact with philosophy tended to be more woman-friendly. Rashi (1040-1105) showed great sensitivity to the rights of women in his writings (perhaps, in part, because he had only daughters?). He seems to have had a romantic side – he explained that a number of talmudic laws were designed to increase the love between husbands and wives. Grossman carefully analyzes a responsum written by Rashi in which he strongly chastised a man who wanted to divorce his wife because of a physical blemish. Rashi urged the man to invest as much energy into learning to love his wife as he was investing in trying to make the case for divorce.

Views & Reviews

Martin Lockshin

Another great Ashkenazi rabbi, Meir of Rotenberg (1215-1293), wrote passionately against domestic violence, arguing that wife beating was the worst imaginable form of assault: "God forbid that any Jewish man should do this! Anyone who assaults his wife should be excommunicated, beaten and punished any way that he can be punished. If he is a repeat offender, his hand should be chopped off."

According to Grossman, Moses Maimonides (1138-1205) is an exception to the association of misogyny with interest in Greek philosophy. Despite Maimonides' commitment to philosophy, Grossman regards him as relatively compassionate and concerned about the plight of women. He was the strongest spokesman in medieval Jewish legal literature for the opinion that a Jewish woman could demand a divorce if she claimed in a rabbinical court that she found her husband disgusting. Maimonides wrote that in such a case a rabbinical court should compel the husband to give his wife a religious divorce immediately. A wife "is not to be seen as a captive who is forced to have intercourse with someone whom she hates" (Mishneh Torah, Ishshut 14:8). For a while this position was standard Jewish law in Spain (Maimonides' birthplace) and a few other countries.

Sadly, Maimonides' position on this subject was later overturned. Grossman paints an uncomplimentary picture of Rabbenu Asher ben Yehiel (1250-1327) who moved from Germany to Spain and discovered that that community was following Maimonides' ruling.

Rabbenu Asher wrote: "I am thoroughly amazed by what Maimonides wrote that if the wife says she finds her husband disgusting and she is unable to have intercourse with him, we force him to divorce her immediately, as she is not a captive who has to have intercourse with someone whom she hates. What kind of reason is that for forcing a man to grant a divorce...? Let her not have intercourse with her husband and let her stay a living widow all of her life!... If this woman is following her whims and has her eye on some other man whom she prefers to the husband of her youth, should we help her fulfil her desires and force the man who loves her to divorce her? God forbid that any rabbinic judge should rule this way! (Teshuvot ha-Rosh, 43:8)

In another part of that same ruling, Rabbenu Asher wrote that 14th century women are too arrogant. If these women learn that they have the power to free themselves from marriage, "no Jewish woman would remain with her husband; she would find a more attractive man and rebel against her husband (by demanding a divorce)." (To the best of my knowledge, Rabbenu Asher never addressed the fact that the law provided the opportunity for men to divorce their wives and abandon the "wives of their youth," when they were more attracted to another woman.)

While the pro-women views of rabbis like Rashi in this book will please many modern Jews, any Jew loyal to Halachah will be troubled by Grossman's implicit claim that the misogynistic views of some of these rabbis led to the establishment of a legal system that continues to disadvantage women in our day. A lesson that we can all learn is that it is crucial to train a new generation of rabbis who respect women's rights, desires and aspirations, and who do not dismiss contemporary women as "arrogant."

Israeli doctor talks about mission in Japan

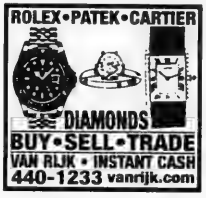
Laura Fixman
Special to The CJN

The speakers at the second annual DARA (Doctors Against Racism and Anti-Semitism) medical conference gathered in Toronto on Sunday to share their experiences helping people in war-torn and environmental disaster zones.

The medical conference, held at the University of Toronto titled "Disaster Medicine and Humanitarian Missions: Lessons Learned from International Experience," included addresses from Dr. Bernie Goldman, chair of Save a Child's Heart Canada; Major Vivian McAlister, a professor in the department of surgery in the Canadian Forces; and Dr. Ofer Merin, Shaare Zedek Medical Center's deputy director-general.

Merin, who is currently in the northern Japanese town of Kurihara with a medical team that includes 19 physicians and nurses from the Israel Defence Forces, joined the conference via video.

DARA, a Toronto-based grassroots non-profit organization that aims to bring objectivity to medical journalism and academia, invited Merin to share his experience in aiding the victims of the March 8 earthquake and tsunami.



Operating out of a makeshift clinic in the village of Minamisanriku – which was completely destroyed by the tsunami and killed about half of the 17,000 residents – Merin has been posting messages on his blog, which he created to give people frequent updates about the mission.

DARA conference held in Toronto

"The people who survived are the refugees you read about on the news – completely homeless. These are the ones we came to assist," Merin wrote in his first blog entry on March 29.

The Israeli clinic, led by the only foreign team on the ground, provides wards for pediatrics, surgery, maternity and gynecology, ophthalmology and intensive care, as well as a lab and pharmacy.

"Physicians from all around are coming with their patients for consults with our specialists, for blood tests and x-rays. Pregnant women are coming for ultrasounds as well, as this is a service they don't have," wrote Merin, who also updates his blog with videos and pictures.

One of the challenges facing the Israeli medical team is breaking through the cultural barriers and gaining the trust of the Japanese people.

At first, Merin said during the conference, the Japanese were hesitant to have foreigners treat them, but the Israeli team became increasingly popular after they treated the mayor of Minamisanriku.

"To be a foreigner and to work with Japan, this is the first time this has been done," Merin said.

Despite their efforts, he said, the 30-person team can only treat about up to 30 patients a day. "It's a drop in the ocean, what they did," McAlister said.

But Merin chose to focus on the positive.

"This is what we can do, and we concentrate on that," he said.

Radiation exposure is another obstacle the Israeli team has to overcome, and all patients and staff are tested daily. But Merin isn't concerned about that.

"The amount of radiation here is way below the amount we know to be safe," Merin said.

The clinic is located about 150 kilometres north of the Fukushima Daiichi power plant, which he attributes to the low levels of radiation.

Merin is no stranger when it comes to working under pressure in the midst of catastrophe.

Following the Jan. 12 earthquake that struck Haiti last year, Merin and his 230-member crew were one of the first to arrive in Haiti's capital, working for 10 days straight to see more than 1,000 patients.

But the work he's doing in Japan is "very different than the mission last year," he said.

Last year in Haiti, Merin found it extremely difficult to choose which patients to treat and which to turn away. He said that they couldn't always treat the most severely injured, and he always had to think of the best way to use their limited resources.

In Japan, he sends small teams everyday to go from house to house to treat people who can't travel.

"You have to pick ones that have a good chance of survival," Merin said.

Merin wrote on his blog that in addition to the humanitarian aid his team offers the Japanese victims, the team is also showing the rest of the world what Israel has to offer.

"We are getting excellent coverage from the media here, so the feeling is that we are on a humanitarian mission while also providing good [public relations] for Israel."

To read more about Dr. Merin and his medical team's ongoing work in Japan, follow his blog at http://szinjapan.tumblr.com/.

Itanu Toronto shines spotlight on physical, social inclusion

Vital UJA Federation initiative now in its ninth year

By Daniel Horowitz

It began in July, 2002, when, at the "Opening the Doors" Conference, held at Camp Ramah in Canada, Jewish community members came together to discuss the inclusion of children and adults with disabilities. As a result of that conference, Itanu Toronto - UJA Federation's inclusion initiative, was born.

This year, the ninth annual Inclusion Action Week will kick-off with Shabbat Itanu at synagogues across the Greater Toronto Area on April 8th and 9th, before drawing to a close on Thursday, April 14 with a ceremony at the Canadian National Institute for the Blind (CNIB). This vital program, as it has year after year, will bring the importance of physical and social inclusion to the attention of the community.

The event's keynote speaker is Toni Silberman, a renowned educator and psychotherapist, and a former member of senior management at the Ontario Human Rights Commission for 16 years.

Stan Kugelmass, the chair of Itanu Toronto since its inception, and the father of a child with special needs, is clear when asked what Itanu's ultimate goal is.

"To make our committee completely unnecessary," he says without hesitation. "But for now, we must continue to develop and enhance a welcoming attitude which reaches out to people who've felt excluded in the past. I always feel as if I'm speaking in my child's name when talking about these issues. My daughter's interaction with the world is innocent, sweet and generous. She's taught me a lot about what values are important and I am always conscious of what it would take to make her world a better place. What better thing for a father to be able to do for his daughter than to try to influence her community to be more open and accepting of her."

Participants on Taglit Birthright Israel's No Limits Trip embark on a sailing adventure on the Mediterranean Sea last June. The remarkable trip, featuring handicap accessible accommodations, site visits and activities, was designed for participants with reduced mobility, and funded by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

As part of Inclusion Action Week, Itanu Toronto will honour its 2011 recipients of the Community Inclusion Awards of Excellence, presented to individuals and organizations that have embraced inclusion as a key principle and a core value, and have impacted communal change as a result.

This year's recipients are The Bagel Club, a weekly support group organized and supported by Jewish Family & Child (JF&CS), and Yaffi Ulman, a young woman who has devoted her life to helping children with disabilities.

"With this award the community takes a positive step in battling stigma and encouraging a much needed conversation about mental health," said Richard Cummings, Executive Director, Jewish Family & Child.

"It's been said that a community will ultimately be judged by how open and accessible it is to engaging all its members," said Ted Sokolsky, President & CEO, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. "We are proud to support Inclusion Action Week, an initiative vital to making our incredible Jewish community truly inclusive and welcoming to all. By giving all citizens access to the finest in the arts, culture, education and recreation, we not only strengthen and improve their lives, but we are all the better for it."

IsraAid, UJA Federation mobilize to support victims of Japanese disasters

By Melanie Simons

When Shachar Zahavi, founder of the humanitarian organization IsraAid, first heard about the earthquake and tsunami in Japan, he knew that IsraAid could help. "We immediately called our contacts in the UN, Israeli government and international aid agencies and began evaluating what the needs on the ground were."

While IsraAid mobilized a volunteer team consisting of emergency medicine, search and rescue and water purification experts, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the world's largest financial supporter of IsraAid, created the Japan Earthquake Relief Fund to ensure a successful IsraAid mission. To date, over $140,000 has been raised.

"The Toronto Jewish community responded immediately to the enormous needs of Japan," says Zahavi. "As a result of the community's generosity, we dispatched our team to Japan and were one of the first emergency response units on the ground."

The team began working with local organizations, distributing relief items and planning a large scale aid operation for the affected communities. But the mission was temporarily interrupted when the government of Israel ordered all Israelis to leave the country because of high radiation levels.

However, within hours of being back in Israel, the team reconvened and established a 14-member delegation lead by Dr. Gady Sadovsky, a Reserve Colonel of the Home Front Command and current Head of Emergency Preparedness at Assaf Harofeh Hospital in Ashdod.

Sadovsky and his team arrived in Tokyo soon after receiving safety clearance from the Israeli government.

"The scale of this disaster is still incomprehensible," said Sadovsky after visiting displacement centres in Tokyo. "We are continuously humbled by the Japanese medical professionals, logisticians, relief workers and ordinary citizens who have demonstrated such bravery in the face of tragedy. We are here to lend a hand, share our experience and learn from theirs."

"Thousands of households have been living without fuel and electricity since March 14, and about 500,000 people are living in shelters," added Zahavi. "The shortage of fuel presents us with unique logistical issues, making it very challenging to reach the affected areas. The situation for these people is very urgent."

Israel's Ambassador to Japan, Nisim Ben Shitrit, says IsraAid's Japan mission demonstrates the commitment of Israeli society to nations in need. "It is truly appreciated in Japan, both by the local community and the government."

Israeli kids strive to maintain unique identity

Yosef Tastassa
Special to The CJN

Sara Dobner, chair of the Israeli Identity Program of the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, emigrated to Canada from Israel almost 24 years ago.

Over that time, Dobner realized that maintaining Israeli identity is important in the relationship between Israeli parents and their children who are born here, and that it also paves the road to building a Jewish identity.

"My two daughters are my personal example," Dobner said in a recent interview with The CJN.

"They were born in Canada, grew up in a Jewish environment and went to Jewish schools. However, if you ask them for their identity, they will answer 'Israeli,'" Dobner said.

And she is a proud Israeli, with Hebrew being the language that is spoken in her home.

"I am a secular Jew. And like most secular Jews in Israel, going to synagogue was never a priority as a part of our identity. In Canada, we sent our daughters to Jewish schools, but during our first years here I found it hard to define myself as Jewish, as my Israeli identity was so much more dominant and relevant," Dobner said.

"I think that Israel is a miracle. It was built from scrap by idealist Jews, refugees and Holocaust survivors. After almost 2,000 years of life in the Diaspora, the Jews finally have an independent state in their ancestral homeland. The pride in our country's achievements is an asset that is crucial for [us] to pass on to our daughters," she added.

Dobner said that the Israeli identity of her daughters is an important family bond. "Without the Israeli identity, my daughters would be strangers to us in their values, interests and outlook on life."

While instilling an Israeli identity in Israeli-Canadian kids will ensure their connection with their Israeli parents, supporting the development of their Jewish identity will help them in their integration into the greater Jewish community abroad, she said.

"Connecting our children to our Israeli heritage and developing their Israeli identity does not need to come at the expense of their ability to immerse in the local community," Dobner said.

"On the contrary, children that have the ability to absorb and identify with more than one culture will only enrich their lives and will be more worldly, sophisticated and have an open-minded perspective."

Children from Israeli families can help bring Israel to the non-Israeli children in the Diaspora Jewish communities. They can bring their Hebrew language and knowledge and love of Israel to the community, and can be the best ambassadors for Israel, Dobner said.

Two years ago, she said she decided to turn her personal experience as an Israeli with children who are Canadian-born into a message to the Israeli community here. That led to the founding of the Israeli Identity Program. As chair of the program, she works closely with Galya Sarner, the director of Israeli affairs at UJA Federation.

The program aims to assist Israelis to preserve their Israeli identity and maintain pride in that identity; to strengthen the integration of Israelis in the Canadian Jewish community, and to find ways that Israelis can play key roles in the Jewish community here. So far, the Israeli Identity Program has held two events. The first event was called "To Be an Israeli Parent in the Diaspora," and the second focused on preserving the Hebrew language among the young generation. A third event, now being planned, will include a discussion about the integration of newcomer Israelis and the local Jewish community.

"I see it as a win-win situation", Dobner said. "Both Israelis and local Jews need each other to maintain a strong Jewish community and for the future of the next generation. Israelis in the Greater Toronto Area are very lucky to live in a very strong, committed and warm Jewish community. A full integration between the Israelis and the Jewish community is a high priority goal we should all strive for."

Palestinians pursue unilateral declaration of statehood

The heavy focus on the war for control of Libya and upheavals in several other Arab countries overshadowed reports that the Palestinians' pursuit of a unilateral declaration of statehood appears to be gaining momentum. It could culminate in a resolution being introduced in September at the UN General Assembly to recognize the "State of Palestine."

Israel is doing what it can diplomatically behind the scenes to try to thwart this outcome, but not because it doesn't believe that the Palestinians should have a state. Rather, it's because of the way the Palestinians have chosen to go about realizing that goal – by avoiding negotiations with Israel that require them to recognize the Jewish state and compromise on the key issues.

In the meantime, with the Arab world in turmoil, UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon was busy criticizing Israel last week during a two-day UN "Latin American and Caribbean Meeting in Support of Israeli-Palestinian Peace" in Uruguay. While pro-forma calling for the parties to return to the negotiating table to conclude final-status talks, Ban singled out Israel, declaring: "The occupation that started in 1967 is morally and politically unsustainable, and must end. The Palestinians have a legitimate right to the establishment of an independent and viable state of their own."

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Ban's remarks were widely interpreted in Israel as supporting the Palestinians' unilateral move.

While this meeting was taking place, Avi Issacharoff reported (Ha'aretz, March 31) that Palestinian Authority president Mahmoud Abbas announced in Ramallah that the PA would turn to the UN General Assembly only if all other options are exhausted.

That statement struck Israelis as utterly disingenuous, since Abbas has persistently rejected Israel's requests to return to negotiations without preconditions. Abbas also recently met with Hamas officials in Ramallah in order to strike a unity agreement. Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has been blunt about this effort: either Abbas wants a deal with Israel or with Hamas, but he can't have it both ways.

As if more proof were needed of Abbas' refusal to talk with Israeli leaders, Saeb Erekat, his former chief negotiator and current member of the Palestine Liberation Organization's executive committee, told the attendees in Uruguay (to whom he delivered the keynote address): "I believe negotiations are over between the Palestinians and Israel." According to the official report of the meeting, Erekat (who, along with Abbas, walked away from former Israeli prime minister Ehud Olmert's offer of a Palestinian state during the Annapolis talks in 2008), said that final status issues such as borders, refugees, settlements, etc., "had been dealt with [sic] and now was the time for decisions." In short, it was now time for the international community to recognize "Palestine" based on the "1967 borders, which was required under international law."

The claim is nonsense. The "1967 borders" were never formal, internationally recognized borders. They only marked the armistice lines where fighting stopped between Israel and Jordan in 1949. UN Security Council Resolution 242, which has been the internationally accepted basis for all peace-making since the 1967 war, recognizes that border modifications would have to be made in a peace agreement, so that Israel could have the "defensible borders" it currently lacks. Ironically, Ban (drawing on the language of 242) noted that "Israel has the right to live in peace and security within internationally recognized and secure borders." Yet all his other statements criticizing Israel and supporting the Palestinians serve to render this recognition meaningless.

It's critical to understand that a UN acceptance of a unilateral Palestinian declaration of statehood, especially one that insists upon a "return to the 1967 borders," would violate a key requirement for peace that the UN itself prescribed and has stood by for more than 43 years.

Facts still matter, no matter what we hear about the increasing role of emotion and passion in determining the course of international affairs. And this fact, along with many others, such as the requirement for direct negotiations to reach peace, cannot be ignored.

The dragons are coming...to Israel

Diane Koven
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Plans are underway to launch the first-ever Dragon boat festival in Israel next year thanks to a group of local Jewish women.

Some have taken part in the Ottawa Dragon Boat Race Festival with a team called the Sea Lions for the past three years to raise funds for charities supported by the Ottawa Dragon Boat Foundation.

Dragon boats are long, narrow, canoe-styled boats, adorned with carved ornamental heads, tails and dragons, each holding 20 paddlers, a drummer and a steerperson.

The sport originated in China, but in recent years, its popularity has spread around the world, and festivals are now held in over 70 countries. They are usually fundraising events, with the teams supporting various charities.

The Sea Lions, with 24 to 26 members, are the third-highest fundraisers out of 190 teams in the Ottawa festival.

The other Jewish women planning the Israel event have been paddling with the Dragon Docs (physicians) and are equally enthusiastic about the sport.

Thus, an idea was born. Why not combine forces, recruit others across Canada and around the world, and introduce the sport to Israel?

After a great deal of behind-the-scenes planning, Dragon Boat Israel (DBI) was launched at an information session at the Soloway Jewish Community Centre on March 30.

Banners, signs and decorative dragon centrepieces set the scene, as interested prospective paddlers gathered to hear the details. An advertisement in the local newspaper brought a number of dragon boat veterans with no previous connection to the Jewish community or to Israel, who were intrigued by the opportunity to pursue the sport and visit Israel at the same time.

The DBI festival is an initiative of the Jewish Federation of Ottawa, but it is hoped that federations across the country will soon be on board as well.

Teams and team members from coast to coast are welcome to join, and recruitment will also take place in Israel.

Debbie Halton-Weiss, incoming chair of the Jewish Federation of Ottawa and chair of the DBI committee, said, "We in Ottawa are making it happen, with the assistance of the Ottawa Dragon Boat Festival... We will create the first-ever Dragon Boat Israel Festival."

DBI will raise funds for charities in Israel. In addition to the races, the festivals feature entertainment, camaraderie and and friendly competition.

No previous experience or training is necessary to participate in DBI. Dragon boating is easy to learn, safe and fun for men and women of all ages.

For further information on the DBI festival to be held at the Sea of Galilee May 17 and 18, 2012, and the tours being planned in conjunction with the festival, check out the website at www.dragonboatisrael.com or e-mail dragonboatisrael@jewishottawa.com.

An open letter to the community

Guest Voice

As Canadians, it is not only our right but also our responsibility to participate in the democratic process and have our voices heard. Since its inception five years ago, the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee (CJPAC) has helped the Jewish community to have a political impact that is beyond its numbers. Through the engagement of our thousands of community members across Canada within the multi-partisan political process, CJPAC has advanced prospects for a safe and secure environment for Israel and the Canadian Jewish community.

The Jewish community's voting influence is restricted to 13 ridings across the country – yet there are 308 ridings at stake. Dozens of ridings are decided by the smallest margins. In the 2008 election, one candidate won by only two votes in a riding with a population more than 49,000. Therefore, we must engage strategically, and most importantly, we must vote.

At stake in the 2011 spring federal election are issues of concern to all Canadians, in addition to issues of special concern to the Canadian Jewish and pro-Israel community, including the Canada-Israel relationship. In order to have your say on these issues, it is up to you to get involved.

1. It's up to you to get informed.

Learn more about where the candidates and parties stand on these issues. Visit www.itsup2you.ca to learn about your local candidates, the positions of their parties and to read the candidate's responses to our questionnaire.

2. It's up to you to get involved.

Volunteering for an election campaign is a great way to build relationships with members of Parliament and other decision-makers. These relationships are essential to ensuring our collective voice is heard. It's also an opportunity for networking, professional development and community involvement. Those who have volunteered in the past know how important and fun it can be. Fill out our volunteer form at www.itsup2you.ca, and CJPAC will pair you with the campaign of your choice.

3. It's up to you to support candidates.

With election fundraising and spending limits, it is easy to support friendly candidates in a significant way. Every dollar counts, and there are generous tax credits for political donations. Through CJPAC, you can target your support to our community's friends who need it the most. We are also able to ensure that every dollar donated is sent with the message, "Thank you on behalf of the Jewish community for your support of our issues." Call Jonathan Ain at 1-866-929-9552, ext. 238, for more information on how to make your political dollars count for the Jewish community.

4. Most of all, it's up to you to vote.

By exercising your right to vote, you have a say in charting Canada's course on issues of importance to you and the community. Find out more about voting options at www.itsup2you.ca.

We can all help to strengthen our community's voice by being an integral part of the political process and working to elect candidates who support our community. We must also build relationships with leaders and decision-makers who will have an impact on our issues.

Elections are won and lost on the basis of citizen participation. We are turning to you to make a difference for our community!

Joel Reitman is chair of CJPAC and Mark Waldman is executive director.

Bennett looking to hold St. Paul's for Liberals

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Voters in the federal electoral district of St. Paul's in Toronto will go to the polls to determine whether Liberal incumbent Carolyn Bennett keeps her seat in parliament on May 2.

According to the 2006 census, St. Paul's is home to approximately 111,000 people. Estimates peg the riding's Jewish population at around 15,500.

This year, Bennett faces off against Conservative candidate Maureen Harquail and the Green party's James McGarva. At deadline, the New Democratic Party had still not elected a candidate in the riding.

Bennett, who has held the riding for the Liberals since 1997, was re-elected in the 2008 election after defeating Conservative candidate Heather Jewell by more than 13,000 votes.

Harquail is a lawyer who currently works as general counsel with the Ontario Racing Commission, while Garva is a PhD student in mathematics at the University of Toronto. The CJN was unable to speak to Harquail and McGarva before deadline, though both released campaign statements last week. Nor was a photo of McGarva made available to The CJN.

In an interview last week, Bennett said she hoped the Jewish community understood the Liberal party's position on Israel.

"The [Canadian] relationship with Israel has to be about areas in which they lead... science and technology. When I was minister [of state for Public Health], I took a delegation over to learn from Israel about emergency preparedness" in the wake of Ontario's SARS battle, she said.

Bennett was also chair of the Canada-Israel Parliamentary Friendship Group for five years, from 1999 to 2003.

With regard to antisemitism and hate crimes in the country, Bennett said a Liberal government would "look into" more funding to expand federal community security programs.

The Conservative government currently funds its $3 million Security Infrastructure Program to help communities at risk of hate crimes cover the costs of upgrading or installing security measures at places of worship or communal centres.

Carolyn Bennett, Maureen Harquail

Asked about the recent passing of the National Holocaust Monument Act, Bennett noted that if elected to power, a Liberal government will "be very generous" in funding the monument's creation.

In his statement, McGarva said his priority issues include "sustainable economic development, a clean, efficient public transit system and a strong participatory democratic base.

"Clean air, clean water, clean food – these are the reasons I am running as the federal Green party candidate."

On her campaign website, Harquail says she was a member of the Canadian Forces Naval Reserve and as such has "a deep understanding" of the issues being faced by Canada's Armed Forces.

"I look forward to combining my personal understanding of key issues, such as the economy and the environment, with the views of the people of St. Paul's," she said.

St. Paul's electoral district is bounded on the north primarily by Eglinton Avenue; on the east by Bayview Avenue, Moore Avenue and the Don River tributary; on its south by the Canadian Pacific Railway south of Davenport Road, and on the west by parts of Ossington Avenue, Winona Drive and Dufferin Street.

In related news, The CJN has learned that a candidates debate for the riding will not include Green party candidate James McGarva.

A letter sent to the paper at deadline on Monday morning from the St. Paul's Federal Green Party Association stated that a debate later this month at Beth Tzedec Congregation will exclude McGarva.

An e-mail sent to the association from the shul's men's club stated that "our men's club has decided that only the three major parties will take part in our upcoming debate. The Green and other parties are free to attend and distribute their literature."

In a postscript, the e-mail added: "Should the Canadian Broadcasting Consortium reconsider and include the Green party [in the televised leadership debate], we will add the Green party to our lineup."

The e-mail was signed by Larry Rachlin, chairman of the Beth Tzedec Men's Club. The synagogue has scheduled its St. Paul's candidates debate for April 21 at 7 p.m. and will be moderated by the CBC's Ira Basen.

The paper was unable to contact Rachlin for comment prior to deadline.

Advance polling dates

Monday, May 2, is voting day for the federal election.

For those unable to get to a polling centre on that day, Elections Canada has set up three advance voting days for Canadians: Friday, April 22; Saturday, April 23; and Monday, April 25.

As a result, observant Jews wishing to exercise the advance voting option will have only Friday, April 22, before sundown, to vote. Monday, April 25, is a yom tov.

Advance polls will be open from noon to 8 p.m. local time. Elections Canada will publish the addresses of advance polling stations on April 18.

For more information, call Elections Canada at 1-800-463-6868.

Montreal's Mount Royal a race to watch

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Conservatives have targeted perennial Liberal stronghold Mount Royal as a riding they think they can capture, but the party's campaign got off to a slow start.

There were rumours that former Côte St. Luc Mayor Robert Libman or riding association president and B'nai Brith leader Moïse Moghrabi, might get the nomination. However, on the day the election was called, the Tories announced that ex-Montreal city councillor and Lubavitch community member Saulie Zajdel would be their candidate.

His name was a surprise. He had been a contender for the Mount Royal nomination – as a Liberal – in the 1999 byelection. Zajdel stepped aside when Irwin Cotler unexpectedly entered politics.

By last week's end, no Conservative posters were up in the riding yet, and no campaign office open. The Liberals had their signs up from the election's start, and the New Democratic Party (NDP), which is fielding Bialik High School teacher Jeff Itcush, days before.

Even the Bloc Québécois had posters up by late in the week, when Gabriel Dumais' candidacy was announced.

Zajdel, 55, who served 23 years on council and was an executive committee member, has been director of the Jewish Rehabilitation Hospital Foundation in Laval for the past two years.

He was reluctant to get back into public life, but the party hierarchy up to the Prime Minister's Office, urged him to do so. "I felt I had a duty to serve," he said, "There's no ego involved."

He traced his disaffection with the Liberals back to Michael Ignatieff's 2006 comment that Israel's military had committed war crimes in Lebanon, an opinion the party leader has since retracted.

Zajdel has been swayed by Stephen Harper's unequivocal support for Israel and the Jewish community.

"I'm not running against Cotler, I'm running against the Liberal Party," Zajdel said. "Certainly, he is well respected…He's just not running for the right party."

Zajdel is confident that his track record as a municipal politician who was close to the people he represented, a large proportion of them Orthodox Jews, will serve him well. He also believes many Mount Royal electors, traditionally Liberal, want to vote Conservative.

He has momentum on his side. Cotler received 58 per cent of the vote in the 2008 election, running against the unknown Conservative Rafael Tzoubari. The former justice minister has seen a steady erosion of support since the 92 per cent he garnered in 1999.

But the riding's turnout was historically low at 52 per cent, and Ignatieff's war-crimes comment was still a fresh memory among Jewish electors who represent 36 per cent, according to the 2001 census.

Conservative support went up from about 18 per cent in 2006 to 27 per cent in 2008.

Cotler, who'll be 71 in May and is in his sixth campaign, said, "I don't think there is any other MP who has been stronger on Israel and issues such as Iran and global antisemitism…And mine is a 50-year record, not five years," referring to Harper's time as prime minister.

"These are not Jewish issues, they are just issues, and it's important to have a voice in Parliament who can work with all parties, including the government," he said, adding that Ignatieff and the party backs him.

But Cotler stressed that the Mount Royal contest should not be about who supports Israel or the Jewish community more, and objected to the Conservatives' characterization of the riding as "very ethnic."

"We need a bi-partisan approach on these issues. I'm glad that Harper is so supportive of Israel and the Jewish concerns, but he should acknowledge that the Liberals are, too. Instead, the party is claiming it's the only one.

"The Conservatives are misrepresenting our views, and then taking credit for positions which were actually ours."

Cotler said Jewish voters are equally concerned with social issues, such as health care, support for seniors, and women's rights. The legislation and motions he has tabled reflect those priorities, he said.

The Mount Royal Liberals hold a rally April 10 at 3 p.m. at Federation CJA's Gelber Centre, where Justin Trudeau, the incumbent in Papineau, will be among the speakers.

Itcush, 48, a Quebec Jewish Congress executive member, is running his first serious campaign after being on the ticket twice before for the NDP in other ridings.

The Regina, Sask., native is getting support from the party this time. Leader Jack Layton spoke at his nomination in August and deputy leader Thomas Mulcair, the sole Quebec NDP MP, at the opening of Itcush's campaign office at the election's start.

"Mount Royal deserves an MP who is present in the riding, not abroad pursuing his interests," Itcush said.

He wants to see "Canada's image as a peace-builder restored," and suggested Harper government policies cost Canada a seat on the United Nations Security Council.

Itcush has a number of current and formgr Bialik students on this team, including Adam Shapiro and Jamie Gewurz.

"My Jewish background has given me my sense of ethics," Itcush said. "Tikkun olam is what social democracy is all about."

In Outremont riding, the Chassidim were noticeably absent at Liberal Martin Cauchon's campaign launch. The former cabinet minister is trying to take back the seat he held for 11 years from Mulcair.

Chassidic community members did attend Harper's speech to 750 across town in Dollard des Ormeaux March 30, his first campaign stop in the Montreal area.

Harper said there: "Our party has and always will stand beside our Jewish friends."

Outremont was the first stop on Ignatieff's campaign, a visit which included a photo-op at a bagel bakery.

Elsewhere, the only other Jewish MP from Quebec, Liberal Raymonde Folco, 71,who has represented Laval-Les Iles since 1997, announced that she will not run again.

In solidly Liberal Westmount-Ville Marie, Neil Drabkin, chief of staff to outgoing Treasury Board president Stockwell Day, is the Tory hopeful against Liberal incumbent Marc Garneau. Drabkin ran in Mount Royal in 2006 and for the now-defunct Canadian Alliance in Pierrefonds-Dollard in 2000.

Food memories of Passovers past

Norene Gilletz
Special to The CJN

This will be my first Passover without my mother. Mom died two days after Chanukah, just two weeks short of her 97th birthday.

Belle Rykiss was an outstanding cook and baker. She would make the most delicious meichels for her family and rarely needed to refer to a written recipe. Weeks before Pesach, we would have discussions on the best way to make the lightest, best-tasting Passover sponge cake, debating on how many eggs we needed to ensure that the cake would reach the very top of the tube pan. She would use a combination of potato starch and cake meal – she hated the taste of cakes made with just potato starch. I loved when she added grated bittersweet chocolate to her cake batter.

She also made scrumptious Passover kigelach that would expand and puff up in her bekelach (muffin pans). I can still taste those plump, portable puddings in my mind's eye, savouring food memories of Passovers past. I will be making kigelach for Passover once again this year, knowing that my mom will be watching over me from up above, making sure that I'm doing it just right.

My mother made the lightest matzah balls. During the year, she would add baking powder to the batter to make them as light as a cloud. Either omit it during Passover, or use Passover baking powder. My mom could always tell the difference between matzah balls made from a mix and those that were homemade. You could rarely fool my mother!

When my Auntie Clara Tobin was alive, she would make huge white "sinkers" each Passover. There were usually 25 or 30 hungry guests at her long series of tables which stretched from one end of her dining room to the far end of her living room. She would prepare the mixture earlier in the day. As soon as the seder began, she would shape the kneidlach and drop them into a huge pot of boiling water to simmer away. Her giant matzah balls were served "hot from the pot" as soon as the first part of the seder finished. My cousin Myrna Golden and I always managed to eat at least two or three. Unfortunately, my Auntie Clara's recipe has been lost over the years, much to our dismay, so my cousin Myrna usually uses a mix. However, the memory of Auntie Clara's marvellous matzah balls and her special smile will always live on in my memory.

Besides texture, quantity is another big question. At the Passover seder, I think that perhaps the fifth question should be, "How many matzah balls would you like – one or two?"

The polite son replies "Two please, if you have enough!"

But the hungry son replies, "I'll have at least four!"

MOM'S MATZAH BALLS

Source: The NEW Food Processor Bible: 30th Anniversary Edition

4 eggs
1/2 cup oil
1 cup matzah meal
1/2 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. Passover baking powder

Process all ingredients in a food processor fitted with the steel blade just until smooth, about 10 seconds. Place in the refrigerator for 1 hour or in the freezer for 20 minutes, until thickened.

Shape into small balls. Drop into boiling salted water in a large pot and cook, partially covered, for about 40 minutes. Yield: 14 to 16. May be frozen in soup.

Chef's Tip: Freeze uncooked matzah ball mixture in ice cube trays. When needed, drop frozen matzah balls in boiling water and cook partly covered for 35 to 40 minutes. Kids love them in different shapes!

Healthy holiday food – an oxymoron?

Jennifer Libman
Special to The CJN

Holidays are an integral part of Jewish life. And much of this time, especially during Passover, is spent with family and friends at festive holiday meals. These meals are often larger then what we would normally consume and much higher in both fat and calories.

One difference between a Passover seder and other Jewish holiday meals is that during a seder, before the meal is even served, people have already consumed – among others foods – an egg (about 65 calories in a medium), charoset (which is usually made with calorie-dense nuts and has about 150 calories per quarter cup), as well as two glasses of wine (about 100 calories per glass) and a piece of matzah (about 100 calories per board). These traditional foods on their own add up to about 500 calories, which is approximately the number of calories in a small meal.

In addition to the foods on the seder plate, Passover feasts typically include gefilte fish, chicken soup, vegetables, roasted potatoes, roast turkey or chicken, brisket and a variety of desserts. With all this food on the menu, it can be difficult not to overindulge.

For starters, don't come to a seder on an empty stomach. If you're hungry before the Haggadah is read, you'll be starving by the time the meal is served. This can result in overeating and it will be difficult to make good choices. Instead, have a snack in the late afternoon before the seder begins. As well, fill your plate with the foods you love. If brisket isn't your favourite, then why waste the calories on it? If you feel that your host expects you to try everything, just put a small amount on your plate.

Fresh Kale

Perhaps more important than what you eat during the seder meals is what you eat during the rest of the holiday. Try not to dwell on the large meal you consumed, and instead focus on the healthy choices you can make the rest of the week.

STEAMED KALE WITH GARLIC

Add some green to your seder table with this delicious and simple recipe for kale.

1 bunch of kale, coarsely chopped, with stems removed 2-3 cloves of garlic, chopped
salt to taste
1 tsp. olive oil
1/2 cup water or vegetable stock

In a large, non-stick skillet, heat olive oil and add garlic; stir for 30 seconds and don't allow it to burn. Add water or vegetable stock, kale and salt, toss and cover with a lid. Reduce the heat to medium-low. Cook for 2-3 minutes, until kale turns bright green.

HEALTHY MATZAH BALL SOUP

You won't even notice that these delicious, tender matzah balls are lower in fat than the traditional recipe.

4 egg whites
1 tbsp. olive oil
1/3 cup matzah meal
3 carrots, sliced
6 cups defatted chicken broth
2 tbsp. chopped fresh parsley ground black pepper

In a large clean bowl, using an electric mixer, beat the egg whites until foamy. Stir in the oil. Add the matzah meal and blend well. Cover and refrigerate for 20 minutes. Shape the mixture into 6 balls and set aside. Bring a large pot of water to a boil over high heat. Carefully drop the matzah balls into the water. Add the carrots. Reduce the heat to medium-low, cover and simmer for 30 minutes. Drain the mixture, returning the carrots and matzah balls to the pot. Add the broth and cook over medium heat until heated through. Divide the soup among 6 soup bowls. Garnish each serving with equal amounts of the parsley and pepper.

HEALTHY NEVER TASTED SO GOOD

A different twist on matzah balls

Looking for a different twist on matzah balls this Passover? The following recipe for fusion-style matzah balls is excerpted from The Perfect Passover Cookbook by Judy Bart Kancigor.

SHIITAKE MUSHROOM MATZAH BALLS

From Judy Bart Kancigor

Neither of my daughters-in-law ever liked matzah balls until I came up with this recipe. I doctored up plain old matzah ball mix – and a fine product it is! – with shiitake mushrooms and scallions for a shtetl favorite with an Asian twist. (Not surprising. Jews have had a long love affair with Chinese food!) Go ahead and double or even triple the recipe (and you may have to!), but be careful not to crowd the pot when you are cooking them. Makes 24 to 30 golf-ball-size balls.

1/4 cup melted chicken fat or vegetable oil
4 scallions, white and half the green part, thinly sliced
3 oz. shiitake mushrooms, stems discarded, finely chopped (1 to 1 1/2 cups)
1 envelope matzah ball mix, such as Manischewitz
1/2 cup matzah meal
4 large eggs, lightly beaten
2 tbsp. finely chopped flat-leaf parsley
1 tsp. kosher (coarse) salt
1/8 tsp. white pepper
1 tsp. baking powder (see Notes)
2 tbsp. club soda, chicken broth, or water

Heat the chicken fat in a medium-size saucepan over medium heat. Add the scallions and mushrooms and cook, stirring often, until the mushrooms are soft, about 5 minutes. Set aside.

Combine the matzah ball mix with the matzah meal in a medium-size bowl. Add the eggs and mix well. Stir in the mushroom mixture (with the oil), parsley, salt, white pepper and baking powder. Add the club soda and mix thoroughly. Cover and refrigerate until firm, at least 1 hour.

Bring a large pot of water to a boil and lightly salt it.Form the mixture into balls that are a little larger than a marble, wetting your hands if necessary to keep them from sticking. Drop the balls into the boiling water and cook, covered, at a slow, steady boil (not a hard boil) until tender, about 30 minutes (depending on the size of the balls).

Carefully remove the matzah balls with a slotted spoon, and serve in soup.

Notes:

For Passover, use kosher for Passover baking powder, or if it's unavailable, it may be omitted.

MY MOM'S PASSOVER KIGELACH

Source: Second Helpings Please!

2 1/2 cups matzah farfel
2 cups boiling water
3 eggs, beaten
1 1/2 tsp salt
2 tbsp. oil or chicken fat

Pour boiling water over farfel. Let stand for 10 minutes. Pour off excess water.

Combine farfel, eggs, salt and oil and mix well. Place a little oil in the bottom of muffin tins, and heat in oven. Divide mixture evenly into 12 compartments.

Bake at 350 for 30 minutes, until nicely browned. These are delicious in chicken soup or as a side dish with meat. The texture is like that of noodle kugel. Yield: 6 to 12 servings.

MY MOTHER'S PASSOVER CAKE

Source: The NEW Food Processor Bible: 30th Anniversary Edition

You need an electric mixer to make this cake, but use your processor to grate the chocolate. You will also need two large mixing bowls for this recipe. So good, that you won't believe it's a Passover cake!

3 oz. chilled bittersweet chocolate bar
1/2 cup almonds (optional)
9 eggs, separated
1 1/2 cups sugar
1/2 cup cold water
1/2 cup potato starch
1/2 cup cake meal
1/2 tsp salt

Preheat oven to 350.

Steel blade: Break chocolate into 1-in. chunks. Process until fine, about 30 seconds. Add almonds (if using). Process until almonds are finely chopped, 12 to 15 seconds longer.

In a large mixing bowl, beat egg yolks with an electric mixer until light, 3 to 4 minutes. Add sugar and water and beat on high speed for 8 to 10 minutes. Combine potato starch and cake meal. Sprinkle over yolk mixture a little at a time (a sifter or strainer will help) and fold in carefully. Then fold in grated chocolate and nuts. Wash beaters thoroughly and dry well.

In another large mixing bowl, beat egg whites with salt until stiff but not dry. Carefully fold into batter. Pour gently into an ungreased 10-inch tube pan. Batter should come to within 1-1/2 inches of top of pan. If necessary, make a 2-inch collar with foil around top of pan.

Bake for 1 hour, then reduce heat to 300 for 15 minutes. Invert immediately and cool completely. Yield: 15 servings. Freezes well.

Desserts to complement the main course

Daphna Rabinovitch
Special to The CJN

For me, deciding what dessert to make is a wonderful process. I don't always start with deciding what will end the meal, but I do tend to spend a lot of time on it, thinking through the texture, the flavour and how it complements the main course and the side dishes. Of course at Passover, the list is not endless, but the possibilities are just as vast. Since the main meal often has many courses, I tend to focus on fruit with a lovely, rich accompaniment or fruit desserts with a decadent twist. I hope that the fruit desserts that follow delight your sense of sweet and become a part of your holiday repertoire.

LEMON MOUSSE WITH MIXED BERRIES AND MIXED BERRY SAUCE

This refreshing and colourful dessert is the perfect foil for the rich and savoury dishes that make up the seder meal. The benefit is that you can make it the day before and let it set overnight. Be sure to bring the sauce to room temperature before you use it. Dollop some over the mousse and serve the extra in a glass creamer.

2 tbsp. each fresh lemon and orange juice

In large metal bowl, stir together 1 cup of the sugar, lemon rind and juice, egg yolks and eggs. Set bowl over saucepan of simmering, not boiling, water. Whisk until mixture thickens and thermometer registers 160, 10 to 15 minutes. Transfer mixture to another bowl. Place plastic wrap directly on surface and chill for at least three hours or up to 24 hours.

Meanwhile, combine 1 cup of the strawberries, raspberries and blueberries and 1/2 cup of the blackberries in separate saucepan with remaining 1/4 cup of the sugar, 1/3 cup water, potato starch, lemon and orange juice. Bring to boil over medium-high heat, stirring gently. Cook for about 1 minute or until thickened. Pour into a separate bowl. Cover surface directly with plastic wrap and refrigerate for at least three hours or up to 48 hours.

Whip cream. Fold 1/3 into cooled lemon mixture. Then fold remaining whipped cream into lemon mixture. Divide remaining fruit among 8 dessert glass bowls or parfait or wine glasses. Spoon mousse evenly, smoothing top. Refrigerate until serving. Serve with room temperature fruit sauce. Makes 8 servings.

HOMEMADE CINNAMON ICE CREAM WITH RHUBARB AND CHERRY COMPOTE

Although this is a dairy dessert, it's worth waiting for. The ice cream is simplicity itself and at other times of year, it is perfect to add things into, such as chopped chocolate, fruit or candies. The sauce is also extremely versatile – it's excellent over sorbet, matzah brei and just by itself with a spoon!

Fruit with a sweet twist

Ice cream:
1 can (300g) sweetened condensed milk
1/2 tsp. cinnamon
2 cups whipping cream
Rhubarb and cherry compote:
1 1/2 cup fresh or frozen chopped rhubarb
1 1/2 cups frozen or jarred pitted sour cherries, well drained
1/3 cup granulated sugar
2 tbsp. lemon or orange juice
1/2 tsp. potato starch

In a bowl, stir together sweetened condensed milk and cinnamon. Whip cream. Fold into milk mixture. Transfer gently to plastic wrap-lined 8x5-in. loaf pan. Cover with plastic wrap and freeze for at least 8 hours or for up to 72 hours.

Combine rhubarb, cherries, sugar and lemon or orange juice in saucepan set over medium heat. Bring to boil. Reduce heat and simmer, covered, stirring occasionally for 6 minutes.

Dissolve potato starch in 1 tbsp. water. Uncover saucepan and stir in potato starch mixture. Cook, stirring, for about 3 more minutes until rhubarb breaks down and is stringy and mixture is lightly thickened. Transfer to serving saucer. Cover surface with plastic wrap and refrigerate for at least 1 hour or for up to 72 hours.

Unmould ice cream. Slice into loaf-shaped pieces. Spoon compote sauce over to serve. Makes 8 servings.

FLOURLESS CHOCOLATE CRACKLES

These cookies are a fabulous treat any time of year, but especially during Passover with the prohibition against flour. They are extremely easy to make and keep well in an airtight container for up to a week. After a robust meal, they are the perfect antidote to richness, paired simply with a fruit salad and a cup of coffee or tea.

1 cup ground almonds
1/2 cup cocoa powder
1 tsp. kosher for Passover baking powder pinch salt
1/4 cup butter or margarine, softened
2/3 cup packed brown sugar
1 egg
4 oz. semisweet chocolate, melted
1/4 cup granulated sugar
1/2 cup icing sugar

In bowl, whisk together almonds, cocoa, baking powder and salt; set aside.

In bowl of electric mixer, beat butter with brown sugar until well combined. Beat in egg, scraping bowl twice. Using wooden spoon, stir in melted chocolate. Stir in cocoa-almond mixture. Cover surface with plastic wrap and refrigerate for about 15 minutes or until firm.

Place granulated and icing sugar in separate small bowls. Preheat oven to 350.

Scoop small sections of dough and roll between palms of hands into 1-inch balls. Roll each ball in granulated sugar until completely coated, and then in icing sugar until completely coated. Place 1-inch apart on parchment paper-lined baking sheets.

One sheet at a time, bake in centre of preheated oven for 12 minutes. Let cool in pan on rack for 1 minute. Transfer to wire racks to cool completely. Repeat with second baking sheet. Store in airtight container for up to 7 days. Makes 3 dozen small cookies.

ROASTED CARAMEL PEARS

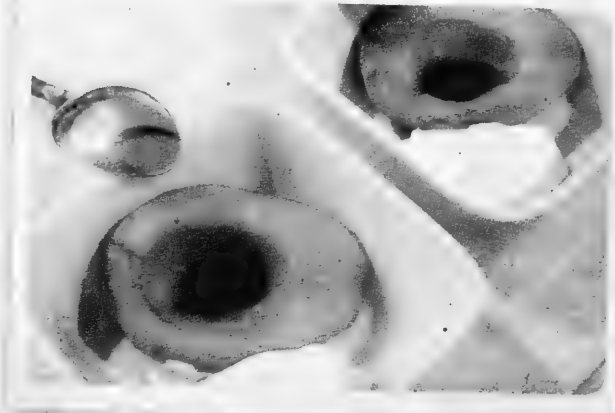
Elegant in its simplicity, this rich and decadent dessert will be the pièce de résistance at your seder. Be sure to choose ripe pears or the cooking time will be much longer. If you make it ahead and the sauce hardens, simply reheat it until smooth and silky and pourable again.

2 cup granulated sugar
3/4 cup butter or margarine, in cubes
6 ripe pears
2/3 cup fresh lemon juice

In heavy saucepan, dissolve sugar in 3/4 cup water. Cook over medium heat until sugar is dissolved. Bring to boil over medium high heat; boil, without stirring, brushing down sides of pan with brush dipped in water, until sugar turns a caramel colour, about 9 to 12 minutes. Remove pan from heat. Whisk in butter until melted and smooth. Pour sauce into 9x13-in. metal cake pan or two 8-in. metal cake pans.

Cut pears in half lengthwise. With melon baller, remove core and cut out vein to top of each pear. Place cut side up in pan. Drizzle lemon juice over top of pears. Cover pan with aluminum foil.

Cook in centre of preheated 400-degree oven for 15 minutes. Baste pears with sauce. Cook for another 20 to 30 minutes, basting often, until pears are tender. Pears can be kept at room temperature for 8 hours. Rewarm to serve. Arrange each pear half on plate; spoon caramel sauce over. Makes 12 servings.



An iconic favorite for your holiday table.

Cooking for the kids

Judy Bart Kancigor
Special to The CJN

When my granddaughter Lauren was a mere toddler and just beginning to absorb the Passover ceremonies, her post-seder comment was a classic: "Well, that was a really sad story. Now I'm not gonna sleep all night!"

Every year, we retell the story of the miracles of Passover, the 3,000-plus-year-old saga of our ancestors' exodus from bondage in Egypt to freedom. It is a story of hope, of redemption. And every year we look for new ways to engage the children. (Hopefully, without those pesky plagues giving them nightmares!)

Passover is also the culinary crescendo of the year for Jewish cooks and for the children – and we are expecting nine this year – I'm whipping up a batch of Honey Pecan Crusted Chicken. (Who am I kidding? I'd better make plenty for the adults as well!) I found the recipe in Tastes of Jewish Tradition by Jody Hirsh, Idy Goodman, Aggie Goldenholz and Susan Roth (Wimmer), my all-around go-to book for holiday ideas for kids.

This fun-filled compilation of recipes, activities, commentary and stories for the entire family is the culmination of a community effort by the Milwaukee Jewish Community Center's Parenting and Family Center, with input from rabbis and local artists.

The authors of this valuable resource book take very seriously the injunction: "In every generation, all are obligated to see themselves as though they themselves had gone out of Egypt."

"On Passover we are encouraged to remember the exodus as though we too had been there," Goodman told me. "It involves your whole body. You re-enact the story through all your senses. Suddenly you're all Egyptians or Israelites. Through the activities, you feel what it must have been like to be a slave and work so hard."

Set the mood for the seder by creating a Bedouin tent, donning Middle Eastern head covers called kefiahs, and making plague bags. The book even includes a magic trick to simulate the parting of the Red Sea and suggests musical selections to accompany your virtual crossing.

It doesn't have to be Chanukah (and you don't have to be a kid!) to enjoy latkes, those irresistible crispy fried potato pancakes. I found a health-conscious Passover version in Passover: A Kosher Collection by Pam Reiss (www.pamelareiss.com).

"When I was working on this recipe, my cousin showed up at my door with her two-year-old daughter as the latkes were in the frying pan," Reiss e-mailed from her home in Winnipeg. "I offered the little girl a taste, and she promptly ate half a dozen. I knew I had a winner!"

When Reiss was growing up, her family celebrated Passover at her grandmother's house. "She always made our favourite, her blue potato pancakes.

"No, she didn't use blue potatoes – were they even available then? – but she finely grated the potatoes with a box grater, and they would oxidize while she grated the onions. We never thought anything of it. Blue latkes were normal for us!

"Years later, I discovered that if I grated the onions first and tossed the potatoes with the onions and their juices as I grated them, the potatoes stayed nice and white. Now if I want interesting colours in my latkes, I'll make green ones with zucchini or orange ones with sweet potatoes."

HONEY PECAN CRUSTED CHICKEN

8 skinless chicken breast halves
1/4 cup honey
salt and pepper to taste
2 tbsp. Dijon mustard
1/4 tsp. paprika
1/8 tsp. garlic powder
1 1/2 cups matzah meal (see note)
3/4 cup chopped pecans

Preheat oven to 400. Combine honey, dash of salt, pepper, mustard, paprika and garlic powder in a bowl. Combine matzah meal and pecans in a shallow dish.

Brush chicken pieces with honey mustard combination and then dredge in matzah meal mixture. Lightly spray chicken with vegetable spray and place in a baking pan. Bake for about 40 minutes or until done. Yield: 8 servings.

Note: After Passover, substitute crushed corn flakes for the matzah meal.

ZUCCHINI LEEK LATKES

Source: Passover: A Kosher Collection by Pam Reiss

These are a little softer than potato latkes, so be gentle when you flip them over.

1 1/2 lb. zucchini, trimmed and shredded
8 oz. red potatoes, peeled and shredded
8 oz. leeks, washed well and thinly sliced (2 medium)
1 1/2 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. black pepper
1/2 cup matzah cake meal
1 tsp. paprika
3 large eggs
cottonseed or grapeseed oil for frying

Grate the zucchini and potato and squeeze out any excess liquid. Combine with the remaining ingredients in a mixing bowl.

Heat 1/4-in. oil in large frying pan over medium heat. Using two spoons, gently place mixture into oil (use about 2 tbsp. mixture for each latke).

Fry 2 to 3 minutes, or until edges start to brown; then turn over and cook another 2 to 3 minutes, until both sides are golden brown.

Transfer to paper towel to drain and continue with remaining latkes, adding more oil if necessary. Yield: 16 to 18.

CHOCOLATE DRENCHED STUFFED FRUIT

Source: Passover by Design by Susie Fishbein.

These may be frozen for a great frozen treat!

12 large raspberries
1 tbsp. sweetened shredded coconut, divided use
12 medium-large strawberries
12 large blueberries
2 medium bananas, peeled and sliced diagonally into 6 pieces
4 bars (3.5 oz. each) good quality pareve bittersweet Swiss chocolate
12 pecan halves

Line a large cookie sheet with parchment paper. Place a small cooling rack on a small cookie sheet.

Stuff raspberries with about 1/4 tsp. coconut, and place them on cooling rack, coconut side up.

Remove greens and dig a hole about the size of a blueberry in tops of strawberries. Gently press a blueberry to fit deep into each prepared strawberry. Place these on one side of the lined cookie sheet.

Place banana slices on lined cookie sheet.

Fill a medium saucepan with 2 to 3 inches water. Over medium-low heat, bring water to just simmering. Using a serrated knife, chop chocolate into 1/2-in. pieces. Reserve about 1/4 of chopped chocolate away from heat. Place remaining 3/4 chocolate into large metal bowl and set bowl over barely simmering water.

Using a wooden spoon, slowly stir chocolate often until melted, scraping down sides of bowl as needed. Do not let water come to a rolling simmer or boil. Excessive heat will damage chocolate. Once all chocolate is melted, immediately remove bowl from heat and add reserved chopped chocolate. Gently stir until all chocolate is melted.

Working quickly, drop banana piece into chocolate. Without stabbing it, lift out of chocolate with a fork. Lightly tap back of fork on edge of bowl, and then slide it over the edge to remove excess chocolate. Place banana back on lined cookie sheet. Top with pecan. Repeat with remaining pieces.

With a firm but gentle grip on point of strawberry, dip it into chocolate about 3/4 of the way up, being careful not to lose blueberry. Place berry back on lined cookie sheet, blueberry side down. Repeat with remaining strawberries.

Using a small spoon, gently drizzle remaining chocolate over prepared raspberries.Place all fruit in refrigerator, serve well chilled within a couple of hours, or store in airtight container refrigerated for one day or in freezer for up to a week.

After the seder – then what?

Sue Epstein
Special to The CJN

You've spent days preparing for the seder and it was wonderful. But now it's over and there are still many more Passover meals to serve.

In Israel, very few people work on Passover – offices and schools are closed and with the whole family at home, more meal preparation is necessary. Thus it becomes a challenge to come up with breakfast and lunch meals and picnic foods in addition to dinners that won't leave you in the kitchen for hours.

When my children lived at home, they usually didn't want to even look at the seder leftovers, except for the charoset, which they loved in a sandwich served on Passover rolls or pancakes. By the way, Passover pancakes are a great substitute for bread to make your picnic sandwiches. They hold the ingredients much better than matzah and travel more easily.

Here are some recipes everyone in your family should enjoy.

SHEPHERDS PIE

3 tbsp. oil
2 onions, diced
2 cloves garlic, diced
1 green pepper, diced
1 stalk celery, diced
1 lb. ground meat, or any other leftovers in the refrigerator
1/2 cup chicken soup or gravy
4 large potatoes
2 eggs
1 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. pepper
margarine
paprika

Preheat oven to 350. Saute vegetables in oil, then add meat. Add soup or gravy. Boil potatoes, mash with eggs, salt, pepper and onion. In a greased casserole, spread half of potato mixture, then add the meat. Top with remaining half of potatoes, dot with margarine and paprika, and bake for 30 minutes until potatoes are browned on top.

TURKEY TZIMMES

Betty Goodfriend was a Holocaust survivor and well-known Atlanta Jewish cook. She served this at the seder, but I like to serve it in place of cholent for Shabbat on Passover. Like stew, tzimmes tastes better a day or two after it is made, so this is a good dish to prepare ahead of time. It freezes well.

4 medium white potatoes
2 lb. sweet potatoes, about two large
3 lb. baby carrots, peeled
1 lb. large, moist prunes, pitted
1 1/2 lb. turkey thighs, with skin and bone
1 tsp. cinnamon
1/2 cup honey
1 tbsp. salt, or to taste
1/2 cup dark brown sugar
5 to 6 cups of water

Peel and cut white potatoes into 1/4-inch slices and layer on bottom of large Dutch oven. Peel and cut sweet potatoes into chunks, about 8 pieces per potato.

(Hint: Cut in half, half again, then quarter each half.) Rinse baby carrots and prunes in cold water. In large bowl, combine carrots, sweet potatoes and prunes. Put half of carrot mixture over white potatoes. Add turkey thighs, skin side up. Cover with remaining carrot mixture. Sprinkle cinnamon, then pour honey over top carrot layer. Mix salt and brown sugar in 2 cups of water and pour over vegetables. Add remaining water until liquid is about 2 to 3 inches below top of carrot mixture.

Preheat oven to 325. On stovetop, bring vegetable and turkey layers to a boil, then simmer, covered, for 20 minutes. Taste for seasonings and add more honey, salt or brown sugar to taste. Place uncovered in oven for 3 to 4 hours, checking every 30 minutes, and add water if needed, making sure meat stays in liquid. If sauce is watery, add a tablespoon of potato starch mixed with 1/2 cup of water in last half-hour. When finished cooking, vegetables should be tender and moist, and turkey cooked in a thick, reduced sauce. Remove bones and skin and cut meat into generous bite-size pieces and mix back into vegetables. Serve warm, or refrigerate and reheat, covered, in 325-degree oven, for about 1 hour or until warm. Serves 12-14.

MATZAH FRITTATA

For breakfast, lunch or to take on a picnic – good any time.

6 regular matzot
12 eggs, lightly beaten
1/2 tsp. salt
1/2 cup seedless raisins
1/4 cup pine nuts, optional
grated zest of a lemon
6 tbsp. olive oil
1/4 cup sugar
1 tsp. cinnamon

Soak the matzot in cold water for a half hour, and then squeeze out most of the water (you don't want it bone dry).

Lightly beat the eggs and combine them with the remaining ingredients except the sugar and the cinnamon.

Heat half the oil in a fairly large skillet, add the batter and cook without stirring until a crust forms underneath and the batter begins to firm up. Turn the frittata onto a plate, heat the remaining oil in the skillet, and slide the frittata back into the pan to cook on the other side.

Transfer it to a serving plate, pat it dry, and dust it with the sugar and cinnamon. Makes 6 servings.

BANANA CHEESE FRITTERS

1 cup matzah meal
1 cup milk
1-2 ripe bananas, mashed
1 cup cottage cheese
1 tsp. cinnamon
1/2 tsp. salt
2 eggs, beaten
butter or margarine for frying

Mix matzah meal and milk in a large bowl and let sit for about 10 minutes. Stir in mashed banana, cottage cheese and remaining ingredients. Mix well.

Melt butter or margarine in a large frying pan over medium heat and drop the batter into the pan by the tablespoon. Fry until fritters are crisp and brown on one side, turn over and cook for another minute or two. Can be served with maple-flavoured syrup or dollops of sour cream. Makes 4 servings.

End the meal on a sweet note

Sue Epstein
Special to The CJN

Passover's dietary restrictions mean it takes ingenuity to come up with a scene-stealing dessert. I like to serve a spectacular dessert after the seder but also have another choice for those who want something lighter.

After a seder meal, guests tend to be stuffed, so here are some fresh, appealing dessert options.

FRESH FRUIT

Another beautiful and light dessert can be made by peeling and slicing fresh fruits and layering them in a glass bowl, using rows of the fruit to create a pretty pattern. Start layering in rows around bottom of dish and up the sides. As you arrange the outside fruit, fill in centre layer by layer with slices that are not as perfect. Decorate with mint sprigs and add some orange juice, wine or liqueur.

ULTIMATE CHOCOLATE MARQUISE

When you want to serve a wow dessert for Passover, this is it. From Luscious Chocolate Desserts by Lori Longbotham, it's easy to make, you can make it ahead, and it freezes beautifully. It can be refrigerated rather than frozen, but will be more difficult to cut.

1 lb. bittersweet or semisweet chocolate, chopped
1 cup unsalted margarine, room temperature
1/4 cup sugar
1 tbsp. brandy or liqueur (optional)
6 large eggs, separated
2 large egg yolks
pinch of salt

Butter an 8x4-in. loaf pan and line with 2 sheets of plastic wrap, one going the long way and one going the short way, leaving an overhang of several inches on all sides.

Melt the chocolate and margarine in a large heatproof bowl set over a saucepan with about 1-1/2 inches of nearly simmering water, whisking until smooth. Whisk in the sugar and liqueur, if using, until well blended.

Remove the bowl from the heat and, with an electric mixer on low speed, beat in the egg yolks one at a time, beating well after each addition and occasionally scraping down the sides of the bowl.

Beat the egg whites and salt with clean beaters on medium-high speed in a large, deep bowl just until the whites form stiff peaks when the beaters are lifted. With a whisk or a rubber spatula, fold one-third of the egg whites into the chocolate mixture. Fold in the remaining egg whites in 2 batches just until well blended.

Transfer the mixture to the prepared pan, pushing it into the corners and smoothing the top with a rubber spatula. Cover with the overhanging plastic wrap and then wrap tightly with aluminum foil. Freeze for at least 6 hours.

To serve, unwrap the pan, fold back the plastic wrap, and run a table knife around the edges of the pan to loosen the marquise. Place a serving platter over the pan, invert the pan onto it, and release the marquise by pulling on the edges of the plastic wrap.

Remove the plastic wrap and smooth the edges of the marquise with a small warm metal spatula if necessary. Cut into 1/2-in.-thick slices with a sharp knife dipped in very warm water and wiped dry between each slice, and place on chilled dessert plates. (You can tightly rewrap and freeze any leftovers.) Serves 10 or more.

York alumnus files complaint with OHRT

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Former York University student Sammy Katz hopes his complaint with the Ontario Human Rights Tribunal will push York to improve its complaints process and address the fact that pro-Israel students feel "constantly under threat."

Sammy Katz

The complaint – which stems from an event in February 2010 during which Hasbara Fellowships at York ran a campaign to raise awareness about Hamas and Gilad Schalit, a kidnapped Israeli soldier – charges York with legitimizing an anti-Jewish environment on campus.

Katz, who is represented by University of Toronto law professor and barrister Ed Morgan and New York attorney Neal Sher, alleges that York fails to counter activities that create a "poisonous atmosphere for identifiably Jewish students."

The complaint was brought on by a Feb. 1 incident during which Katz and student organizers were confronted about the legitimacy of their tabling event, called Hamas: the Obstacle to Peace. A heated exchange ensued, and Katz claims he was slapped by an anti-Israel student.

Katz said he was encouraged when the university appointed an adjudicator, Janet Morrison, to review the incident following a complaint he filed with York's Student Conduct and Dispute Resolution Office.

But his confidence in the York administration abated when he learned that footage from the security tapes from Vari Hall – where the incident unfolded – was released to the media before he was allowed to view it, Katz said.

Following a viewing of the footage by The CJN, other members of the media and Jewish community leaders, Alex Bilyk, York's director of media relations, said in a CJN interview that Katz did not get slapped.

"From a physical assault perspective, you definitely see that no such thing was occurring," Bilyk said.

But Katz, who claims he wasn't able to view the video himself until weeks later, said, "the video was so grainy that you can't really see what's going on, and it only shows half of Vari Hall, so you can't see what's going on [off camera]."

In his complaint, Katz charges that York accused him of "construing a lie," and claimed "that nothing happened, there was no incident."

As a result, Katz said that "everyone turned on us," including Jewish community leaders, and he lost his job with Hasbara.

Katz said that about two months after the incident, he along with the students who were involved in the complaint, presented their case and reviewed the video with Morrison.

"I knew where everybody was standing, I knew exactly what was going on and you can see where I get hit. I pointed it out to the adjudicator and she admitted in a confidential written report, that I was in fact hit," Katz said.

He added that while the physical confrontation was minor, "it was a matter of principle.

"I've asked for a retraction, an apology, because this ruined my image, it ruined the image of Jewish students at York University, that they cry wolf. But the university said they are not responsible for what happened," Katz said.

"Until this day, there are people in the Jewish community and others who think that we completely lied."

Morgan said the way York handled the complaint process itself is part of the complaint.

"We'd like better policies with respect to security at York, security videotaping at events... Making sure that people are fairly treated throughout the complaints process," Morgan said.

"He's looking for some financial compensation" because he feels that his reputation had been tarnished.

York spokesperson Wallace Pidgeon said that the university is "going to vigorously defend ourselves against these allegations that we believe to be untrue... We're compelled to set the record straight with respect to incorrect information."

Pidgeon said that Katz's version of the story contained inaccuracies.

"We never said no to anyone who wanted to see it. There were students, members of student groups, members of the media, who had requested to see the video. He eventually came and saw it, as far as I'm concerned," Pidgeon said.

But he said he didn't know whether the tape was only made available to Katz after members of the media saw it.

"I'm not able to speak about that... but as I understand, Mr. Katz and his counsel did come in February and were able to see this."

Pidgeon said that York "is a place that values freedom of expression, open discourse, and values a peaceful, mindful and respectful campus... We take this really, really seriously... We're being as open and transparent... as possible."

Katz wants people to understand that the complaint is not just about him.

"This really is about the bigger picture... My intention is that Jewish students need to feel that they are welcome at York University, that they are not constantly under threat... That no one is going to attack them if they hold rallies or events. Jews don't need to be living in fear on campus if they are supporting Israel," Katz said.

"Life is difficult for pro-Israel activists there and York's policies need continuous rethinking and this is part of this process," Morgan said.

A date for the hearing has not yet been set.

Students' divestment efforts fail

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

As many as 200 unruly students forced cancellation of a meeting of the board of governors of Carleton University last week, but they failed to convince the university to divest from four companies doing business in Israel.

Protesters from Students Against Israeli Apartheid (SAIA) and the Graduate Students' Association (GSA) demonstrated noisily outside the university's administration building and despite a police presence, the board decided to postpone its meeting indefinitely.

"Protesters would not allow some board members to enter the building," said Jason MacDonald, director of communications for Carleton University. "Students have a right to protest but it is the university's expectation that they will respect the university's right to conduct its business and the right of other members of the community to carry on with their work and studies unimpeded."

The incident came a few weeks after the Carleton University Students' Association (CUSA) passed a motion calling on the university's pension fund to engage in socially responsible investment. At the time, CUSA rejected a SAIA motion that would have included a specific reference to Israel in connection to alleged war crimes. Reacting to that vote, SAIA spokesperson Reem Bushaisi claimed partial victory: "Now we will be taking a motion to the board of governors in March with a clear message: we don't want our money supporting military occupation."

Protesters oppose $2.6 million pension fund investments in Motorola, Tesco, Northrop Grumman and BAE Systems.

Hoping to avoid a disruption, the university offered to permit 20 students into the board of governors meeting and to have its vice-president of finance and administration meet with students to outline the policies that govern the pension plan.

However, in advance of the board of governors meetings, the GSA issued a news release saying hundreds of students would be present to express their opposition to being locked out of the board meeting. The GSA also criticized the university for preventing debate on proposed tuition fee hikes and its refusal to consider divesting from "weapons manufacturers."

"By choosing to block debate and lock its doors, a clear message is being sent to students: the university is happy to collect your money but don't expect democratic participation in university governance," said GSA vice-president Kelly Black.

Meanwhile, Emile Scheffel, a member of the Israel Awareness Committee at Carleton, was stuck outside the building unable to get in. "I was one of five pro-Israel students invited to attend the meeting," Scheffel told The CJN." We were unable to enter the building, but waited outside until a member of the university administration advised by e-mail that the cancellation had occurred.

"Unfortunately, SAIA have once again made clear they're not interested in a safe, tolerant and respectful campus. We'll continue to engage students in reasonable, constructive dialogue about Middle East issues," Scheffel stated.

MacDonald said the board had received a request from its student representative "for a motion to consider divestment. The board executive determined that this issue had already been satisfactorily addressed by the Pension Committee and as a result the motion would not be considered. Student groups were not happy with this response and indicated that they would then 'disrupt' the board meeting."

The university has set out "broad investment guidelines" in its Statement of Investment Policies and Procedures and managers of the pension fund make their investment decisions accordingly, MacDonald stated.

The pension fund pools the contributions of university staff and faculty. "The fund is for these employees and retirees of the university and the university's obligation is to ensure that the fund is invested in the best interest of the plan's beneficiaries (i.e. staff and faculty). Students have no standing with regard to the pension fund or its administration, unless of course they are also employees of the university and are paying into the fund," he said.

"The pension committee will continue to fulfil its fiduciary obligations according to the law, and that means generating the best possible risk adjusted rate of return for plan members. The university is not considering divestment from Israel," MacDonald stated.

Israel pressing UN to halt new Gaza aid flotilla

Amos Harel
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Security officials and the Foreign Ministry have started preparing feverishly for the expected arrival of another Gaza flotilla in late May. More than 1,000 leftists and pro-Palestinian activists are expected to take part in the flotilla, which sources say will include more than 20 vessels of various sizes.

Drawing lessons from the controversy over the raid on the Turkish Mavi Marmara ship last May, and from the recommendations made after the investigation of the incident by the Turkel commission, Israeli officials are preparing in advance for another such protest at sea.

In recent weeks, Jerusalem has engaged in a large-scale diplomatic effort aimed at pressuring heads of states in countries from which ships are expected to sail, to discourage their citizens from taking part. The hope is that such an effort will head off a large-scale "sequel" to last year's flotilla. Furthermore, in the event that another military raid is called for, this time Israel wants to be able to claim that every possible effort was made to stop the ships peaceably.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu called on UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon Friday to stop the impending flotilla that is supposed to set sail to the Gaza Strip in May.

The Israeli prime minister told the UN chief that the flotilla is being organized by extreme Islamists that are interested only in provocation.

Jerusalem has engaged in a large-scale diplomatic effort

He added that the ship's key goal is to fuel tensions, particularly in light of the fact that the Gaza Strip is open to all types of goods brought in via land.

The prime minister then reminded the UN chief of the recent incident of the Victoria ship earlier this month, upon which tens of tons of weapons from Iran were found and confiscated by Israel. Netanyahu told Ban that this is proof that Israel must act aggressively against the flotilla.

The Israel Navy intercepted an estimated 50 tons of weapons from Iran earlier this month aboard the Victoria, a cargo ship bound for the Gaza Strip, including sophisticated land-to-sea missiles that could have enabled Palestinian militants to hit ships at Ashdod Port or at sea, or other Israeli targets like a crude oil depot or a gas drilling rig.

Israel began a public campaign this month against the Turkish IHH organization as well as other left-wing European organizations who plan on sending a flotilla to May.

Fifteen ships are expected to head towards the strip.

The organizers of the upcoming flotilla have named it the "Freedom Fleet".

Some Israeli security officials are discussing a possible relaxation of the siege on the Gaza Strip. The main advocate of such a move is Maj. Gen. Eitan Dangot, co-ordinator of government activities in the territories. He believes that loosening restrictions on the entry of goods would be an effective response to allegations that Israel is infringing the basic rights of Gaza residents, and would defuse many of the claims made by the flotilla organizers.

Concurrently, the navy is completing preparations for a scenario in which its men would have to use force in another raid on a ship. As happened with the Marmara, responsibility for such a raid would devolve upon the naval commando unit; members of this unit have been training for several different eventualities.

The Turkish organization IHH, which was involved in last year's flotilla, is also taking part in planning the new one. The Marmara has apparently been pressed into service for another trip to the Gaza coast.

The event is planned for May 31, the one-year anniversary of the death of nine Turkish activists during the Israel Defence Forces' raid on the Marmara. The objective of this flotilla would be both to commemorate those killed as well as to demand that the siege on Gaza be lifted.

Retraction shows West's changed attitude toward Israel

Aluf Benn
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Israel achieved a major public relations coup this weekend, comparable to the United Nations rescission of its notorious resolution equating Zionism with racism.

South African Judge Richard Goldstone, who came to symbolize more than anyone else the efforts to delegitimize Israel as a civilized and law-abiding country, has now retracted his allegations that Israel had committed war crimes and crimes against humanity during Operation Cast Lead.

Opinion

In his opinion piece published in Friday's Washington Post, Goldstone underlined Israel's clear moral superiority over Hamas, saying the Israel Defence Forces did not intentionally hit civilians in its operation in the Gaza Strip, while Gazans by contrast did in fact deliberately hit Israeli civilians.

Goldstone also acknowledged being naive in thinking Hamas would conduct itself as a law-abiding government and investigate allegations of its own war crimes and crimes against humanity committed by those firing rockets and mortar shells from the Strip into Israel. He has come to the understanding, however belatedly, that Hamas is not interested in humanitarian laws or human rights, but rather only in waging war against Israel.

Now Goldstone is calling for the international community to enforce the laws of war that apply to states as well as to entities such as the Hamas-controlled Gaza Strip.

Goldstone's change in position followed hundreds of IDF investigations into exceptional events during Cast Lead. Doubtless, these investigations would not have come about had it not been for the Goldstone report and concern over a future international investigation. In this way, the former jurist performed a service in support of the IDF's enforcement of the laws of war and in deterring Israel from entanglement in a new operation in Gaza.

It is once again clear that Israel erred in boycotting the Goldstone commission and in refusing to co-operate with it. Former cabinet minister Isaac Herzog was correct in advocating dialogue with Goldstone, but stood against 11 cabinet colleagues.

The lesson to be drawn here is that we must not cut ourselves off and assume that judges and investigators are biased against us. Even if that is the case, it's better to fight Israel's cause during the investigation rather than counter subsequent conclusions by the UN that have already been officially adopted.

Goldstone's op-ed provides Turkey and Israel the opportunity to rehabilitate their relations, which soured over Cast Lead. If Israel's explanations are worthy of consideration, it may mean its explanations about the flotilla are, too.

Secondly and more importantly, the new Goldstone captures the change in how the West relates to Israel against the backdrop of the turmoil in the Arab world. Israel may be aggressive sometimes, but there is no other country in the Middle East whose stability is assured and which isn't threatened by a popular uprising. Israel isn't perfect, but it's much closer to Western standards than its enemies.

"Something that has not been recognized often enough is the fact that our report marked the first time illegal acts of terrorism from Hamas were being investigated and condemned by the United Nations," Goldstone wrote.

His report "found evidence of potential war crimes and 'possibly crimes against humanity' by both Israel and Hamas. That the crimes allegedly committed by Hamas were intentional goes without saying – its rockets were purposefully and indiscriminately aimed at civilian targets.

"That comparatively few Israelis have been killed by the unlawful rocket and mortar attacks from Gaza in no way minimizes the criminality. The UN Human Rights Council should condemn these heinous acts in the strongest terms," Goldstone wrote.

Goldstone also urged the UN's rights body to condemn a recent stabbing attack in the West Bank settlement of Itamar, saying that "the Human Rights Council should condemn the inexcusable and cold-blooded recent slaughter of a young Israeli couple and three of their small children in their beds.

"Simply put, the laws of armed conflict apply no less to non-state actors such as Hamas than they do to national armies," Goldstone concluded. "Ensuring that non-state actors respect these principles, and are investigated when they fail to do so, is one of the most significant challenges facing the law of armed conflict.

"Only if all parties to armed conflicts are held to these standards will we be able to protect civilians who, through no choice of their own, are caught up in war."

On Saturday, Hamas dismissed Goldstone's remarks.

"His retreat does not change the fact war crimes had been committed against 1.5 million people in Gaza," Hamas spokesman Sami Abu Zuhri said, adding that the group had co-operated fully with Goldstone's mission.

Palestinian Foreign Minister Riyad al-Malki said Goldstone's comments did not change anything. "The report was as clear as the crimes that Israel committed during the war," he said.

Earlier on Saturday, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu called on the United Nations to retract the Goldstone report in light of last week's column.

"The fact that Goldstone changed his mind must lead to the shelving of the report once and for all," Netanyahu said.

Canada was the sole UNHRC member to vote against the commissioning of the Goldstone Mission in January 2009. The country also opposed the UNHRC endorsement of the report on Oct. 16, 2009.

In a statement on Sunday, the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) and the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) called Goldstone's recantation a vindication for Israel and praised the Canadian government for its "principled" support of Israel throughout the Goldstone investigation.

Moshe Ronen, national chair of CIC, also noted "the early and unequivocal rejection" of the report from Liberal MPs Irwin Cotler and Bob Rae.

Steven Cummings, CIJA's national chair, said the Goldstone report's "slanderous allegations against Israel are now completely discredited, and our government's position in this regard is vindicated."

He added: "We are hopeful that this key development will prompt Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch to review their own reports, which will no doubt reveal a bias similar to that found in the Goldstone report."

In the United States, the American Jewish Committee also called on Goldstone to ask UNHRC to update the 2009 report in a way that aligns its conclusions with his new thinking on what transpired.

"The Washington Post is not the place for Judge Goldstone to recant the biased and damaging UN report he wrote on the Gaza conflict," AJC executive director David Harris said. "Judge Goldstone should apologize to the State of Israel for the accusations of intentionally targeting civilians, which he now admits were unfounded. He should present his updated conclusions to the UN Human Rights Council, as well as to the General Assembly, which endorsed the skewed report, and press for its rejection."

Israeli Foreign Ministry sources said Sunday that Israel will probably be unable to bring about the cancellation of the damning Goldstone report on its conduct during the war in Gaza.

Netanyahu has assigned national security adviser Ya'akov Amidror to set up a joint team of staff from the foreign, defence and justice ministries with the task of formulating political and legal recommendations following Goldstone's article.

Foreign Ministry sources, however, said that in the best of circumstances, it might be possible for the UN General Assembly to adopt a new resolution concluding that an earlier resolution, passed a year ago, which fully adopted the Goldstone report, is no longer valid.

Manitoba representative meets with Israeli companies

Jenny Hazan
CJN Israel Bureau

TEL AVIV — Mel Lazareck, Manitoba's special representative to Israel for economic and community relations, recently met with staff from various Israeli water, medical and technology organizations.

Over the past two weeks, Lazareck has had discussions with representatives of private companies, university departments and quasi-governmental organizations.

"My ultimate goal is to develop relationships with a variety of Manitoba and Israeli organizations to their mutual benefit," says Lazareck, a retired businessman who was appointed special representative by Manitoba Premier Greg Selinger in October 2010.

Manitoba is on a population growth spurt, Lazareck said, and the province is committed to improving and widening the economy.

"We're looking at other parts of the world where they may know what they're doing, and that's Israel," he said. "Israel punches far above its weight."

Initially, the government of Manitoba came to Israel on a quest for water expertise. Despite that Lake Winnipeg is bigger than Israel, and unlike Israel, the province is replete with natural resources, the two places have some water issues in common. Israel, having coped with decades of water shortage, has engineered unparallelled solutions for dealing with water issues.

The relationship between Manitoba and Israel began when the former president of Keren Kayemeth LeIsrael – Jewish National Fund (KKL-JNF) for the Prairie region of Canada, the late Graham Dixon, suggested Manitoba Minister of Water Stewardship Christine Melnick look to Israel for answers to some of the province's water problems, particularly those related to the rehabilitation of Lakes Winnipeg and Manitoba's Netley/Libau wetlands.

Since then, there have been two major joint Manitoba-Israel water symposia, one in August 2008 and one in January 2010. Selinger came to visit Israel in October 2010, and memorandums of understanding (MOU) have been signed regarding co-operative research between Israeli and Manitoba scientists on a number of issues, including wastewater recycling, nutrient management, and wetland preservation. An MOU has also been signed between the province of Manitoba and the Society for the Protection of Nature in Israel (SPNI) on birding research and ecotourism.

Melnick has been at the forefront of these initiatives, said Lazareck.

"I do not believe any other government has taken such a public stand on their ongoing relationship with Israel.

Mel Lazareck, Manitoba's special representative to Israel for economic and community relations. [Photo courtesy of Winnipeg Jewish Review]

In general, Canada is very supportive of Israel, but Manitoba is just exceptional. We're hoping this sort of initiative will spread to other provincial governments," he said.

This year, Melnick will be awarded Manitoba's KKL-JNF's Negev Award, which she will receive in a ceremony in Winnipeg on May 31. "We anticipate that Minister Melnick will continue to set a strong example that will influence others to see Israel in a positive light," Lazareck said.

Over the past two weeks, Lazareck, who took over Dixon's role in September 2007, has met with representatives from the Mekorot, Israel's national water company; with Global Water Technologies in Herzliya, which developed a way to monitor city water systems; and with water experts at Ben-Gurion University, who are working on grey water recycling.

"We've had some great meetings, and we expect they will lead to collaborations on various water programs," Lazareck said. "Manitoba may have eight per cent of the fresh water in the world. But we're not taking it for granted."

Lazareck would also like to take the Manitoba-Israel relationship beyond water and establish co-operative ties between the two places in the fields of medicine and technology. This trip, he met with researchers at the Technion – Israel Institute of Technology in Haifa, who are developing various robotic-based medical technologies.

"Israel is second in the world after the U.S. in the development of new technology, and we would like to bring some of these technologies back to Manitoba," he said.

Lazareck said he hoped that the JNF World Leadership Conference, that took place in Eilat from March 27 to April 1, would result in further avenues of co-operation. "The relationship between Manitoba and Israel is getting stronger and that's wonderful," he said.

Israel Briefs

Hezbollah bunkers in Lebanon

Israel declassified a map of what it says are 950 underground Hezbollah bunkers and weapons storage sites in south Lebanon. The map, appearing last week in the Washington Post, underpins Israeli frustration with the failure of the United Nations-mandated force in southern Lebanon to stop weapons smuggling since the end of the 2006 war. Instead, Israeli leaders have said, Hezbollah's missile strength is far greater than what it was before the war. Israeli leaders fear what they believe is the recent consolidation of Hezbollah's dominance of Lebanon's government, as well as the likelihood that the group will strike against Israel should a UN tribunal recommend the prosecution of the group's leadership for the 2005 assassination of moderate political leader Rafik Hariri.

Rockets among civilians

A Palestinian human rights group in the Gaza Strip condemned the storage of rockets used against Israel in civilian populated areas. The Palestinian Center for Human Rights in a statement posted on its website last week called on the Hamas-controlled government in Gaza to investigate three incidents of homemade rockets exploding in densely populated civilian neighbourhoods, causing heavy property damage and injuring six Palestinians, including a baby. The centre also noted that "members of the Palestinian resistance continue to store explosives or to treat such explosives in locations close to populated areas. This poses a major threat to the lives of the Palestinian civilians and constitutes a violation of both international human rights law and the international humanitarian law." The statement did not condemn the firing of the rockets on Israeli citizens, however.

Tunisia criticizes Israel

Tunisia's government condemned an Israeli government decision to offer extra financial assistance to Tunisian Jews wishing to immigrate to Israel. The approval of the new program amounts to interference in Tunisia's domestic affairs and is "an attempt by Israel to tarnish the post-revolutionary image of Tunisia," Tunisia's Foreign Ministry said in a statement last week. Under the plan approved by Israel, Tunisian immigrants will receive special financial assistance of more than $9,000 in addition to the usual aid provided to new immigrants. "We know that there is real distress among the Jews of Tunisia, many of whom would like to immigrate to Israel," Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said. "Israel is the state of the Jews. It worries about Jews wherever they are – those who are here and those who would like to come here." Minister Sofa Landver said, About 1,500 Jews are living in Tunisia. Some 1,100 live in Djerba, with the rest in the capital city of Tunis. Ten Tunisian Jews made aliyah to Israel with the help of the Jewish Agency in late January amid political upheaval and violence that led to the overthrow of Tunisian President Zein el-Abbadin Bin Ali.

U of T joins excavation project in Israel

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

University of Toronto archaeologists have joined a project to unearth the remains of a synagogue found close to an ancient village Jesus once called home.

In June, U of T will be one of five universities that will participate in the Huqoq Excavation Project (HEP), directed by Jodi Magness, religious studies professor at the University of North Carolina, and David Amit, an archaeologist with the Israel Antiquities Authority.

The goal of the project is to excavate the late Roman and Byzantine site of Huqoq in Israel near the Sea of Galilee to uncover the remains of a synagogue and understand its setting in the village.

Huqoq, which was abandoned in the Middle Ages and later reinhabited by Arabs until the State of Israel was established in 1948, lies about five kilometres west of Capernaum – which is where Jesus is believed to have lived as an adult – and about five kilometres north of Migdal, the birthplace of Mary Magdalene.

"We, at U of T, have been looking for a site that we could contribute to," said Michael Chazan, U of T's director of the Archaeology Centre.

He said he was turned on to the project by Hindy Najman, U of T's Centre for Jewish Studies director and Tim Harrison, a professor in the department of Near and Middle Eastern Civilizations.

"We don't have anyone here who specializes in archaeology of these time periods, but we have quite a number of people who work on the history and religion of the Galilee during the classical periods – early Christianity, early Judaism, post-Second Temple Judaism," Chazan said.

Once the decision was made to join the project, Chazan contacted Alex Gropper, president of U of T's Canadian Institute for Mediterranean Studies (CIMS) who has led past archaeological digs to Israel, in the hope that he could raise some awareness and funds.

Gropper, who agreed to have CIMS sign on as a co-sponsor for the project, said the dig may provide more clues about the birth of Christianity and rabbinic Judaism.

"It's a really germane period. And this is the area where much of it happened, the Galilee," Gropper said.

"The site is off the beaten track and it could give us an idea of what ordinary life was like. It… shows you how people lived on an everyday basis."

Chazan said the project, which will continue over the course of seven years, is open to U of T students who are looking for excavation experience.

He said he expects that up to five students who are interested in biblical studies, will join the dig in June.

"There is a lot to learn about the economy in the Galilee, how societies developed, how synagogues fit into village life and these are things that we want our students to learn to be really good archaeologists," Chazan said.

He added that with this upcoming dig, there is potential to gather much more information about the Roman and Byzantine period than archaeologists have in the past because of the advancement in recovery methods.

"Things like recovering the plant foods that they ate, what animal bones are found on the site… I'm hoping to be over there for at least a short time to help develop the techniques," Chazan said.

Gropper, who had a hand in bringing the Dead Sea Scrolls to the Royal Ontario Museum in 2009, felt the Huqoq dig would be a perfect fit for another project he's working on called the Jewish-Italian Friendship initiative.

Gropper said he committed to the initiative – which involves other organizations including the Italian and Israeli consul generals in Toronto, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Canadian Jewish Congress – after he met Gianni Bardini, Toronto's consul general of Italy, at an academic conference.

"He told me that he was at a lecture about an Italian Holocaust survivor who had been deported to Auschwitz as a young girl and he was so moved. He said it would be great to do something to highlight the relationship between our two communities," Gropper said.

Since then, Gropper had been searching for a project that the Jewish-Italian Friendship initiative could adopt. When Chazan filled him in on the Huqoq dig, he knew he'd found the perfect event.

"Here is a site that is a Roman period dig in Israel from the time of Jesus."

Gropper said he already has a commitment from Phil Sabatino, a prominent Italian businessman and philanthropist, to cover the initial costs of the project, which is $5,000.

Gropper added that he's working on raising an additional $10,000 for each year of the dig.

Chazan said he is excited about the Huqoq dig because there is so much potential to learn more about an area of the world that has already been explored in depth.

He hopes this will give people another way to connect to Israel.

"This is a really good opportunity to involve people in the archaeology of Israel, which is a really important and exciting part for people who are connected to Israel."

Argentina reported ready to quash AMIA investigation

Diego Melamed
JTA

BUENOS AIRES — Argentina Foreign Minister Hector Timerman said he is committed to continuing the investigation of two bombings in 1994 of Jewish targets in his country.

Timerman made the commitment last week during a meeting in Buenos Aires with Natan Sharansky, head of the Jewish Agency, according to reports.

Timerman's promise to continue to seek justice in the attacks comes following a report last weekend in the weekly Argentine newspaper Perfil alleging that the South American country told Iran it would stop investigating two bombings of Jewish targets in exchange for better trade relations.

Israel had threatened to cancel Timerman's scheduled visit to the Jewish state set for this week if he did not clarify that Argentina would continue to pursue the investigations. Iran is accused of being behind the attacks.

Timerman, who is Jewish, reportedly made the offer to Iran during a visit to Syria in January. Syrian President Bashar Assad and Foreign Minister Walid Moallem reportedly were the mediators, and brought the offer to Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

According to Perfil, Argentina was hoping the deal would lead to more trade with Iran, which is currently estimated at $1.2 billion a year.

Under the reported deal, which is based on a classified Iranian document, Argentina would drop its investigations into the 1992 bombing of the Israeli Embassy in Argentina, which killed 29 and injured 242, and the 1994 bombing of the AMIA Jewish Center in Buenos Aires, in which 85 people were killed and more than 300 injured.

Consternation mounted in Argentina and Israel after the document was leaked.

The Perfil broke the story with a report based on what it said was an Iranian document showing that the foreign minister, Hector Timerman, made the offer to Iran via Syrian intermediaries. According to the paper, opponents of the regime in Tehran leaked the documents.

Until now, Argentina has been one of the most vociferous critics of Iran in all of Latin America.

At last year's annual UN General Assembly gathering of heads of state, Argentine President Cristina Fernandez de Kirchner called on Iran to surrender the Iranian officials wanted in connection with the 1994 bombing.

The report touched on raw nerves in the Argentine Jewish community regarding the still-unresolved attack, and prompted heated debate over whether or not it is true.

Sergio Widder, the Latin American representative of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, urged the Argentine government to establish a special investigation unit for the 1992 Israeli Embassy bombing, just as it has done for the AMIA attack.

Alberto Nissman, the chief prosecutor in the AMIA bombing case, expressed incredulity regarding the Perfil article.

"I can't trust in this internal document of Iran, and it is incredible that Perfil published it," he said. "Even if there is an agreement, nobody will stop me" from bringing the perpetrators to justice. Nissman promised that this year would show more progress in his investigation than the last three years combined, with more evidence of the involvement of Iranian officials in the 1994 attack.

Technion grads key factor behind 'Start-up Nation'

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Which is it, science or science fiction: microscopic robots that swim in the blood, clean plaque and deliver medicine; devices buried under highways that can turn the vibrations of ground-level traffic into electricity; a battery made from lithium and air that can last up to 100 years.

Pretty "out there" stuff – sort of what you'd expect in the latest Star Trek movie. But, unlike the fantasy world of the Hollywood magic factory, these are real world ideas that are the creations of the brainiacs from the Technion-Israel Institute of Technology in Haifa.

The Technion is a world leader in all kinds of scientific and engineering applications – everything from medicine to robotics, said Peretz Lavie, president of the institution. Lavie was in Toronto last week to address a gathering of the Economic Club of Canada and answer questions from close to 300 young adults who are being recruited as supporters of the institution by Canadian businessman and philanthropist Seymour Schulich.

Lavie's pitch is simple: Start-up Nation, the name given the State of Israel by authors Dan Senor and Saul Singer relies to a great extent on the ingenuity, ideas, skills and risk-taking of Technion grads. The Technion trains Israel's "creme de la creme" in the sciences, medicine and engineering and these people go on to create start-up companies, or work for established firms where they develop technologies and innovations that are marketable and which change people's lives around the world.

The highway vibration technology, for one, is currently being field tested and has great potential, he said.

And take a look at aerospace, Lavie offers. Every other country that launches a rocket does so in an easterly direction. Easterly launches take advantage of the earth's rotation and make liftoffs easier.

To avoid the possibility of a rocket coming down on one of its eastern neighbours, Israel has been forced to launch its rockets to the west. To compensate for the difficulty in doing so, Israel developed micro-payloads, satellites as small as 150 kilograms, in the process becoming a world leader in that area, Lavie said.

Peretz Lavie

And who are the engineers behind that effort? Technion people, of course.

Many technological innovations that are now taken for granted were developed by Technion graduates, Lavie said. Jpegs, the compressed photo format familiar to anyone who uses a computer, are based on an algorithm developed at the Technion in the 1980s; instant messaging, evolved from ICQ, which again can be traced back to former Technion students; computer memory keys (think F1, F2, etc.), also developed by Technion grads; Intel's processing chips were developed in Haifa by Technion graduates; and so on.

"Israel is like another Silicon Valley and what is developed in Israel affects everybody in the world," Lavie said.

The Technion's economic contribution to Israel is immense, he continued. Israel today boasts 4,000 startups, more than the entire European Union, and "75 per cent... were founded by our graduates."

There are 121 Israeli companies listed on the NASDAQ exchange, behind only American companies and far eclipsing Canada's 43. Of the 121, 49 were either founded or run by Technion people, Lavie said.

So what makes the Technion such an effective incubator of marketable technological innovation?

"In order to be innovative, you need to be motivated by a need to change the world," Lavie said. "It's kind of a Jewish tradition that you'd like to do something meaningful.

"In Israel, the chutzpah is working for you in challenging ways of doing things. You do everything to go to the crux of matters. So, Israelis take risks, they dare, they [may] fail, but they go on."

Military service plays an important role, he continued. It "prepares you for a life of risk-taking" and confers significant responsibility of young people.

Other factors contribute to the country's excellence in scientific achievement, Lavie continued. "Israel has been immensely helped by the Russian immigration. Many of them are highly talented and educated. They joined the labour force and now Israel has the highest rate of engineers and technicians in the world."

What's more, Israel proves the old aphorism of necessity being the mother of invention. Lavie said the Technion established its micro-electronic research institute in 1969 only after then French President Charles de Gaulle decided to embargo high-tech Mirage jets and infrared sensors that Israel had purchased. "That became the cornerstone of the entire high-tech industry," he said.

But all is not rosy in the Jewish state when it comes to preparing young people for the brave new world of high-tech and innovation.

"Israel has a crisis in K-12 [education]," Lavie said. "The Technion gets the creme de la creme, seven or eight per cent of high school graduates." But few Israeli students value the sciences and Israeli kids perform poorly internationally in science and math tests.

Lavie raised a lot of eyebrows when he went public with his contention that the situation is a crisis at least as grave as the country's security concerns.

The education system needs to be addressed, he said. Teachers are poorly paid and young people have too many course options – a mind-boggling 115 to choose from.

The result is lack of attention on "core courses."

Lavie believes high schools have to get back to focusing on the sciences, humanities and social studies.

"I believe we have to go back to the basics. People are starting to realize it," he said.

In addition , the "social stigma" against blue collar technical schools has to be addressed.

The Technion is doing its part. "We are now involving Technion grads to be teachers. We're appealing to their Zionistic motives."

On the Canadian front, the Technion is likewise planning for the future. Last week's event, sponsored by Schulich, was aimed at attracting young supporters for the institute. The Technion, like other organizations that rely on contributors from the Jewish community, has depended on the backing of people who witnessed the birth of the State of Israel and experienced the Holocaust.

Younger people, those 22-45, did not share those experiences and don't feel as close to Israel.

The image of Israel as the David fending off Goliath is long gone. "There's a constant barrage of anti-Israel, mixed with antisemitic propaganda. On many U.S. campuses, the pro-Palestinian campaign is so vicious and intense, it affects the young generation," Lavie said.

Where the Technion steps in is to present the institution as "a noble idea" and "to remind them it is an institution worth supporting, not only because it is Israeli, but because it is a world class university that helps people around the world."

Startup negotiating billion-dollar exit

Guy Grimland and Amitai Ziv
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israeli startup Conduit is on the verge of a huge exit: it is negotiating a sale estimated at over $1 billion (all figures US). Among the potential buyers being mentioned are such giants as Microsoft and Google.

Conduit, considered one of the most promising high-tech companies in Israel, was founded in 2005 and creates platforms for browser toolbars and applications. If the deal comes off, it would be the biggest sale of an Internet firm in Israeli history.

Conduit's products allow anyone, including small firms, to create personalized toolbars. Clients range from small stores to the NBA and singer Rihanna.

The company raised only $9.5 million in 2005 and 2008, and is considered profitable. It had revenues of about $100 million in 2009 and $300 million in 2010. Conduit has 250 employees in its centre in Nes Tziona, 100 of whom were hired in the last year.

Shaul Olmert, the chief marketing officer, refused to comment on a sale. "We have tried to build an Internet company on an international scale in Israel," he said. The company was committed to Israel and would continue to grow here, he added.

In the past, Conduit turned down a buyout offer of $100 million.

The company can boast 230 million users of its products – half the number of Facebook users, but more than LinkedIn and Twitter. Conduit is also more profitable than those firms, said Olmert.

The three founders, CEO and chair Ronen Shilo; chief technology officer Dror Erez; and chief operating officer Gaby Bilczyk, own 48 per cent of the company, and they will take home the biggest share of the money. The Yozma venture capital fund invested $1.5 million in the firm in 2005 and owns a 10 per cent share. Benchmark Capital holds 21 per cent after investing $8.5 million in 2008.

India-born Ellis Jacob leads Cineplex chain

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Moviegoers from Quebec to British Columbia often watch their favourite films in theatres owned by Cineplex Entertainment, Canada's largest motion-picture exhibition company. With 1,353 screens in 131 theatres, Cineplex controls about 70 per cent of the Canadian box office.

The man who created this empire, Ellis Jacob, is the president and CEO of Cineplex Entertainment. Recently appointed a member of the Order of Canada, Jacob has come a mighty long way since his arrival here in 1969 as a 16-year-old teenager from Calcutta, India.

"There was no grand plan when I came to Canada," said Jacob, who lived here on a student visa after attending his sister's wedding. "I felt there were a lot of opportunities in Canada."

A Sephardi Jew whose Iraqi and Syrian ancestors settled in India in the first years of the 20th century, Jacob adapted quickly to his new surroundings. He studied at Montreal's Dawson College, finished a commerce degree at McGill University and graduated from York University with an MBA.

After vaulting to the vice-presidency at Motorola, a multinational communications firm, Jacob, in 1987, joined Cineplex Odeon Corporation, which at its peak in the 1980s was the biggest movie exhibitor in North America. Cineplex was his introduction to the film industry. On his first day on the job, he discovered he had no office, much less a telephone.

Cineplex, controlled by Garth Drabinsky and Myron Gottlieb until their ouster, was in a state of financial chaos. "We were bleeding badly," said Jacob, who held various positions at Cineplex until he was appointed chief operating officer in 1989. "We were $700 million in debt, and 19 banks were breathing down my back."

Things got so bad at one point that Jacob could barely meet the payroll. Describing this turbulent period as exceedingly difficult, Jacob managed to pick up the pieces.

More storm clouds rolled in about a decade later after Loews, a U.S. conglomerate, took over Cineplex and moved headquarters to New York City. "I was ceremoniously fired," he said ruefully.

Marooned in Toronto, Jacob went to work for Alliance Atlantis Communications Inc. before co-founding Galaxy Entertainment Inc. in 1999.

"When Galaxy was started, everyone thought I'd fail," he recalled in an interview in his boardroom. "We created a niche, despite the naysayers."

Four years later, Galaxy and Cineplex merged, forming Cineplex Income trust.

In 2005, in what he says was the high point of his career, Cineplex purchased its chief competitor, Famous Players Theatres, in a dramatic corporate coup, and rebranded itself Cineplex Entertainment.

Since then, much to the chagrin of competitors like Empire and AMC, Cineplex, a public company, has prospered. Attendance has grown from 56 million in 2005 to 69.4 million in 2010. Box office revenue during the same period has leaped from $447 million to $601 million.

"Total revenues, for the first time in our history, crossed $1 billion last year," said Pat Marshall, vice-president of communications and investor relations.

As well, Jacob has diversified Cineplex's base, taking it into alternative areas such as live opera, concerts, wrestling and last winter's Olympic Games in British Columbia.

He almost chuckled as he reeled off these accomplishments. "The media has been predicting our demise," he said in reference to the challenges the motion-picture exhibition industry has encountered in the face of innovative, path-breaking technologies.

Far from fazing him, the rapid pace of technology has reinvigorated Jacob. He has phased in a new digital download service that enables consumers to watch films from home and launched Cineplex mobile apps for BlackBerry, iPhone and other smartphones. And he has seen to it that theatre tickets can be bought on mobile devices. "We've been very innovative," he said.

Jacob, too, has revamped theatres, bringing in larger screens, Dolby digital surround sound and extra-wide high-back rocker seats. And he has introduced reserve seating.

Much to the resentment of some movie fans, advertisements preceding trailers have grown incrementally. "Ads allow me to keep ticket prices down," said Jacob, who ordinarily watches two films per month but many more when film festivals roll around.

Although he is pleased by Cineplex's market share, Jacob has been thinking of expanding outside Canada, into countries where English is widely spoken. But he has ruled out the United States. "In the U.S., we'd be a minnow in an ocean."

He ascribes his success to his seasoned management team, his tough but fair approach and an inclination to check his ego at the office door.

His friend and colleague, the producer Robert Lantos, believes he owes his success to acute instincts and a superb knowledge of the film, exhibition and distribution business.

Not surprisingly, Jacob works long hours. "He's always working," said Marshall.

"You have to forget the life-work balance," said Jacob, who has two grown children – Lauren, a film marketing executive, and Resa, a law student – with his wife, Sharyn.

Jacob, the youngest of four siblings and the son of a sales manager, regards India with the warmest of feelings. "It's amazing and different," said Jacob, who has visited India twice since leaving. "That's what is so great about India."

Nonetheless, he is saddened by the fact that Calcutta's Jewish community has so dwindled in the past four decades. "Pretty well everyone is gone," said Jacob, who has distant relatives in Mumbai and whose uncle, Jack, was an Indian army general. "But I had a great life in India. I really enjoyed living there."

He is grateful to his adopted homeland. "As a Canadian, I've been very fortunate," mused Jacob, who sits on the boards of Baycrest and Mount Sinai Hospital. "Canada has been very good to me."

Book chronicles history of London, Ont. Jews

Marni Shankman
Co-op Student

A book on the London's Jewish community has just been published and will be launched in Toronto in May.

A History of the Jewish Community of London Ontario by Bill Gladstone (Now and Then Press) chronicles the history of the Jews in the southwestern Ontario city, from the 1850s to the present.

Based on interviews, birth, marriage, naturalization papers, and death and census records, the book traces the lives of prominent Jewish figures who emerged from London and left their mark on the world. It outlines the rise of the community, its organizations and its leaders over the decades.

One chapter is devoted to the wave of immigrants that arrived in London from Europe between 1900 and the early 1920s.

Subsequent chapters chronicle 50 Holocaust survivors' families and the wave of assimilation that hit the city in the late 1960s, when previously "restricted" areas opened their doors to Jews for the first time.

Gladstone, a CJN columnist and a contributor to the Globe and Mail, has written several other books, including Roots and Remembrance, a book on Jewish genealogy, and a commissioned history of Toronto's Beth Tzedec Congregation, due for publication in 2011.

A History of the Jewish Community of London Ontario was launched in London on April 3, with all book-sale proceeds donated to the London Jewish Federation.

In Toronto, the Ontario Jewish Archives is holding a second book launch at the Lipa Green Centre on May 4 at 7:30 p.m., with a portion of sales going to the OJA.

To attend the OJA launch, RSVP by phone by calling 416-635-2883, ext. 5170, or e-mail oja1@ujafed.org.

Ghost Stories will take audiences on a thrill ride

Kathryn Kates

According to the producers, who are keeping details of the show under wraps so as not spoil the theatrical experience, Ghost Stories takes the audience on a thrill ride, delivering some indescribable and unforgettable moments.

Nominated for two of London's prestigious Olivier Awards, this 80-minute thrilling production is not for the faint-hearted, but great for those who love the macabre.

"Ghost Stories is an examination of paranormal activities," actor Darrin Baker, who plays real estate agent Mike Priddle, says. "It confronts our belief or disbelief in the spirit world in a highly theatrical and visceral way by relaying the stories of several people who experience paranormal phenomena.

"Their stories are startling and cannot be explained using language. They need to be experienced to even begin to understand them."

Baker says Ghost Stories offers a mysterious appeal that has made it a huge success in London.

"I think the elements that make it such a thrill ride are its use of comedy, suspense, eerie silence and brilliant stage effects," he says. "As far as I know, it is really the first time anyone has attempted to put a modern-day ghost-story thriller on stage like this. The production tackles it in a very cinematic-like way."

In London, the reviews did not give away details about the play.

"My personal belief is that everything is so given away in trailers for films and even plays these days, and that the element of true surprise is often gone. This show promises a thrill ride and an unexpected journey that will have you thinking seriously about how you feel about ghosts," says Baker, who admits he believes in ghosts.

Darrin Baker

He says he's excited to be working with such a fantastic and first-rate all-Canadian cast in this production directed by Jeremy Dyson, Sean Holmes and Andy Nyman. The cast includes Jason Blicker, Jack Langedijk, David Reale, Greg Gale and Jonathan Purdon.

Baker just returned to Toronto from New York City, where he has been living for the past 21 years. During that time he had several leading roles on Broadway, including in Sunset Boulevard with Glenn Close; in The Scarlet Pimpernel; Footloose; Laughing Room Only!, opposite Jackie Mason; in Wonderful Town with Brooke Shields and in Tarzan.

Toronto audiences may remember Baker in Hello Muddah, Hello Fadduh! and from the original Canadian cast of Les Miz.

"Often actors hit their peak in Toronto and then go south of the border to Broadway or Los Angeles. I did it the opposite way. I was blessed to do seven Broadway shows, but it is such a thrill to come back to the country I was born in and to know that there is top-notch theatre and a public that wants to see theatre," he says.

"There is a celebration in coming back. I'm going to park myself here for a while. I really believe that you can have a really successful career here."

Ghost Stories is playing at the Panasonic Theatre, 651 Yonge St.For tickets, visit www.mirvish.com or call Ticketking at 416-872-1212 or 1-800-461-3333. For more information, visit www.ghoststoriestoronto.com.

The Jump Artist author wins Sami Rohr prize

JTA

Austin Ratner was awarded the 2011 Sami Rohr Prize for Jewish Literature for his debut novel.

Ratner will receive the Jewish Book Council's first prize award of $100,000 for The Jump Artist. The book is based on the true story of Phillipe Halsman, a man who Adolf Hitler knew by name, who Sigmund Freud wrote about in 1930, and who put Marilyn Monroe on the cover of Life magazine.

Joseph Skibell, author of A Curable Romantic, is the runner-up and recipient of the $25,000 prize.

Other finalists were Allison Amend, author of Stations West; Nadia Kalman, author of The Cosmopolitans; and Julie Orringer, author of The Invisible Bridge.

Established in 2006, the Sami Rohr Prize for Jewish Literature honours the contribution of contemporary writers in exploring and transmitting Jewish values. The prize is intended to encourage and promote the writing of Jewish interest. Fiction and nonfiction books are considered in alternate years.

The award ceremony will be held May 31 in New York.

Kaeja d'Dance celebrates its 20th anniversary

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

On a brisk afternoon, Karen and Allen Kaeja, co-founders of Kaeja d'Dance, are consulting with their costume designer in a large Toronto dance studio.

The vintage second-floor space was once the social hall of the Bais Yehuda Synagogue, when it was on Dovercourt Road.

Karen Kaeja and a few dancers try on some of the costumes piled in the centre of the well-worn wooden floor. Once the selections are made, rehearsal for The Visitor, a sultry solo choreographed by Karen, begins. About five minutes into the piece she stops the performance. The dress isn't right, she tells the dancer. "It doesn't fit my vision."

The soloist changes into sweats and resumes dancing. Later, performer, choreographer and designer confer on a new costume. With this problem resolved, the Kaejas move on to a meeting with their lighting designer.

The fine-tuning at this rehearsal is a snapshot of the many details that must be finalized as momentum builds for 20/20 Vision, the upcoming multimedia show marking the 20th anniversary of Kaeja d'Dance.

Under the artistic direction of the husband and wife team, this internationally acclaimed contemporary dance company has become well-known for its inventive, physically demanding dance choreography and its innovative dance films.

The Kaejas call 20/20 Vision a "future-spective" showcasing three new dance works – one a North American première and two world premières. The show opens with a gala performance at the Harbourfront Centre on April 12.

Allen and Karen Kaeja have each created two works for 20/20 Vision. Karen describes The Visitor and her duet, Quenched, as "more subtle" than her husband's pieces.

"That's an understatement," he says, laughing heartily, and noting that the contrast in choreography styles is especially evident in his piece, Jericho. "It's an explosive work that challenges the traditional male and female roles. The women throw, toss and hurl the men as easily as they get tossed themselves."

Armour/Amour, his second work, fuses dance with live media, and live and prerecorded cinematography. Allen attributes this work's success to the strength of the two performers. Karen is one of them. "They are extremely versatile and powerful dancers," he says.

A scene from Jericho which challenges traditional male and female roles.

Jericho, originally commissioned for the Norwegian dance ensemble Ut i Scenekunsten, makes its North American debut at 20/20 Vision. It premièred in Oslo on Feb. 17 and was "very well received," Allen says. "We got a resounding standing ovation. It was elating.

"I had four weeks in the theatre with dancers and designers at my disposal. What a luxury!"

He can hardly contain his excitement about the success of Jericho as he clicks on a YouTube clip [tinyurl.com/48xhbum] of an excerpt from the Oslo recital.

The Norwegian hall is just one of the many international venues that have featured Kaeja d'Dance. The couple has performed across North America, Europe and Asia.

Their dance films have also been screened in many countries. In 2006, they gave presentations of dance on film at the Tel Aviv Film Festival and at Yad Vashem, Israel's official memorial to the Jewish victims of the Holocaust.

"We were told that we were the first choreographers to create the first dance films loosely based on the Holocaust," says Allen. These films, he continues, were inspired by the experiences of his late father, Morten Norris, a Holocaust survivor who spent two years in Auschwitz.

The Toronto-born Karen Resnick, a self-described late bloomer, took her first dance class the summer before she auditioned for the dance program at York University.

Initially, her main interest was in dance therapy. She founded the dance therapy program at Baycrest in 1981, as an undergraduate.

Her professors, however, steered her toward the stage, she recalls. "They kept giving me scholarships for performance study."

Allen's foray into dance was serendipitous. The native of Kitchener-Waterloo was training for the varsity wrestling team at the University of Waterloo. "I was actually invited by the Ontario Olympic Federation to compete internationally."

He took a dance class at the age of 20 to improve his balance. But he was wowed by the possibilities of choreography, he recounts. "Once I started dance class, I realized that was it."

The couple met as performers, and while Allen says he was instantly smitten, their romance took time to gel.

"He chased me for four years," Karen jokes. "When I met him, I fell in love with partnering and the potential of what we could ignite through partnering."

They were married in 1989 and have two daughters, Aniya, 17, and Mika, 12.

They established Kaeja d'Dance in 1991, "as an umbrella " for their innovative contemporary dance style, says Karen.

The name Kaeja is an amalgam of letters from the couple's given and last names. "I had no deep attachment to Norris," says Allen. "It was the surname my father took on in Canada when he immigrated. It was randomly chosen."

20/20 Vision runs at the Enwave Theatre at Harbourfront Centre from April 12 to 16. For tickets to the show or gala, call the Harbourfront box office at 416-973-4000.

Deep Jewish roots exist in Quebec City

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

Rabbi Dovid Lewin will never forget his first Shabbat in Quebec City, at the synagogue over which he presides.

He arrived at Congregation Beth Israel Ohev Shalom and found it completely empty. As he began davening, there was a knock at the door.

"I opened it to find a Jewish tourist standing there," the 31-year-old rabbi from Nice, France recalls. "He said he wanted to find out about the Jews of Quebec City, and I invited him to join me, since I wanted to do that too. That's when it became clear to me that my job here was to rebuild the community, not just for its Jewish residents, but also for Jewish tourists."

Today there are 140 Jewish families living in Quebec City. Their synagogue is an unassuming house on De Merici Street that has been converted to make room for a shul, a hall, a kosher kitchen and an office.

Since Rabbi Lewin's arrival four years ago, services on Friday nights and Saturday mornings have been reinstated and children attend weekly classes. The community gathers en masse to celebrate Jewish festivals, with kosher food trucked in from Montreal.

The number of Jews is relatively small today, and the synagogue inconspicuous. But it wasn't always that way in this 400-year-old city. A travelling exhibition titled Shalom Quebec chronicles the growth of the province's oldest Jewish community from 1608. There was a time when there were two synagogues in Quebec City, one of which was later reincarnated into a theatre.

The historic Jewish presence is easily felt in the city, Rabbi Lewin says. "One Hungarian Jew named Pollack came here with nothing and built a department store that was known throughout the city," he says.

"Even today, I get stopped on the street by people who remember Pollack and tell me of his generosity. When the store closed at the end of the day, those who could not afford new clothes were welcomed at the back door and given apparel for free. It's an amazing feeling to be told such stories," he reflects.

Today, there's talk of building a mikvah in the synagogue's basement, but its future location is still under discussion. Some believe it should be moved into the Old City, where tourists tend to congregate and where it will be more easily found by Jewish visitors. Until that's resolved, the mikvah question is mute.

The Chalouperie Godbout (longboat) houses a collection of tools from the golden age of boatbuilding.

Indeed, the Old City is a hive of activity, its massive stone walls attracting tourists and locals even when the temperature drops well below freezing. History is tangible here in immense fortifications erected by the French and English as each fought for control of the land they called New France. The city was their battleground, and their legacy was high walls that testify to the war, bloodshed and fear.

Fortunately, those walls are merely a picturesque background in the Old City today. On a summer's evening there's energy in the air as thousands congregate to watch free Cirque du Soleil performances, laugh at the antics of street artists, browse through craft markets and dine on restaurant patios and sidewalks. The melodic sounds of French punctuate the air and you have to rub your eyes to convince yourself you're in Canada, not France.

There are dozens of museums and tourist attractions in the Old City, but my favourite destination lies across the St. Lawrence River on an island called Ile d'Orleans. This rural, 34-kilometer stretch of land with 7,000 residents boasts six parishes, each with its own mayor. It's a 20-minute drive from the Old City, but it feels much further away.

That's because it's dotted with sugar houses for the maple syrup season, fruit farms, small stores selling preserves and ciders and quaint restaurants tucked into houses that date back centuries. Flowers cascade from the window sills of picturesque homes and the river is never far from sight.

Ile d'Orleans is a place of gastronomic tourism, known as the 'garden of Quebec' for its bounty of fruit, vegetables and maple products. Some 600,000 visitors cross onto the island every year, charmed by the pastoral ambience and the preservation of a simpler way of life. The islanders resisted the onslaught of visitors at first. They were used to being isolated, since it wasn't until 1935 that the Taschereau Bridge connected Orleans to the mainland. Ultimately, however, they could not deny the economic advantages that accompanied tourism, and eventually they welcomed it.

Today, there's Internet access on the island and yesteryear manors retain their gracious facades with modern interiors. But the island is full of history. We visit La Maison Drouin in the parish of Sainte-Famille, a home that dates back to the French regime in the 1700s, and one whose sole inhabitant lived quite happily within its stone walls – without electricity or plumbing – until 1984.

As we drive back towards the bridge and the bustling, traffic-filled city that awaits us on the other side, I can't help but fantasize about a home in the Quebec countryside, where peace, quiet and rural charm are so pervasive. A practical idea? Not at all. But Ile d'Orleans is the kind of place where dreams like this are oh-so-tempting.

Being Indian, Being Israeli breaks new ground

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Maina Chawla Singh spent three years in Israel from 2005 onward when her husband, a diplomat, was posted to India's embassy in Tel Aviv. While he tended to India's increasingly substantive bilateral relationship with Israel, she conducted research, gathering material about Israel's low-profile Indian Jewish community.

The fruits of her labours are found in Being Indian, Being Israeli: Migration, Ethnicity and Gender in the Jewish Homeland (Manohar). It's an important book, the first in English to explore that topic in detail.

And because the author is such a methodical and meticulous researcher, Being Indian, Being Israeli may well be recognized as the standard work on this subject. Though it is somewhat disjointed and sometimes reads like a prosaic university term paper, it also sparkles with trenchant observations.

Before writing it, Singh immersed herself in the world of Indian Jews, reading the literature and interviewing 150 Israelis of Indian descent.

To the best of her knowledge, Israel is home to more than 70,000 Indian Jews, the first wave of which arrived in 1949, within a year of Israel's declaration of statehood. The majority of Indian olim immigrated to Israel in the 1960s and '70s, leaving only a remnant of 5,000 Jews in India today.

As Singh points out, the mass migration drew on three distinct communities.

The Bene Israel (Sons of Israel), the largest group, were generally from the Bombay region and New Delhi and spoke English, Marathi, Hindi and Gujarati. The Cochin Jews, from Kerala in southern India, spoke English and Malayalam. The Baghdadi Jews, mostly of Iraqi origin and from Calcutta, conversed in English and were fluent in what she describes as "street versions" of Hindi or Hindustani.

More latterly, the Bnei Menashe, who claim descent from the Lost Tribes and hail from the states of Manipur and Mizoram in northeastern India, have settled in Israel.

In her book, Singh focus on the first three groups.

The Bene Israel – who trace their origins to a shipwrecked vessel that washed off the Konkan Coast of western India before the destruction of the Second Temple in ancient Israel – were largely urban dwellers when Zion called.

Of all the Jewish communities in India, the Bene Israel were most acculturated to their surroundings, often carried surnames that ended with the suffix "kar" or "ker" and worked in the civil service and in institutions such as the army and the railways.

The Baghdadis, many of whose breadwinners were businessmen with international connections, were identified with British rule in India and were perceived as anglicized in terms of education, clothing and attitudes.

The Cochin Jews, she notes, were mostly small merchants and remained isolated from other Indian communities.

In general, aliyah appealed not to upper-middle-class Jews reluctant to uproot themselves from homes, jobs and social networks, but to religious and poorer Jews, who tended to be Zionists.

Baghdadi emigration was in a class by itself, the anti-colonial climate of the 1940s having spurred Baghdadi Jews to emigrate. For the most part, they settled in Canada, Britain and the United States.

In many cases, she adds, children convinced their parents to move to Israel. In still other instances, parents encouraged their children to leave, being concerned they might marry non-Jews if they remained in India.

Unlike olim from oppressive countries, Indian Jews were not pushed to Israel by the forces of xenophobia or antisemitism. As Singh puts it, "Jews in India did not experience religious persecution... and therefore were not refugees. They came of their own free will... Pogroms, for the Indian Jews, were what they had read in textbooks."

Once in Israel, Indian Jewish immigrants usually had to endure hardships. Jews from frenetic cities sent to somnolent remote development towns experienced displacement. Still others, especially those with dark complexions, encountered racism and marginalization.

The Bene Israel, in particular, were shocked when the rabbinate rejected them as Jews. Singh elaborates: "To migrate on the basis of a shared Jewish identity and then feel relegated to the fringes of social acceptability was distressing."

The Bene Israel were eventually accepted as Jews, but only after a struggle that left deep scars.

Today, Indian Jews and their descendants are dispersed all over the country, in development towns like Dimona, in cities like Ashdod (which has the biggest concentration of Indian olim) and on rural moshavim like Nevatim.

They come from all walks of life, Singh says. There are professionals with white-collar jobs, entrepreneurs running companies and workers employed in factories.

Due to their English-language skills, many Indian immigrants work in the travel and tourist industry. El Al, the national carrier, has a considerable number of Indian employees, some of whom have been pilots. Indian Jews have also gravitated to jobs in hotels and resorts in Eilat.

To this day, they cling to Indian traditions and customs, lapsing into Indian regional languages and eating delicacies such as samosas and bhaji.

In short, as she observes, "South Asia remains with Indian Jews in Israel."

WINNIPEG — Besides sharing a Jewish heritage, what did Texas Rangers' second baseman Ian Kinsler and pitcher Scott Feldman, Boston Red Sox first baseman Kevin Youkilis, Washington Nationals starter Jason Marquis, and Chicago Cubs' relief hurler John Grabow have in common during the 2010 baseball season?

Well, anyone of them could have auditioned to appear in the celebrated TV series MASH – if it was still running – due to medical problems that caused them to go under the knife.

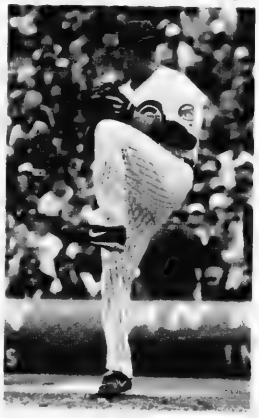
In case you didn't know, many characters in the seventh season of the show's 11-year run were named after players on the 1978 Los Angeles Dodgers.

For example, the injury-prone Kinsler, 28, didn't make the season-opener in 2010 due to a severe ankle sprain suffered in spring training. In August, he developed a slow-healing groin injury that led to his missing a total of 59 games during the regular season.

The six-foot, 200-pound infielder who can hit for average and also drive the long ball had only 391 at bats. His final numbers were .286 with nine taters and 45 RBI to go along with 15 stolen bases. Not up to par for the intense, athletic two-time all-star who hit 31 home runs and added 32 doubles in 2009.

His teammate Scott Feldman, 28, a versatile right-hander who can both start and relieve, did not deliver the goods after signing a two-year contract extension with the Rangers. In 2009 he put up a 17-8 won-lost record with an ERA of 4.08 and he won 12 consecutive games on the road. He was voted team pitcher of the year. In 2010, however, a badly bruised knee limited him to only 22 starts that saw him finish at 7-11 with a bloated ERA of 5.48 in 140 innings. The end result is that the six-foot-six, 230-pound Hawaii-born right-hander has been relegated this season from the number two starter to fifth in the rotation.

Last year Kevin Youkilis, 32, was on his way to his usually stellar season when he was derailed by a serious thumb injury that required surgery, along with a groin problem that saw him make only 362 plate appearances. Despite missing the final 56 games of the regular campaign, Youkilis boasted a BA of .307 and added 19 homers and 62 RBI. The Red Sox, with a wealth of riches in the roster department, acquired San Diego Padres star Adrian Gonzalez in the off-season, resulting in Youkilis being shifted from first to third base. It's ironic because the slick-fielding Jewish infielder holds the Major League record of 238 straight games at first without an error. At the plate he is extremely patient and draws a lot of walks to go along with his power and an impressive career batting average of .294 in close to 3,000 at bats.



Jason Marquis

Right-hander Jason Marquis, 32, not unlike Feldman, failed to perform for the Nationals after being rewarded by Washington with a fat-cat contract. That came after an outstanding 2009 season with the Colorado Rockies, in which he posted a 15-13 record and an ERA of 4.04 in 216 innings. The former Atlanta Braves 1996 first-round pick missed 97 games last year and ended up with a 2-9 record and 6.60 ERA in only 13 starts due to a right-elbow injury. When healthy, he is known as an innings-eater, but at the same time he is always having to pitch out of jams, causing no end of stress for his manager. Marquis is listed as a third starter with a weak ball club, and 2011 will be a crossroads year for him since he is in the final year of a two-year contract.

The injury bug also took a big-time bite out of the Cubs' left-handed reliever John Grabow in 2010 after he was acquired from Pittsburgh at the July 31 trading deadline in 2009. The six-foot-two, 250-pound veteran was grossly underpaid by the Pirates and finally hit the jackpot in Chicago. Much to the dismay of his new club, the 32-year-old missed his team's last 86 games with a sprained left knee and ended up with zero saves, a 1-3 record and an embarrassing ERA of 7.36 in 28 games in which he was mashed for 35 hits in just 25 innings.

On a more positive note, left-handed relief pitcher Craig Breslow is back in Oakland after giving the Athletics good value for their buck. He appeared in 75 games, registering a 4-4 won-lost record and an ERA of 3.01. In 75 innings the 30-year-old stopper fanned 71 and had five saves.

Easily one of the top-10 hitters in the National League, Brewers' left-fielder Ryan Braun, 27, was an all-star last season and won the Silver Slugger award. While his power fell off with only 25 home runs due to nagging injuries to his wrist and elbow, he still managed to hit 45 doubles, score 101 runs, record a BA of .304 and drive in 103 in 619 at bats.

Leave it to the Minnesota Twins with their limited budget to always come up with a gem. In the 19th round of the baseball draft in 2006, they grabbed a Jewish third-sacker from Boca Raton, Fla., named Danny Valencia and brought him up last June 3 for a look-see. He was never returned to the minors as he appeared in 85 games. In 299 at-bats, the six-foot-two, 210-pound infielder hit .311, whacked seven homers, 18 doubles and drove in 40 runs. He played airtight defence and showed he can hit both the fastball and breaking ball, and finished third in the league in American League Rookie of the Year voting.

Also back for his sophomore season in the majors is Ike (Isaac) Benjamin Davis, a first-round Mets draftee in 2008. He is the son of former Major League relief pitcher Ron Davis and a Jewish mother, Millie, from Lithuania. The Edina, Minn., six-foot-four, 215-pound left-handed hitting slugger held down the first-base position for New York as soon as he arrived last May. In 523 at bats in 147 games, he hit .264, had 19 home runs, 33 doubles and drove in 71.

Also watch for veteran outfielder Gabe Kapler, now 35, who has signed a minor league contract and hopes to win a bench job with the Los Angeles Dodgers.

Utility outfielder Sam Fuld, 29, with limited major league experience is now in the Tampa Bay Rays chain following several years with Cubs' farm teams. He was an All-American player with Stanford and is the son of Amanda Merrill, a New Hampshire state senator and Ken Fuld, a dean and professor of psychology at the University of New Hampshire.

Former first-round White Sox pick Aaron Poreda, 24, who is six-foot-six and weighs 240 pounds, was obtained in the summer of 2009 by San Diego from Chicago and is hoping to catch on as a reliever or mid-rotation starter with the Padres this season.

Larry Rothschild is a pitching coach with the Yankees, following several years with the Cubs. Scott Radinsky holds a similar position with the Indians in Cleveland.

My wish for all of the above this season? Zei gezunt.

NEVER TOO LATE TO SAY THANK YOU: Grade 6 students at the Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto's Danilack Middle School receive a plaque from Sarah Malka Eisen of Kfar Yeladim David, a home-away-from-home for disadvantaged children in Jerusalem. Eisen presented the plaque recently in recognition of a fund-raising campaign the students ran at the Kamin branch last year. The money raised was used to purchase an industrial fridge for the Kfar Yeladim residential facility.

Student wins grant to help Kenyans affected with HIV, AIDS

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Humber College student Samantha Banks said she can't wait to use the $10,000 grant she won from Ford Motor Company to help Kenyan women and children affected by HIV and AIDS.

In December, Banks, a 22-year-old student in Humber's fundraising and volunteer management program, and her classmate, Malinda DenBok, entered the Ford Focus Global Test Drive contest, which called on participants to submit a video to Ford's Facebook fan page that detailed what they would do with the $10,000.

"My partner, Malinda DenBok, got a message over Twitter asking her to participate in this Ford Focus Global Test Drive challenge," Banks said.

Samantha Banks

She explained that DenBok was recruited when the Ford challenge organizers came across her Twitter page where she promoted a fund-raising initiative she was involved with.

"They asked her to come up with a video in support of a charity and use social media networking sites such as Facebook and Twitter to promote it," Banks said.

The students chose to focus their energy on the Living Positive Program, a community-based organization that helps women and children in Kenya infected by HIV and AIDS.

The organization provides the Kenyans with health care, education and rehabilitation to help them become healthier and more independent.

"When Melinda approached me to work on this particular project, I was intrigued because I'm very interested in international development," said Banks, who has been active in social action projects including Students Take Action Now: Darfur (STAND) Canada and Doctors Without Borders.

She is also the past president of the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students.

"Once we decided to choose the Living Positive Program for the contest, we contacted them, we did interviews with them, we researched them... and we became emotionally invested in this organization."

From the thousands who applied, only 40 people were awarded the grant. The contest winners also won a trip to Madrid, where they met with other finalists, and they were given a Ford Focus to drive for six weeks – with Ford footing the gas bill.

In addition to the $10,000, Banks and DenBok were given thousands more to organize a fundraising event in Toronto on April 1.

A portion of the money collected from the $10 cover charge for the event, held at a downtown lounge called Cabin Five, will also go toward the Living Positive Program.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Debut author writes about sex, drugs and surviving trauma

Danila Botha

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

It's not uncommon for authors to draw on their own experiences when they write fiction, but Danila Botha didn't hold anything back when she recounted the most traumatic event of her life in a short story.

"The story My So-Called Date was pretty much autobiographical," said South African-born Botha. It's one of 12 stories in her first book, Got No Secrets, published last year by Tightrope Books in Canada and Modjaji Books in South Africa.

Set in Toronto, South Africa and the United States, the stories are dark and disturbing, dealing with mostly female characters who struggle with drug addiction, trauma, dysfunctional relationships and promiscuous sex.

"My So-Called Date is probably the darkest story in the book, and it was really cathartic for me to write. I don't like to talk about it, but it is something that happened to me," Botha said.

The story is about a girl who was raped by her ex-boyfriend and is desperate to move on from the traumatic event by dating another man.

"I was trying very hard to be honest and authentic and to write about certain things that I've experienced that I didn't feel comfortable addressing in any other areas of my life," said Botha, who moved to Toronto 13 years ago when she was 15.

But this traumatic event, which led Botha to experiment with drugs in her early 20s, was not the impetus to writing the book. It was her volunteer work with the Mobile Jewish Response to the Homeless, a program run by Ve'ahavta, the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee, that inspired her.

When Botha was a York University undergrad in the creative writing program, she volunteered to help distribute meals to the homeless. She said she was intrigued by the stories she heard from homeless teens.

"I got to hear a lot of stories about drugs and addiction, and I was just really surprised by how non-discriminating addiction is," Botha said.

> 'It was her volunteer work with the Mobile Jewish Response to the Homeless that inspired her'

"I've met homeless teenagers who were Jewish kids from Thornhill. There was a boy who grew up near Chabad Gate, and it was a shock to me that someone from such a similar background could end up on the streets selling crack."

Two of the stories in Got No Secrets reflect the fact that some of the troubled and homeless people she met on her Ve'ahavta missions came from Jewish homes.

Jesus Was a Punk Rocker is about a 28-year-old pierced and tattooed nurse who drinks to excess and cuts herself because "it helps [her] feel real, brings [her] anxieties and fears down to earth." She comes from an Orthodox Jewish family, but she hates being Jewish herself.

Don't Talk Junk is about a heroin-addicted teenager who moves in with her boyfriend to get away from her mother, "who had been making [her] life a living hell for years" and "killed herself to send [her] to a private Jewish high school" that she hated.

Botha, who herself is a graduate of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, said she wanted readers to understand that "it could be any person. Anyone's mom, sister, it could be someone's daughter, best friend, or a girl you sat next to in class.

"The more research I did into addiction – and I interviewed addicts and dealers... because I wanted to try to tell their stories authentically – I remember just being shocked at how incorrect my assumptions were."

Botha, who said she was "very, very stupid" in her early 20s when she experimented with drugs, is grateful that it didn't lead to an addiction.

"But it always seems strange to me that it did for people whose circumstances had been similar or better or worse [than mine]. So I really wanted to understand addiction, and understand why things happen to certain people and why certain people go all the way and others don't," she explained.

Botha hopes her stories will add to the voices that say "terrible things happen sometimes, but you can keep going."

"It's possible to survive them and to get through them. It's possible for it just to be a small anecdote in the story of your life... It's possible to go through something really difficult and for it to almost feel a few years later like it happened to someone else," she said.

Botha, who is currently completing her bachelor's in education at Mount Saint Vincent University in Halifax, said that as a teacher, she hopes to be able to speak candidly to her students about her past.

"We talk very openly about certain things, and it's actually very useful to them to have someone who speaks openly about that stuff," she said.

Earning her teaching degree is not going to stop Botha, a graduate of the Humber College writing program, from publishing. She is almost finished a novel titled Too Much on the Inside, which will be published next year.

It's a story about four immigrants in their 20s who move to Toronto. One character hails from South Africa, one comes from Brazil, another is from Annapolis Valley in Nova Scotia and the fourth character is Israeli.

Choosing the nationalities of each character was not random, Botha said.

For example, Botha wanted to write an Israeli character because of her connection to the Jewish state.

Her mother is an Israeli, and growing up, Botha spent each summer there with her family.

"When I graduated from York, I did a teach-English-as-a-second-language course and I went to live there to teach ESL for a couple years," she said.

"After living there for what I felt was a significant amount of time, I had a different view on the country, on the army, on the politics, on all these things I had felt differently about as someone who used to only live there in the summer."

Botha also has plans to write a graphic novel about the Israeli-Palestinian situation called The World Is Dead and I'm Full of Joy.

It's about two women in their early 20s – one Israeli and the other Palestinian – who meet at a language school in Jerusalem where they develop a relationship.

"I'm moving away from some of the confessional stuff I did when I was younger," Botha said.

But, she added, she's grateful for the catharsis she experienced when writing Got No Secrets.

"I've learned a lot since then, and I have a much healthier outlook now."

"איזו תקופה מדהימה את עוברת עכשיו, מה?" מביטה בי שירה בעיניים מצומצמות. אני מחייכת בצינעה. "כן," מצטרפת גלית, "כל ההצלחה של ההצגה, והתוכניות הגרנדיוזיות, שיחקת אותה!" ושוב המבט הסוקר אותי באופן מצומצם. "את גם נראית ממש טוב." מסכמת מירב. "יפה לך המראה הנשי השופע." אנחנו עומדות במרכז הסלון רחב הידים של אחד מידידינו בתירנהיל. כולם עטים על הבופה המפואר, ואחד על השני. הסיבה הרישמית לחגיגה - לפרגן לי. הסיבה הפחות פורמלית - להבין למה לעזאזל, ואיך, נהיה לי טוב כל כך...

"שמעתי שקיבלת הצעות לכתוב תסריט!" מושיט לי כוס שמפניה נוספת עודד. דורית, אישתו, קרבה אלינו במהירות ומסבירה לו. "זה לא סגור עד שהגברת השמנה שרה." עודד מחייך, "אה, אז את גם הולכת לשיר!" הוא מברר בטקט, ואני בורחת לצד השני של החדר. דורית דולקת אחרי. "הוא לא התכוון. גברים הם מטומטמים, זה חדש לך? חוץ מזה, מי אמר שצריך לרזות כדי להצליח? את תצליחי, כולנו כאן סגורים על זה."

Adult bullying is a problem, too

Substantive work is being done in many parts of the world relating to the bullying of children and teens in schools.

To appreciate some of the successes in the area of fighting bullying, see the website www.leaveoutviolence.org and read about LOVE, a Canadian organizations whose mission statement is to "create a youth-led movement against violence by teaching credible youth how to use their voices and become champions against violence."

Children who bully often do so because of what they have learned at home. When children are physically or emotionally pushed around by their parents and/or siblings, they recognize aggression as a way to further their needs. Studies have linked violent behaviour and harsh discipline by parents with bullying.

Based on these findings, it is imperative that we adults/parents look at our own behaviour toward family, employees and colleagues, to determine where our children's aggressive behaviour started.

I believe our Jewish community has an adult bullying problem – generally called "abuse" – that is evident in how some Jewish families treat their nannies or domestic help.

I am regularly privy to stories from community members – and sometimes nannies – about families and individuals who bully their help. I know of a nanny employed by a Jewish family who says she is constantly yelled at by the father and mother. While she was invited to sit at the meal table, she wasn't offered food, and instead ate a can of tuna afterward. Eventually, she stopped sitting at the family table, feeling unwelcome. She often holds back tears, feeling small and insignificant. She also says the parents would vacation for a week at a time, leave the children with her and not reward her for the work she did 24/7. The problem is, she's being sponsored by this family to work in Canada and cannot leave, although she badly wants to. She is terrified of her employers. It's akin to slavery.

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

This is happening now, in the Toronto Jewish community, and other communities, as you read this. Do you know about such situations?

This, and other instances, reflect the fact the Toronto Jewish community would benefit from making anti-bullying classes available to adults. Such a class could deal with the effects of the Holocaust on our collective emotional equilibrium, the Torah perspective on how we must treat our family, friends, associates and employees, and tools for minimizing our aggression toward others.

I have been bullied – sometimes by individuals close to me – and have noticed, over time, aspects of "the bully" within myself. I was horrified to discover this, but now fight against it, and can identify those character traits in others. I have seen bullying behaviour in communal workers in Jewish organizations, shuls, schools (among staff), Jewish-owned businesses and private homes.

Teaching students about the terrible ramifications of bullying is crucial, both for the bully and the victim. But our efforts cannot stop there.

To be Jewish is to strive for generosity of spirit and to create a balance between all peoples. If you employ a nanny, are a parent or run an organization or business, ask yourself this question: "Am I treating my staff, family, friends, the way I want to be treated?" If the answer is "not enough," seek help. The damage you're causing could be making a nanny, employee or child cry – right now. Remember how that felt.

Read a marvellous piece by a 13-year-old on what the Torah says about how to treat employees at www.jabe.org/bar-mitzvah-study-passage.html.

The cry of the human heart

Editorial

The light shines on the name and the address so carefully written on the aerogram like a giant Hubble mirror reflecting back to us specks of starlit truth from the faraway heavens.

The letter-writer seeks God.

Who among us has not?

In dark moments when our hearts were broken or breaking, have we not called out to Him from the depths of our despair? Or in bright moments when our hearts overflowed with waves of gratitude, have we not thanked Him from the high point of our happiness?

To be human means, at some point in life, we will seek God. For some of us it means seeking to understand the mystery of our existence, if not also its purpose. But whoever has looked up at a starry night and marvelled at the sparkle, or watched an infant take her first steps has wondered. And whoever has thus wondered has, in some way, sought God.

But it is where the letter-writer seeks God that catches our attention: the Wailing Wall, Jerusalem, Israel.

The massive, roughly hewn stones in the background of the photo are probably the most famous and most recognized stones on earth. They form the western retaining wall of the ancient Jewish Temple in Jerusalem. Indeed, the stone at the top left bears the distinctive handiwork of Herod's skilled masons, who dressed it with their signature, carved-out perimeter framing the four sides of the rectangular rock.

Tiny notes of prayers and pleas can be seen squeezed into the space between that stone and the adjacent one on the right. Perhaps the letter that arrived in the aerogram was one of those notes tucked by a helpful hand into the Wall?

That the address refers to the Wailing Wall suggests that the letter-writer may not be Jewish. For, after the divided city was reunified in 1967, most Jews have preferred to call those stones the Western Wall. The Wailing Wall was the name given to the stones precisely because for nearly two millennia Jews cried there, lamenting that the Wall, the city, the land was no longer theirs.

And that is the next detail that catches our attention. The cry that is mailed in the aerogram comes from India. It is to Jerusalem that the letter-writer in India sends her plea!

We are not surprised.

For seeking God in Jerusalem – and especially at the Western Wall – is, after all, inherent in the possibilities dreamed of by so much of humanity for thousands of years.

Multifaith Event

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress hosted dozens of Toronto-area leaders from the Muslim, Buddhist and Tamil-Sinhalese communities at Holy Blossom Temple April 5. The dignitaries heard from Holy Blossom spiritual leader Rabbi John Moscowitz, who discussed the fundamentals of Judaism and answered the audience's questions. After a dinner, the guests toured the sanctuary and learned more about Judaism's core principles. The program ended with participants resolving to work together on matters of common concern, including fighting antisemitism and racism.

Blacks Slam IAW

NEW YORK — An African-American student group took out full-page ads in college newspapers blasting "Israeli Apartheid Week" (IAW) organizers for abusing the term. In an ad titled "Words matter" that appeared April 7, Vanguard Leadership Group accuses Students for Justice in Palestine of a "false and deeply offensive" characterization of Israel. "SJP has chosen to manipulate rather than inform with this illegitimate analogy," said Vanguard, a leadership development group of students at historically black colleges. The ad appeared in papers on campuses that saw IAW activity in February, including Brown University, the University of California-Los Angeles, Columbia and the University of Maryland. Vanguard has in recent years forged ties with the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, and its members have visited Israel.

DES MOINES — A large kosher slaughterhouse and processing plant is being planned for South Dakota. A spokesperson for First American Farms told the Sioux City Journal the company is eyeing a 300- to 400-acre location in rural Union County for a $300-million kosher beef facility. Linda King, First American's registered agent in South Dakota, told county commissioners that the plant would employ up to 1,500 people, 90 per cent of them local residents. The venture is another attempt to fill the gap in America's kosher meat supply since the close of the Agriprocessors kosher slaughterhouse and plant in Postville, Iowa, after a May 2008 federal immigration raid. The facility has reopened under new ownership, but it's not producing as much kosher meat as before.

Quebec's Ballet Jazz To Tour Israel

MONTREAL — Les Ballets Jazz de Montréal will tour Israel in early June.

The contemporary dance troupe's opening performance is at the Jerusalem International Convention Centre June 1. The troupe then goes to the Be'er Sheva Theatre in the Negev June 3, the Haifa Auditorium in the north June 4, and finishes with a three-night run at the Tel Aviv Opera House June 5 to 7.

Three works from its repertory are on the bill: Locked Up Laura, a short duet of a male and female dancer, Zip Zap Zoom, inspired by the virtual world of Internet games, both by choreographer Annabelle Lopez Ochoa of Amsterdam, and Les Chambres des Jacques by Aszure Barton of New York. The latter, which is described as "oscillating between daily life and the grotesque," garnered good reviews from both the critics and public in Montreal and on tour internationally.

Les Ballets Jazz was founded in 1972 by Eddy Toussaint, Eva Von Genscy and Geneviève Salbaing, who was its artistic director for many years.

Current artistic director Louis Robitaille said: "Faced with the tensions and uncertainties arising all over the world, I have aspired to performances that can refresh the soul and give hope."

Shul Rededicated

WARSAW — The historic synagogue in Zamosc was rededicated April 5 after a $2.4-million restoration, although the southeastern Polish town's Jewish community was destroyed in the Shoah. Dignitaries and Jewish leaders attended the ceremony at the fortress-like edifice, built in the early 17th century. It will become a cultural centre.

Pride Toronto policy changes a sham: activist

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Pride Toronto is making changes to the way it polices controversial applicants to its annual parade, but one outspoken gay Jewish Torontonian says the new process is a sham because it may still allow a controversial anti-Israel group to participate.

Since 2009, lawyer Martin Gladstone and others have been active in lobbying the Toronto gay and lesbian and Jewish communities to counter the presence of Queers Against Israeli Apartheid (QuAIA) in the parade, saying the group promotes hatred.

Gladstone contends that an advisory panel put in place last year – chaired by Rev. Brent Hawkes, spiritual leader of the Metropolitan Community Church of Toronto – to deal with Pride's governance and mission in the wake of QuAIA's participation has been a waste of time.

"The problem was never about process, it was about content. There were already rules in place at Pride to deal with situations like this," Gladstone said. "There were value statements, mission statements, discrimination codes. They already had the authority to [bar] QuAIA from the parade. Pride went from a [revenue] surplus to an enormous deficit thanks to QuAIA."

Recently, Gladstone and others have been urging supporters of Israel to pressure Pride's main corporate sponsor, TD Bank, to sever its links with Pride over its inclusion of the group. They're asking clients of TD Bank to cut ties with the bank to make the point. In addition, a protest in front of the TD Bank branch at Lawrence Plaza was scheduled for April 10 at noon.

The tactic worries organizers and stakeholders at Pride Toronto, who say they're doing everything they can to address concerns about QuAIA.

Rev. Hawkes also warned that any effort to target TD Bank or Pride's revenue stream at such a sensitive time in the organization's existence could jeopardize the entire parade.

Martin Gladstone

TD Bank did not respond to interview requests by The CJN's deadline.

The community advisory panel assembled by Pride after the 2010 Pride festival comprised nine volunteer members. Part of its mandate was to consider issues such as whether the inclusion of groups like QuAIA harm the parade.

Earlier this year, shortly after Gladstone began targeting TD Bank, Rev. Hawkes contacted The CJN and local Jewish groups seeking to clarify his panel's mission.

In an interview at the church with Rev. Hawkes and Douglas Elliott, a legal adviser for the panel, the pastor said its mandate was misunderstood by the Jewish community.

Pride, he said, "did not ask us to ban or not ban [QuAIA], to rule on one group or another. Pride realized it had bad relationships with various communities... with governance issues" and with trying to redefine itself.

Israel makes its case

From the editor's desk...

It was a very busy time last week for more than, in most cases, the Jewish women of the world juggling their many personal, family and professional responsibilities with the pressing additional duties of having to prepare the home for Pesach as well.

It was also a busy week for Israeli leaders and diplomats.

They operated at full throttle, meeting with fellow leaders and diplomats in an effort to delay, if not actually prevent, international recognition of a unilateral declaration of independence by the Palestinians rumoured to be heading Israel's way in September, when the General Assembly of the United Nations convenes in New York for its annual congress.

Israel's ministry of foreign affairs instructed its diplomatic corps to present the matter to as many host country governments as possible.

And both the head of Israel's government and its head of state went to two very important capitals to continue the discussion that has already been the subject of considerable diplomatic cable traffic, even post-Wikileaks.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu visited with German Chancellor Angela Merkel in Berlin.

The meetings were lengthy, the settings relaxedly informal, but the conversations serious and weighty.

"We have intense and honest discussions, sometimes we also disagree, but I can say that it is never boring in talks with the prime minister," Merkel told the press about her meeting with Netanyahu.

As reported in Ha'aretz, Netanyahu was pleased that Merkel had mentioned the importance of recognizing Israel as a Jewish state.

On the crucial subject of the Palestinians' planned September gambit, the Israeli prime minister had extra reason to be grateful.

"We are in favour of two states for two nations," Merkel said. But then she added: "It is not certain that unilateral recognition will contribute to promoting peace, and this will be our position in September."

The German chancellor did not go so far as to make an unequivocal commitment to oppose a unilateral Palestinian declaration of statehood following a similarly intended resolution in the General Assembly. However, she did signal to her fellow European countries and, equally as important, to the Palestinian leaders, that the Palestinian Authority cannot bank on the credit of its entrenched victim status in most parts of the world to avoid direct negotiations with Israel.

Given the pre-eminent industrial and diplomatic roles that Germany plays in the European Union, Merkel's implied promise to Netanyahu was a key achievement. Bear in mind as well that two weeks earlier, Netanyahu was in Moscow to discuss with Russian leaders the very same issues of defence, security, Iran and Palestinian statehood.

While Netanyahu was engaging Angela Merkel in Berlin, Israeli President Shimon Peres was in Washington on a three-day visit with American leaders. He met directly with President Barack Obama, Secretary of State Hillary Clinton and congressional leaders.

Not surprisingly, the two presidents reportedly held honest, wide-ranging discussions regarding the unrest in the Arab world, the peace process with the Palestinians and Iran.

"We had an extensive discussion about what's happened in the Middle East," Obama later told the media. "I think he and I both share a belief that... it's more urgent than ever that we try to seize the opportunity to create a peaceful solution between the Palestinians and the Israelis. And he had some very interesting ideas around those issues."

In the double and triple entendre of politicians' and statesmen's language, Obama's summary declaration was crystal clear in its meaning: there is a lot going on behind the scenes.

In Israel as well, the domestic debate has been steering increasingly toward September at the United Nations.

Deputy Prime Minister Dan Meridor, considered to be one of the more moderate members of Netanyahu's government, spoke out last week against the unilateral Palestinian push for statehood.

"Borders need to be agreed on by two parties, not decided unilaterally," he said.

The busy pace of the Jewish state's diplomats during the past few weeks was only the beginning.

After Pesach it will pick up even faster. –MBD

REMEMBER SCHALIT AT PESACH

This seder table was set up last year in the tent for Gilad Schalit outside the prime minister's residence in Jerusalem. One year later, Schalit is still a kidnap victim of Hamas in Gaza. May Schalit be remembered at the seder tables around the world this year as well. And may his freedom from bondage be soon. [Israel Sun photo]

U.S. Mideast policy called 'a disaster'

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

When Caroline Glick analyzes the U.S. response to the convulsions rocking the Arab world, she's shocked by what she sees.

"You can't be too blunt about it. They've been siding with their worst enemies against their friends... It's absolutely a disaster."

Caroline Glick

Glick, a columnist and deputy managing editor of the Jerusalem Post, said Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's reference to Syrian strongman Bashar Assad as "a reformer" – at the same time his forces were attacking rebels – "shows how demented foreign policy has become under [U.S. President Barack] Obama."

On April 5, Glick was the keynote speaker of a lecture dedicated to the late philanthropist and businessman Izzy Kaplan at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Thornhill (BAYT).

Glick said she met Kaplan a few years ago when the two co-operated in trying to prevent the evacuation of Israeli communities from Gaza. "That was a humanitarian disaster and a strategic folly," she said. It permitted Hamas to take power and "it transformed 10,000 of the most productive Israelis into refugees."

Glick's topic for her address at BAYT was the Arab revolt and its implications for Israel. The evening was sponsored by Mizrachi Canada, the Toronto Zionist Council and the Committee for the Security of Sderot, with proceeds from the evening going to the Mishkan Shalom Synagogue in Sderot, which will be renamed for Kaplan.

Sderot is the community near Gaza that has experienced thousands of rocket attacks since Israel's withdrawal. Rocket and mortar attacks have increased in recent months. At the same time, Jerusalem was hit by a bomb attack and five members of a single family were murdered in Itamar.

Glick said the perpetrators "saw the opportunity to kill Jews and they took it. That's what they do."

From a tactical sense, it also permits Iran and Syria, which control Hamas and which intimidates Fatah, the main group behind the Palestinian Authority, to "divert international attention from their countries."

"You can't look at the Palestinians and pretend they're independent," she said. "They're not. Fatah is afraid of Iranian intimidation, which is huge. And Iran trains Fatah units through Hezbollah.

"The West gives a lot of money [to Fatah] for nothing. It's its worst strategic investment," she said.

Looking at the U.S. response to developments in the region, Glick noted that in Egypt, the Americans abandoned their ally of 30 years, Hosni Mubarak, in favour of an opposition that includes the radical Muslim Brotherhood; it bombed Libyan forces to support rebels that have been "penetrated" by Al Qaeda; and it is ignoring the Iranian-led Shiite insurrection in Bahrain, home to the United States' Sixth Fleet.

Glick, who served as co-ordinator of negotiations with the Palestine Liberation Organization from 1994 to 1996, said U.S. abdication of its longstanding role in the region is because "Obama's worldview is anti-imperialist, which essentially means anti-American. Therefore, he sides with U.S. opponents."

With the neo-conservatives the primary opposition in the U.S., the result "when these two opposing schools fight" is that "U.S. strategic discourse has been completely irrational. If you see the Muslim Brotherhood as Solidarity [the Polish labour movement that helped bring down Communism], it shows you completely misconstrue the politics."

Turning to events in Syria, Glick said Israel should try to support the overthrow of the Assad regime any way it can. The Kurds, who oppose the central authority, are natural allies and Israel should encourage them in their fight for a decentralized government. "The more centralized the government, the worse for Israel," she said. "The more tyrannical, the more apt they are to use hatred of Israel and Jews to galvanize people to their side."

Glick believes "Israel and others are going to step into the breach and start giving rational leadership to the region until a more serious U.S. leadership emerges."

It also means Israel will now have to look at Egypt as a potential military adversary and "expand the size of the Israel Defence Force's manpower and platforms [weapon systems]."

Glick dated the onset of the political instability in the Arab world to the overthrow of Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein. That was followed by a revolt by Syrian Kurds in 2004, the Cedar Revolution in Lebanon in 2005 and elections in Egypt and the Palestinian territories in 2006.

"Popular movements in the Arab world are largely Islamist and so no one wants to pay attention to it in the West. When the dam breaks, everything changes very quickly," she said.

Help each other for world's sake

Passover, the story of the Exodus, is our annual reminder of that. Even more, the story of the Exodus is in large part the very origin of the notion that human beings can lead and hope for better lives, that justice not power is the foundation-stone of society, that we can help each other for the sake of each other, and that we must help each other for the sake of the world it is our duty to improve.

During the seder, we attach ourselves to our Exodus forebears. That is the very purpose of the seder: to tell and remember their story and to understand that their story is our story, too, that each day we must live by its timeless instruction.

Rabbi Irving Greenberg has movingly described that instruction. He points out that the liberation of the Hebrew slaves from their bondage in Egypt is the inspiration for human hope, for the belief that oppressors, tyrants, strongmen, can be defeated.

The Exodus, he writes, sets up an alternative conception of life than one that is ruled by evil. "Were it not for the Exodus, humans would have reconciled themselves to the evils that exist in the world. The Exodus re-establishes the dream of perfection.

"Throughout the generations, this view of history has been an enormous source of hope, galvanizing humans to major efforts to improve their conditions."

The point is explicitly emphasized in the Haggadah. "We cried out unto God... and He heard our voices."

The notes tucked and stuffed into every available space in the Wall are the cries of humanity seeking to be heard from their own personal slaveries and oppressions.

Twice a year, prior to Passover and Rosh Hashanah, the notes are removed from the spaces between the stones of the Wall. The process, supervised by the Western Wall's presiding official, Rabbi Shmuel Rabinovitch, is undertaken with the solemn respect fitting the holy space that houses the notes and the souls whose cries those notes are. The workers use wooden sticks dipped in a mikvah. After the notes are removed and gathered, they are buried.

On the very morrow of the cleaning, even earlier perhaps than the shining of first light over the eastern edge of the Wall, the notes – prayers and cries from human beings all over the world – appear again between the stones.

And what we learn at Passover, because of Passover, is that for all time, they always will.

Pesach greetings from Ont. premier

On behalf of the government of Ontario, I am delighted to extend warm greetings to everyone celebrating Pesach. In Ontario, we celebrate difference and thrive on diversity. Our cultural and religious mosaic gives our province its strength and vitality. As part of that mosaic, the Jewish community has made an invaluable contribution to Ontario's social, cultural and economic life.

Passover is a time for reflection and renewal – a time to celebrate and express gratitude for families and friends. May your Pesach bring you many blessings and great joy, and be filled with the strength that is found in faith.

Please accept my very best wishes for a happy and memorable Passover.

Dalton McGuinty
Premier of Ontario

Goldstone report

South African Judge Richard Goldstone's report on Operation Cast Lead in Gaza to the UN Human Rights Council resulted in the vilification and international condemnation of Israel and the Israel Defence Forces ("Judge Goldstone recants anti-Israel conclusions in report," April 7). As an experienced jurist, Goldstone should have insisted on submissions from Israel and Hamas. His failure to do so resulted in an error-filled dissertation that Israel has lived with since the report was published. Goldstone's regret for his report is not enough. He must insist before the Human Rights Council that the report be withdrawn so that the stigma against Israel and the Israel Defence Forces is erased. Apart from a revelation of the truth, it would indeed be refreshing to once and for all see the council come out with a pronouncement in favour of Israel.

Cartoon on Goldstone unconscionable

The Dry Bones attack on Justice Richard Goldstone is unconscionable (From the editor's desk, April 7). I have enjoyed Dry Bones as a humorous take on Israeli life for more than 40 years. Unfortunately, lately it has become a mouthpiece for the Israeli political party Yisrael Beiteinu and attempts to be Israeli Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman with a sense of humour. I ask that if you are going to continue to print this political cartoon you balance it with cartoons from Ha'aretz or other centre and left-of-centre cartoonists and definitely not give it such prominence. It is a tragedy that such a wonderful cartoon has become so one-sided.

Group to inflict damage

Good Lord, hasn't the New Israel Fund done enough damage? Now they create a "J-Street lite" in Canada – JSpaceCanada – to inflict more ("New community voice joins pro-Israel left," March 31)? I don't even dare to ask where the funds are coming from. Does The CJN consider this announcement a good-news one? And while I am at it, do the CJN editors know that Israel has more newspapers than Ha'aretz and more voices than Aluf Ben, Ha'aretz editor-at-large, and his friends?

Human rights museum controversy

Contrary to the article "Poll results opposing Shoah gallery questioned" (March 31) the Ukrainian Canadian Civil Liberties Association (UCCLA) has never asked for the Canadian Museum for Human Rights (CMHR) to include a gallery dedicated to the Holodomor, the genocidal Great Famine of 1932-1933 in Soviet Ukraine. We have always stated that the Shoah must be included in a gallery dedicated to the many genocides that have befouled human history. A Nanos Research survey found that 60.3 per cent of Canadians reject the notion of elevating the suffering of any community above all others in a taxpayer-funded institution such as the CMHR. When the Winnipeg Free Press questioned that finding in a daily poll, it discovered that more than 75 per cent of its readers are against giving any group preferential space.

We hope that your reporter's description of James Kafieh as a Palestinian Canadian was not intended to be prejudicial. Perhaps your readers should also be told that he is a Christian. Please note, however, that the UCCLA generally has no interest in the political views, sexual orientation, gender, age, religion or ethnicity of those who share our concerns. We're content knowing that our position on the CMHR is echoed by a majority of Canadians.

The child who keeps us honest

Dan Goldberg
Special to The CJN

Pesach has always been my favourite holiday. Even as a kid, given a choice between Pesach and Chanukah, I would have chosen Pesach. Could that have been an early sign of eccentricity in a child destined to become a Jewish educator? Perhaps. But the fact is I have a lot of company.

Pesach is the favourite holiday of most Jewish adults and many Jewish children. It is the holiday we are most willing to travel for, clean for and cook for. It is also the event on the Jewish calendar most capable of prolonging life. The Jewish death rate drops just before Pesach and then catches up in the days that follow. My grandmother's last conscious moments were spent at a seder that I will always remember with gratitude.

Having established myself as a loyal Pesach fan, may I voice a small complaint? There is a moment in the seder that I have never liked, a line in the Haggadah that has always bothered me. It has to do with the child who for centuries has been slandered with the label of "rebellious" or, even worse, "wicked." The Haggadah instructs us to "hak'heh et shinav"– to knock him in the teeth.

What has this child done to earn this violent response? According to the text, he has taken the stance of an outsider. His question has a tone of detachment (and perhaps disdain) that our ancestors found threatening.

It is my strong belief that the traditional response to the "wicked" son is far worse than his question. In addition to harming the child, such attempts to discourage skepticism and silence doubt put our tradition at risk.

We all know someone who comes to the seder with a negative attitude, someone who continually urges the group to "speed it up," or repeatedly asks, "When do we eat?" or simply sighs loudly at regular intervals. This person can be extremely irritating. In some cases, he or she can diminish or even spoil the experience for everyone else.

As exasperating as his or her presence may be, in my experience, the negative participant at a seder is not someone who doesn't care. An individual who is indifferent will either decline to attend the seder or will sit politely and chat pleasantly with others at the table, waiting patiently for the arrival of the meal. The vociferous complainer, on the other hand, is secretly as connected to the seder as anyone else at the table. He or she would not miss a seder for the world.

So who is this complainer, this negative voice at the seder? I believe it is the rebellious child, grown up. Looking back, we see that the child was not indifferent. He or she cared enough to ask a question. Having grown up, the adult is still not indifferent – the adult cares enough to attend a seder. However, the adult is angry. And hurt. The slap (real or symbolic) was painful. Even more painful were the words that accompanied the slap: "This is what God did for me, not for you. Had you been there, you would not have been redeemed." The message, which continues to sting, is: "You are not one of us and you are not worthy of us."

For someone who cares about being Jewish, who feels a connection to the tradition and the community (even if that connection is ambivalent), having his or her Jewishness questioned or judged negatively is a painful blow.

I am convinced that the common denominator that links the estranged members of our community is the experience of being looked down upon as Jews – for not being able to read Hebrew or for not going to shul or because a long time ago, they misbehaved in Hebrew school or asked too many provocative questions.

Even the briefest survey of traditional Jewish texts will show that at the heart of Jewish expression is the need to question and challenge the ideas and assertions of others. For many children, being able to ask questions is a burning need and a sign of profound engagement.

I know a mother who once received a call from the head of her son's yeshiva. The head complained that the boy was always questioning what was being taught. "Tell me when he stops asking questions," the mother responded, "because that's when I'm pulling him out of your school!"

If one reads the traditional Hebrew text of the Four Children carefully, one will make a discovery that is often obscured by translations. The questions that the wise and rebellious children ask are quite similar. Both children word their questions using the second person, asking what God has commanded "you" (wise child) or what this ritual means to "you" (rebellious child). Perhaps what separates the wise child from the rebellious child is less the question that is asked and more the response that is given and the impact of that response.

Included in the book Goodbye Columbus by Phillip Roth is a story titled Conversion of the Jews. In this story, an inquisitive and absolutely sincere boy named Ozzie gets slapped, first by his mother and then by the rabbi, because he has asked a very provocative and threatening question. At the end of the story, Ozzie, having gained the upper hand through a ludicrous series of events, compels his entire community to promise that they will "never hit anyone about God." With apologies to the Haggadah, a book I deeply cherish, I believe Ozzie's promise is one that every Jewish community and every Jew should make.

Judaism has survived not in spite of, but because of, the testing it has undergone. Questions keep our tradition resilient and relevant. I would like to suggest that this year, at the seder, we rename the "wicked" child and revise our response to him or her and to the others in our lives whose questions keep us alert, honest and responsible.

When we open the door at our seders this year, let it also be to other Jews who have been hurt or who feel discouraged about their Jewishness. Let's welcome them home and hear their stories and help them to heal and rediscover what they once loved and lost.

Reading ourselves into the Pesach story

Is there a way of thinking about Passover that's particularly Canadian? Growing up in an American Jewish community, it's perhaps not surprising that my childhood education about the festival was mixed with the narrative of the American revolution and the story of African-American slavery.

The foundational story of the United States is one of escape from political, religious and economic oppression – all themes of the Passover story as well. It wasn't much of a stretch for children and grandchildren of immigrants, largely from eastern and central Europe, to identify ourselves with the Puritans, who landed on the shores of the New World to worship in ways forbidden to them, as a minority, in the Old. Although we vaguely knew they were a type of Christian, we imagined them as sort of like Jews in their quest for freedom of worship. And, impossibly, we imagined ourselves as landing on a new continent full of promise.

In a comparable way, I recollect being actively taught to read the biblical memory of slavery onto the history of the United States. Many Jewish schools actively encouraged students to identify with the African-American experience, whose more recent slave past resonated with our own cultural memory. In addition to seder melodies drawn from the Haggadah, my school taught us black spirituals. Composed by slaves, they expressed the yearning for freedom and a faith in God's redemptive powers, and melded with the themes of our festival.

One year, just before Pesach, we went on a class trip to see an off-Broadway play about the underground railroad. While the plot has faded in my mind, I remember that it centred on Jewish abolitionists who helped slaves escape to freedom and culminated in a scene of Jews and former slaves sitting around a seder table singing Hebrew songs such as Dayeinu and spirituals, such as Go Down, Moses. The layering of historical memory inherent in the play is a complex one. Just as American Jews saw themselves as having much in common with African-Americans – not only the ancient memory of slavery, but more recent experiences of persecution – so the slaves had seen their own experience in the biblical story of the Exodus.

Over the years, I've come upon Haggadot that make such connections explicit, through illustrations as well as thoughts, prayers or meditations added to the traditional seder liturgy.

My colleague and friend, Jonathan Sarna, the distinguished historian of the Jewish American experience, says such readings into history reflect the "cult of synthesis." It's a way of seeing the Jewish story in the American one, and the American story in the Jewish one, with both reflecting a shared set of cultural values. They are also examples thinking about Judaism and Jewish holidays in ways that – while not incompatible with a religious sensibility – also give them secular meanings.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

There's something quintessentially Jewish about this overlaying of ancient and modern meanings. One could say the practice of giving the Passover story a more contemporary spin is true to the spirit of the festival, taking literally the injunction in the Haggadah to see oneself as personally part of the story of the Exodus. Indeed, thousands of different Haggadot have been published, many in recent years, that refract the holiday and its text through a contemporary lens, making it consonant with cultural memories and values that emerge from other times, places and movements. There are feminist Haggadot, vegan Haggadot, socialist Haggadot, "green" Haggadot, non-ecumenical Haggadot, secular Haggadot and countless others.

Some play with the traditional text, expanding, rewriting or replacing it entirely. Others leave the text intact, but editorialize through illustrations that accompany it. What does the "wicked son" look like, for example? Some Haggadot depict him as robust and muscular (versus the "wise" but scrawny scholar). Others depict him as rotund, a greedy capitalist. Others portray him as slickly urban (as opposed to the "wise" agrarian kibbutznik). In some versions, the wicked son is a daughter – sometimes a rebellious girl, contrasted with her more traditional "wise" sister; and sometimes a retro girl playing with Barbies, contrasted with her "wise" feminist sister.

These many interpretations of the holiday show that we don't treat the ritual as rote, but find in it a living source of meaning. Our seder tables reflect our complicated way of being in the world, our layered sense of identity, our values.

A brilliant, frail and fiery rabbi

"The elderly man was hunched over, walking slowly with the help of a cane toward a small stage where a table, chair and microphone awaited him." I think of that apt description by David Suissa, a California-based journalist and blogger, each time I sit in the lecture hall of the Shalom Hartman Institute in Jerusalem watching the arrival of its founder, Rabbi David Hartman.

He has recently given another series of public lectures and seminars, this time about the chosen people. Part of his method is to collect relevant source material and help his students to digest it critically. As usual, he touches on many topics outside the subject. They're insightful digressions if you like what he says, rants and ramblings if you don't.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

Rabbi Hartman is the author of many books on Jewish thought and has just completed another. His writings have made important contributions to the religious debates of our time within Judaism and beyond.

But arguably even more significant is the institute he has created. He named it after his father who, like his mother, often figures in his lectures. It's now run by his son, Donniel, and housed in a purpose-built impressive complex in the centre of Jerusalem. The donor wall lists many Canadian names.

The institute is a meeting place for Jewish and non-Jewish scholars from Israel and abroad. Its annual theology conferences attract exponents of the three monotheistic religions who engage in penetrating interfaith dialogue. Participants invariably report that they've been greatly enriched by the experience.

A similar annual meeting of philosophers explores the interaction between general and Jewish thought, and has inspired many participants to think along novel lines.

But despite the physical presence of the Shalom Hartman Institute in Jerusalem and the two high schools connected to it, its founder is better known and appreciated abroad than in Israel, though he has lived there since 1971. He came convinced that the establishment of the Jewish state has radically altered Judaism as it's shaping our future and has helped to alert North American Jewry to this fact.

Born in the United States, Rabbi Hartman served for many years as the charismatic spiritual leader of an Orthodox congregation in Montreal. He made aliyah because he believes that, despite all its current internal and external challenges to which he often alludes, the Jewish state has become the focus of all Jewish life.

Though no less conscious of the tragedy of the Holocaust than thinkers such as the late Prof. Emil Fackenheim of the University of Toronto, instead of delving into this recent past to fathom the present, he lives in the present and plans for the future. He and Fackenheim lived for many years in the same Jerusalem neighbourhood, yet theologically they inhabited different planets.

Commitment to Israel hasn't inhibited Rabbi Hartman from being critical of many of its aspects, including how religion is being abused by the ultra-Orthodox, both in their interpretation of Judaism and in their crass exploitation of politics. Many of his digressions are about that.

Though deeply rooted in Orthodox Judaism, Rabbi Hartman has distanced himself from some of its current manifestations. Nowadays he seems more concerned with what people actually think, and why, than with what the sacred texts tell them that God says.

Bringing together, as he does every year, rabbis and lay leaders from all the streams in Judaism while at the same time often being sharply critical of their institutions and practices, he has become the intellectual trailblazer of post-denominational Judaism as it has emerged and grown in recent years.

He points out how misleading it is nowadays to adequately describe Judaism with conventional adjectives such as Orthodox, Reform, Conservative, Reconstructionist or even secular. Rabbi Hartman prefers to speak of the family of Judaism – "the big tent" – rather than of its doctrines and denominations. It matters to him what people do much more than what the organizations they belong to proclaim. His theology is deeply rooted in Jewish tradition and informed by history, anthropology, sociology and psychology. This accounts for his critical openness to the world and its many "isms."

Jews caught up in interdenominational quarrels, as well as adherents of other faiths in their disputes with each other and their internal divisions, have much to learn from this brilliant, by now frail yet still-fiery rabbi.

Palestinians challenge Israel through non-violence

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Palestinian Arabs have been carefully watching the drama of non-violent demonstrations in the Arab world since last December. Palestinians who believe that peaceful protest rather than violence is the better and smarter way to challenge Israel's military occupation and win statehood have been heartened by recent events in countries ranging from Egypt to Yemen. The thinking is that if Egyptians, Tunisians, Yemenites and Syrians can "bend the arc of history," to paraphrase U.S. President Barack Obama, they can, too.

Historically, the Palestinians have not been drawn to non-violence, having regarded violence as a legitimate tool since the 1920s and particularly since the last two Palestinian uprisings in 1987 and 2000. Today, the rejectionist wing of the Palestinian national movement, as embodied by Hamas, rejects the non-violent model as well as the two-state solution.

Even Palestinians who have been inspired by the Arab clamour for democracy, human rights, transparency and accountability may have doubts about the usefulness of non-violence. Eyad Sarraj, a leading psychiatrist and human rights campaigner in the Gaza Strip, put it best: "There is so much hatred, so much thirst for revenge. It would be very difficult to channel this anger into a non-violent path. Arab culture is about an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth. Going for non-violent resistance would look like a form of surrender."

Palestinians who frown upon non-violence and justify violence validate their position by referring to history: Egypt's credible performance in the Yom Kippur War prompted Israel to withdraw from the Sinai Peninsula within the framework of a political agreements. The first Palestinian intifadah persuaded Israel to test the Oslo peace process. The second Palestinian uprising legitimized the notion of partition, even in right-wing Israeli circles. Guerrilla warfare by Hezbollah hastened Israel's unilateral withdrawal from southern Lebanon.

By the same token, Palestinian advocates of violence are aware that the 1948 Arab-Israeli war, initiated by the Arab side, destroyed their opportunity for immediate statehood.

Of late, Palestinian skepticism of non-violence has begun to wane, driven by the fall of Arab regimes in Tunisia and Egypt and the growing acceptance of Palestinian statehood in the international community.

This non-violent trend gained traction after the outbreak of the second Palestinian uprising and has been embraced by the top leaders of the Palestinian Authority, President Mahmoud Abbas and Prime Minister Salam Fayyad. With an eye on Israeli and global public opinion, and with the support of nations like the United States, Canada, Britain and Russia, they have embarked on a strategy turning on nation building rather than violence. Predicated on a two-year plan unveiled in August 2009, it is based on the pre-1948 Zionist model of building the infrastructure and institutions of statehood before nationhood is formally declared.

Abbas and Fayyad, who are moderates within the context of Palestinian politics, formulated the strategy in the expectation that peace talks with Israel might fail. Last September, under U.S. auspices, Israel launched negotiations with the Palestinians. The talks soon fell apart over Israel's settlement construction program in the West Bank. The impasse continues.

Nonetheless, the Palestinian Authority has proceeded with its program, opening schools, erecting housing estates, training police and planting trees, among other activities. Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu broadly supports the Palestinian plan, even though the Israeli government has yet to submit an official map of the territory it intends to keep in the West Bank once a peace agreement is signed and sealed.

Fayyad, a U.S.-educated economist, claims that a Palestinian state, based on the 1967 border and land swaps with Israel, will be a democratic "peace-loving state that rejects violence and commits to coexistence with its neighbours." Hamas, which has controlled the Gaza Strip since an armed coup in 2007, opposes Fayyad's scheme. But Fayyad and Abbas are pressing ahead with diplomacy. In September, they will take their case to the UN General Assembly, betting that the vast majority of member states will cast their ballots in favour of an independent Palestinian state.

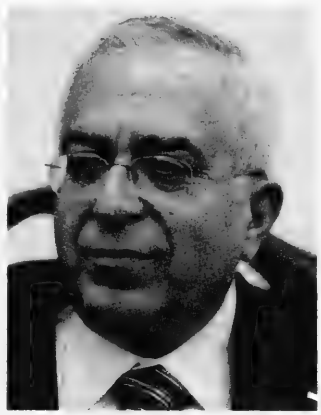
As part of its campaign to build the foundations of a state, the Palestinian Authority passed a law last year banning the sale of products produced in Israeli settlements in the West Bank and the Golan Heights. This economic boycott is designed to empower Palestinian manufacturers and sever commercial relations with Jewish settlers.

In the interval, Abbas and Fayyad have denounced violence. Shortly after terrorists killed a Jewish family in the West Bank settlement of Itamar last month, Abbas described the assault as "abominable, inhuman and immoral," while Fayyad said, "We utterly reject violence and nothing justifies it."

Their denunciation of violence – which is at variance with the Palestinian Authority's policy to name public places after deceased "martyrs" who have murdered Jews in terrorist attacks – is not new. In May 2002, two prominent Palestinian Christians, Jonathan Kuttab and Mubarak Awad, animated by the U.S. civil rights movement and the South African anti-apartheid movement, issued a manifesto rejecting violence. They wrote, "The Palestinian people have a unique chance to achieve their national goals, in spite of the enormous gap between them and their [Israeli] foes, if they pursue a conscious, organized strategy of non-violent resistance to the occupation on a massive scale."

In 2004, the grandson of the late Indian leader Mahatma Gandhi promoted the virtues of non-violence during a visit to the West Bank. He claimed it would increase world sympathy for the Palestinian cause.

Ironically enough, Moammar Gadhafi, the embattled Libyan leader, has also advised the Palestinians to consider non-violence. Two months ago, before rebels rose up in a bid to unseat him, he urged Palestinian refugees to capitalize on the wave of popular rebellion in the Middle East by massing peacefully on Israel's borders until Israel gave in to their demands.



Salam Fayyad

Although a third violent Palestinian uprising cannot be ruled out, the Palestinians, having apparently internalized the lessons of the current unrest in the Arab world, no longer automatically dismiss non-violent tactics. In this spirit, they are talking about peaceful marches by thousands of protesters toward Jerusalem, Israeli army positions and West Bank settlements. In fact, Palestinians were taking to the streets in non-violent protests before the current turmoil in the Arab world, mounting demonstrations to oppose the separation barrier and plans by Israel to raze Arab-owned homes in the eastern Jerusalem neighbourhood of Silwan.

Israel will have to be extremely mindful of international repercussions in confronting non-violent Palestinian protesters.

"The situation is different now," Menchem Klein, a Bar-Ilan University political scientist, has warned. "If Israel uses violence to suppress [non-violent] Palestinian demonstrations, it will be seen as another Moammar Gadhafi or Mahmoud Ahmadinejad."

IDF does not target civilians, colonel says

'The army uses force only to accomplish a mission. We want to avoid collateral damage.'

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Israel abides by a strict code of conduct in combat, a senior Israeli army officer said last week in an attempt to fend off accusations that Israel deliberately targeted Palestinian civilians during the war in the Gaza Strip some two years ago.

Ben Tzion Gruber made his comments shortly after Judge Richard Goldstone, the head of a United Nations commission investigating possible war crimes in Gaza, retracted a claim that Israel singled out civilians and civilian infrastructure during its invasion in 2009.

Speaking on "Ethics in the Field," Gruber, a colonel in the reserves who commanded a tank division in that three-week war, said that Israel hews to a doctrine of proportionality and takes special precautions not to harm Arab civilians in wartime situations.

"Collateral damage should be in proportion to the threat," he said, addressing a business luncheon in downtown Toronto. "The army uses force only to accomplish a mission. We want to avoid collateral damage. We don't want to hurt civilians."

Gruber, a resident of the West Bank settlement of Efrat, said Israel sent out leaflets and text messages to warn Arab civilians in Gaza of impending operations.

He denied charges that Israel deployed phosphorous bombs in urban areas of Gaza in contravention of international law.

The son of Holocaust survivors, Gruber explained that Israeli army commanders have only seconds to make major decisions in combat.

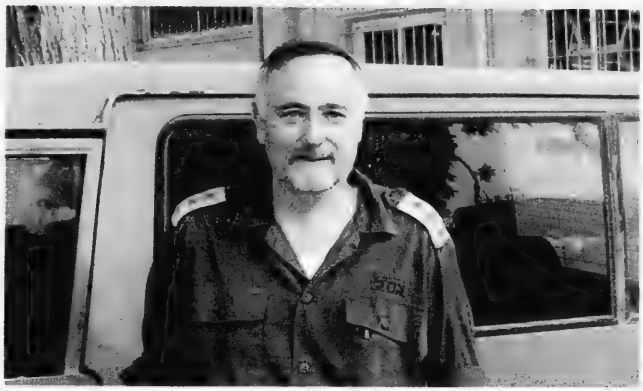
Mistakes can occur because terrorists wear civilian clothing, he added.

Gruber accused them of using "human shields." As he put it, "They are shooting behind kids."

And terrorists have commandeered United Nations ambulances to ferry men and arms, he noted.

Gruber said the Hamas government expropriated the ambulances after seizing control of Gaza from the Fatah faction in June 2007.

According to Gruber, Hamas stored rocket launchers in the yard of a mosque in Gaza during the war.



Ben Tzion Gruber

He said he gave the imam 24 hours to remove religious objects before demolishing the mosque.

By his estimation, 800 smuggling tunnels have been built in Gaza to bring in military equipment from the Sinai Peninsula and move around fighters.

Most of the tunnels are big enough to accommodate jeeps and, in some cases, trucks.

Four Gaza families control the tunnel system, he said, noting that the Hamas government charges $10,000 for a licence to build a tunnel.

Rockets fired from Gaza can now reach Tel Aviv and most places in Israel, he said.

Thousands of such rockets have been fired at Israel in the past nine years. During the peak years in 2007 and 2008, there were more than 5,000 launchings, he said.

Clergy to lead faith groups on mission to Israel

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

A group led by Canadian clergy from all three Abrahamic faith communities will travel to Israel later this year.

This is the first trip of its kind from Canada, according to the organizers.

From Sept. 4 to 10, Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Beth Tzedec Congregation of Toronto; Father Damian MacPherson, director of ecumenism and interfaith affairs for the Catholic Archdiocese of Toronto; Imam Abdul Hai Patel, Muslim chaplain and president of the Ontario Multifaith Council; and Rev. Karen Hamilton, a minister for the United Church of Canada, will journey in the Holy Land on a mission to bridge differences between the faiths.

At a breakfast meeting in Toronto recently, three of the trip's four faith leaders – Rabbi Frydman-Kohl was on vacation in Israel, replaced for this meeting by Beth Tzedec Rabbi Harvey Meirovich – discussed aspirations and fears heading into the visit, which is being organized by Toronto's Israel Government Tourism Office (IGTO) and the local travel agency, Aufgang Travel.

The trip is the outgrowth of "a dream" by Rabbi Frydman-Kohl, according to the organizers.

"It's not just about being there. It's about bringing the message back," according to Judy Csillag, a consultant with the trip. "This is not a tourism trip… it's about engaging in citizen diplomacy."

All the leaders have travelled to Israel individually in the past, but this will mark their first trip as a group.

Rabbi Meirovich, who maintains residences in both Jerusalem and Toronto, called the trip "complex" and said he felt that there were many potential religious and political "minefields" that would need to be defused by the participants.

"Once we add the political layer to the religious dimension [of the trip], it may become even harder to talk with each other," he said. "But hopefully, there is modelling going on here for the lay people who will [see] this trip and then grow closer together through more dialogue."

Father MacPherson said that he and his fellow participants were aware they will be "writing the textbook" for future trips of this kind.

"I look forward to Jews and Muslims being addressed by Christians" in Israel, he said.

He added: "The guiding hand of Abraham is very important to us. I'm not expecting a minefield. This group will come together."

However, Rev. Hamilton said she expects there will be some tension on the trip. While she, Imam Patel, Father MacPherson and Rabbi Frydman-Kohl have all been partners in interfaith community experiences for more than 15 years, she said a trip of this kind will challenge even their camaraderie.

"We've done everything except get blisters on our feet together [over the years]," she quipped, noting that travelling the land and visiting each other's holy places together will force them to truly hear one another's narratives. This will necessarily create the need for expanded dialogue.

"We need to see the Holy Land together, and we need to understand it together better than we already do. We need to understand why it is so special to the other. When we go to Israel and the Palestinian territories, there will be tensions. But we know we can talk about whatever difficulty arises."

Jerry Adler, manager of marketing and public relations for the IGTO, said the trip will be "earth-shattering" for participants and added that this is not a voyage for inexperienced travellers to Israel.

The six-day itinerary, put together by Hanan Perahia, sales manager at Aufgang Travel, will be a gruelling one physically and mentally.

In addition to travelling the country from top to bottom with stops at various Muslim, Christian and Jewish locations of religious significance, the participants will also meet with Arab Israeli and Jewish Israeli bereaved families; hear lectures by faith leaders in Israel; visit Yad

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Do-it-yourself Haggadot

Passover is around the corner and that means you'll soon be reaching into a familiar drawer and pull out a stack of well-worn and slightly wine-stained Haggadot. Nothing will ever replace those Haggadot and their special memories. But if you spend a few minutes online, you can customize your own Haggadah with commentary and clear instructions that will impress friends and family at the seders.

The Open Source Haggadah allows you to skim through assorted Hebrew and English text, commentary, songs, readings and rituals, and assemble your own Haggadah online. You can filter texts by interest, from "Chabad, Conservative, Feminist, Humorous" to "Shoah, Unafilliated, Zionist." When you're done, add some commentary and a song or two, then print your own Haggadah. And if you have a favourite custom or insight that you'd like to share, you are encouraged to contribute it to the site. [http://bit.ly/haga18]

Similarly, Haggadot.com allows you to mix and match from, at last count, 666 "clips" to create your personalized Haggadah. As the site explains, "Pieces from a feminist Reconstructionist version may coexist with selections from a Haggadah from the 1500s. A family of Ashkenazi and Sephardi Jews can include both traditions in one Haggadah. A family separated by distance may collaborate online to create a shared Haggadah for their separate seders... Jews everywhere will understand that, whatever their background, they have a place at the global seder table." [http://bit.ly/haga19]

Rabbi Barry Dov Lerner has created several Haggadot that can be printed and combined. Some contain the entire text of the seder, and others have highlights only. And then there's the "World's Largest Seder Songbook" with all the traditional titles, as well contemporary tunes such as There's No Seder Like Our Seder. First, download the instructions for creating a do-it-yourself Haggadah. [http://bit.ly/haga1] Then go to this page for all the links. [http://bit.ly/haga15]

Now that you have the basics, you can get really creative. There are several sites that offer the Haggadah text in its entirety. Mechon-Mamre.org provides Hebrew and English side-by-side with clear instructions. [http://bit.ly/haga21] Several classic Haggadot have been scanned in their entirety and can be downloaded and printed out at the Torah on the Net site. [http://bit.ly/haga22]

A bit less traditional but quite wonderful is Uncle Eli's Special-for-Kids Most-Fun-Ever Under-the-Table Passover Haggadah. Written in the style of Dr. Seuss, Uncle Eli retells the Haggadah in a familiar yet unique way [http://bit.ly/haga27].

And if you're planning to lead a seder this year and need a bit of help with your Hebrew pronunciation or want to brush up on a tune, the Virtual Cantor is at your service. (Actually, you're at his service.). The cantor – also known as Josh Sharfman – has recorded the entire traditional Haggadah. Listen online or download them onto your iPod and review them anywhere. [http://bit.ly/haga34]

Have a kosher and happy Passover!

Outsourced, and in-house, education

In past columns I have extolled the virtues of schools, camps, Israel trips and service learning. These cornerstones of Jewish education teach texts and traditions while acculturating youth to the values of our community. While I deeply value their impact, these services must be understood as outsourcing essential services that were once conducted at home and that cannot be successful in isolation from parallel, in-house Jewish living.

Outsourcing has its benefits. We outsource to experts – Jewish educators who are professionally trained. We outsource to seek efficiencies – a classroom is more cost effective than private lessons. We outsource to improve the quality of the experience – learning in a group is more fun. We outsource to seek operational expertise – schools and camps know their business. But these benefits are whittled away when not supported by the home.

Class Act

Daniel Held

When dropping children off at Hebrew school or waving goodbye to the camp bus, we offer ourselves a false sense of accomplishment. In some ways this security is logical. We do the same with judo, dance and piano lessons. We drop our children off at the dance studio and expect the teacher to teach, then shep naches at the recital.

Judaism is not akin to dance. While the dance instructor teaches complex footwork and body movement, Jewish education is an intricate mix of knowledge and skills. The Hebrew school teacher can train his student to decode Hebrew letters or chant a Haftorah, but without strong modelling at home, the affective connection to Judaism will collapse.

We often perceive teenagers as rebellious and contrary. Many of the attitudes expressed by teens don't demonstrate the admiration or gratitude we hope for, causing some parents to conclude that they have lost their influence in shaping their children's lives. Notwithstanding adolescents' characteristically monosyllabic responses, parents continue to have a significant effect on their children's identity.

The American National Study of Youth and Religion shows that parents – more than schools, peers or media – are the strongest influence on adolescent religion. "Simply by living and interacting with their children, most parents establish expectations, define normalcy, model life practice, set boundaries, and make demands – all of which cannot help but influence teenagers, for good or ill." The study reveals that teens mirror their parents' spiritual practices and religious beliefs. In aggregate, adolescent attendance at religious services parallels their parents. Teens believe, or don't believe, in God like their parents. They practise religion, or don't, like their parents.

In interviews I conducted with teens exploring their attachment to Israel, I was surprised by consistent references to parents. Teens reflect that casual conversations around the dinner table, their parents' reactions to news about Israel, donation patterns, and travel to Israel profoundly impact the ways they form their identity. Assuming that teens ignore or rebel against their parents belittles the power of parenting.

Like no other Jewish observance, Passover bridges outsourced and in-house Jewish education, buttressing lessons from school and youth groups with the support, buy-in and inherent power of Jewish parenting.

Cleaning our homes of chametz, eating matzah, and having a seder are examples of parental modelling that reinforce the lessons of educational programs, and our seders are only enhanced by the lessons our children bring home. This partnership consistently makes Passover one of the most celebrated Jewish holidays and should serve as a model for greater symbiosis between outsourced and in-house Jewish education.

Election time is coming

At the beginning of the year, talk of a 2011 election was just that, talk.

It didn't seem likely that we would see Canadians at the polls, but after recent events, this is exactly what we will see. There will be a spring election, as the current prime minister, Stephen Harper, and his Conservative government lost a non-confidence motion in the House of Commons on March 25, 2011.

This situation is similar to the one in 2005, when a Liberal minority was booted from power after only a year and five months. That ended the tenure of Paul Martin as prime minister, and a minority Conservative government, headed by Harper, came into power.

With the promise of an election and the possibility that there may be a new prime minister in May, everyone has agendas to push and campaigns are fully under way. The Conservatives have hit the television hard with numerous spots, some in support of Harper as prime minister and others lambasting Liberal leader Michael Ignatieff.

While many people get their political information from the TV commercials, many students are taking to new social media websites to find out what's going on. Facebook and Twitter allow students to not only express their own opinions but also to learn what other people's views are.

Facebook has become increasingly powerful in the political arena. U.S. President Barack Obama and the Democratic party owe their 2008 election success partially to Facebook. The Obama-Biden duo were the first political tandem to use social media as a campaign tool, and it helped lead to a victory.

Ever since the non-confidence vote in Parliament, Jewish students have been spamming Facebook and Twitter with their political views. In an era when young people are often considered apathetic about politics, it's refreshing to see them take such an interest. Also, Facebook events have been organized to try to get people out to vote.

On Campus

Justin Dahan

Many of the subjects being discussed in the current election campaign are such hot-button issues as taxes and health care. According to social media outlets, these are not the deciding factors that affect choices made by Jewish student voters.

It seems that while the general Canadian population is primarily concerned with issues that affect themselves, Jewish students have a more altruistic view – they are more concerned with how each political candidate may affect their homeland.

Throughout Harper's tenure as prime minister, he has been an avid supporter of Israel. His detractors have even gone so far to suggest that he supports Israel too much. Of course, that sentiment only attracts more Jewish voters to the prime minister.

Ignatieff, the Liberal leader, has quite a different relationship with Israel. While in recent history he has publicly supported Israel, he has in the past criticized Israel. In 2006, Ignatieff, denounced Israel for the conflict with Lebanon, but he did not criticize the terrorist organization Hezbollah for its role in the conflict.

While it's true that there are other candidates for prime minister, the real race is between Harper and Ignatieff. Given Ignatieff's history on Israel, it's no surprise if the majority of Jewish students put their support behind Harper's party, and hope for a majority Conservative government.

Focus on the children

Modern Jewish educators frequently use drama as an educational tool to bring a biblical or talmudic story to life, as exemplified by the fact that much of the Pesach seder is geared toward children, thus fulfilling the mitzvah of "v'higadita l'bincha" ("And you shall tell your children").

In this vein, the Talmud instructs us to distribute parched grain and nuts to children at the seder, so that they may stay awake and ask questions. This is but one technique used to involve children in the Pesach seder.

Sephardi Window

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

There is a widespread custom among Sephardi and Oriental Jews, according to which a seder participant dresses up at some point as if he had just left Egypt. This provokes questions, and "the wandering Jew" explains that he has left bondage for freedom in The Land.

Among Moroccan Jews, the host waves the seder plate in a circle three times above the head of each attendee, while reciting from the Moroccan Haggadah: Bibhilu yatza'anu miMitzraim halachma anya benai chorin. ("It is with haste that we came out of Egypt and this is the bread of affliction that we ate.") This custom represents the clouds of glory that protected the Jewish nation as it journeyed from Egypt to the Promised Land.

In our house, we focus the first seder on the children, explaining this priority in advance to our guests. We demonstrate what happened during the Exodus in different ways, according to the predilections and maturity of each child. We seek to stimulate them through questions and discussion.

Why this emphasis on the children? After all, there are other people around the seder table. What about them?

It seems as if the Torah instructs us to tell the story to our children because God knows that to ensure an enduring and vibrant Jewish heritage, we must educate the next generation – our children.

I remember fondly going, as a young boy, often with my siblings and cousins, to visit my paternal grandfather, Rabbi Ayad Acoca, who lived in a small apartment in Dora, near Netanya. My grandfather was invariably engaged in Talmud study, some of which he would sometimes share with his grandchildren.

I remember my father telling me once a remarkable story about "Papo" Ayad when he was a young man in Morocco. He was travelling from Azemour to Sale and he was obliged to cross a nearby river – probably the River Oued Sala, now known as the River Bouregreg – by raft, along with other travellers. At some point, a storm hit the raft, causing it to capsize with all aboard lost except for my grandfather, who weathered the storm while fiercely clutching a volume of Talmud.

My father used to tell me that his father cherished the idea that among his progeny would be a rabbi who would transmit the Jewish heritage as resolutely as he had held on to his Talmud.

Let us bear in mind that God created each of us to teach and to lead by example, and to encourage our children – our most precious responsibility – by instilling in them the message of Pesach as actively and generously as we can.

Pride policies changed

"Some folks want the parade to be about politics. Most want it to be a celebration," Rev. Hawkes said.

A compromise was reached, Elliott said, by which Pride adopted a set of recommendations devised by the panel, including a "dispute resolution process" to determine whether groups such as QuAIA will continue to be allowed in the parade.

These new internal rules for governance and accountability were what the panel was explicitly established to provide, and it's now up to Pride to apply them, Rev. Hawkes said.

Pride Toronto is currently canvassing for "volunteer adjudicators with experience." Once the adjudicators are in place, they'll hear complaints from the community, one of which will likely be about QuAIA, Rev. Hawkes said.

Rulings made by the Pride adjudicators in the new dispute resolution process will be binding, he added.

Gladstone however, said that while the advisory panel was convened as a result of QuAIA's presence in the parade, it never specifically dealt with the issue.

That avoidance represents "a complete moral abdication" by the panel, and by Pride, for allowing QuAIA to sour a once-proud gay community event, he said.

He added that "thousands" of people feel unwelcome and unsafe due to the group's annual presence.

Gladstone also said he won't take part in the dispute resolution process.

"I'm not going to put Israel on trial. If I wanted to bring a complaint... we'd have to challenge [QuAIA] and argue a case that Israel is not an apartheid state. And what would happen is they would use [the dispute resolution process] as... a media circus to gain as much attention as possible to further their message that Israel is a pariah, apartheid state."

His position isn't shared by such Jewish groups as Canadian Jewish Congress and Canadian Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center (FSWC).

Len Rudner, Congress' Ontario regional director, wants to give the new resolution process "a chance to work."

Justine Apple

Asked if CJC will file a complaint about QuAIA with Pride this year, Rudner said it would be more appropriate for Kulanu Toronto, which represents Toronto's Jewish gay and lesbian community, to make that call.

Justine Apple, Kulanu's executive director, said her organization is "weighing its options" about whether to file a complaint. "We don't want to continue to fuel their flame," she said, adding that Kulanu "commends Pride on the implementation of the dispute resolution process," which had been sorely lacking.

Last week, FSWC distributed an e-mail bulletin saying that its president and CEO, Avi Benlolo, had met with Rev. Hawkes and was looking forward to "working collaboratively" with him on Pride issues after mistakenly labeling him a QuAIA supporter in previous literature.

FSWC also distributed an open letter to the Jewish community from Rev. Hawkes, in which he declared that he's "neither a member of QuAIA nor have I ever been a supporter of QuAIA. In the past, I have carried both a rainbow flag and an Israeli flag in our church's Pride Parade contingent."

Representatives of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Congress, FSWC – and others all marched with Kulanu at last year's parade in a show of solidarity against QuAIA.

"This year, we want to stay a little more neutral [politically] and keep Pride about Pride. We want to focus on the celebration," Apple said.

She said Kulanu appreciates the stance Toronto Mayor Rob Ford has taken – he said he won't give city funds to Pride if QuAIA marches again this year – but she declined to comment on the extra $100,000 that the province of Ontario has given to Pride for the parade this year.

Via a Celebrate Ontario Grant, the province is giving Pride $400,000, up from the $300,000 it gave in 2010. The funding announcement came after Pride said was left with a $431,808 deficit after last year's festival.

Pride received $123,807 from the city last year.

Interfaith mission planned

Vashem and receive debriefings in the evenings led by Rabbi Frydman-Kohl about what was seen and heard on any given day.

Imam Patel said his co-operation with Catholics, Protestants and Jews over the years has been an inspiration.

"In order to take a message of peace over [to Israel] and then return that message back here is the heart of our mission. What better place to go together, to see the places that are sacred to each of us, what better place to go and build a better relationship among Canadians [of all faiths], and return and say we have travelled together and then promote and enhance our existing relationships."

Organizers estimate that once the trip is fully booked, there will be around 100 participants. Attempts are being made to have an equal number of Jewish, Christian and Muslim participants on the voyage.

Conservative rabbis discuss movement's future

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Ten Canadian Conservative rabbis joined almost 300 of their colleagues at the annual Rabbinical Assembly convention in Las Vegas at the end of March to address perennial existential questions about the movement's prospects.

The agenda was dominated by the future of Conservative Judaism – what it is, where it's headed, and how rabbis can get that message out to the world. But there was little of the grumbling by key Conservative synagogue leaders that reportedly prompted the development and release in February of a new strategic plan to restructure the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism (USCJ).

Instead, there was energy, and even a little bravado, while criticism was tempered by concern about what lies ahead for what is now the second-largest North American denomination after Reform (although affiliated and non-affiliated Conservative shuls still predominate in Canada).

Rabbi Lionel Moses, spiritual leader of Montreal's Shaare Zion Congregation, told The CJN after returning from the conference that the strategic plan "as it is right now, is more a series of objectives and ideals," and that the next stage will involve transforming them into "a pragmatic plan."

Rabbi Philip Scheim

Rabbi Lionel Moses

Rabbi Philip Scheim, of Toronto's Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue, said that despite negative press and talk of a Conservative movement in decline, he left the convention impressed by the "charismatic" young leadership who are "committed to maintaining a meaningful presence in the world Jewish scene."

But he noted that there is "a lot of uncertainty" about USCJ, which three Toronto synagogues left a couple of years ago. Beth David is still part of the Conservative synagogue umbrella group.

Rabbi Scheim believes that becoming unaffiliated would be a huge loss for youth in particular, because of United Synagogue Youth (USY), the movement's youth arm. "That on its own justifies affiliation," he said, referring to USY's potentially "life-changing" role in formation of Jewish identity and development of leadership skills.

As well, he added, even if "you're not getting direct return for your dollars... you [affiliate] because you believe in supporting an institution." He likened it to belonging to a synagogue even though High Holiday tickets can be purchased without membership, and non-members can attend Shabbat services.

The convention featured formal discussions among the United Synagogue leadership and key figures among a group of about 50 rabbis who have been pushing for completely overhauling United Synagogue. They call themselves Hayom: Coalition for the Transformation of Conservative Judaism. The talks took place behind closed doors.

Rabbi Moses, whose synagogue left USCJ two years ago for economic reasons, believes that Conservative rabbis in Canada and the United States face "largely" the same issues.

Much of the talk at the convention focused on social networking, and promoting the idea of what Conservative Judaism offers, he said.

"The way we teach Torah is... progressive, and yet holds firm to the tradition."

Rabbi Moses believes that there's "a lot of energy" among Conservative rabbis and lay people, spanning a wide range of ages.

At the same time, he acknowledged, "We may not be as large as we once were. We may not appear to be as strong as we once were. But we are as committed to the type of Judaism that we have been teaching and practising for 100 years as we were when Solomon Schechter came to the United States."

Although there are differences in practice among Conservative congregations, he said that "philosophically and ideologically, there's tremendous agreement" among Conservative rabbis, whether they are from North or South America, Europe or Israel.

Reform rabbis gather to 'share best practices'

Some congregations have stopped using the word 'members'

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Despite significant differences between the Reform movement in Canada and the United States – including attitudes toward patrilineal descent as a determinant of Jewish status – Toronto's Rabbi Erin Polonsky says the recent convention of the movement's rabbinical body was "extremely relevant" to her colleagues here.

Rabbi Polonsky, of Temple Sinai Congregation, was one of 14 Canadian rabbis who attended the 122nd annual Central Conference of American Rabbis (CCAR) convention, held in New Orleans March 27 to 30. Approximately 500 rabbis took part in the meeting.

Rabbi Steven Garten, spiritual leader of Ottawa's Temple Israel and president of the CCAR's Canadian region, noted that outside Toronto, Reform Judaism in Canada represents "quite a small segment of the Jewish population."

For Canadian rabbis, he said, it's extremely valuable to attend the convention and connect with colleagues from the United States, where Reform is the largest denomination, as well as with colleagues from places such as Israel or Europe, where Reform is a minority, as it is here.

He said that while there are differences with respect to rabbinic practice, colleagues in the United States face the same issues that are important here: Israel, changing family patterns, increasing intermarriage rates among young Jews, and engaging youth.

Rabbi Steven Garten

Rabbi Erin Polonsky

"It's important to listen to how rabbis in other communities are dealing with [issues]."

Of particular interest to him, he learned of almost 10 congregations that have "stopped using the word 'members,'" and have come up with alternative concepts that may have more appeal to younger adults.

"Chabad has no members," he noted. "Shtibls never had members. People come in and avail themselves of the services. You become a member of the community, or a friend of the community."

"We're part of the larger North American movement," said Rabbi Polonsky, who has also worked in the United States. She added that she thinks it's important for American rabbis to be reminded that they don't live in a vacuum.

The convention is not only about issues, she said. "It's also about learning, sharing best practices and programming, hearing about the latest innovations in worship style and resources, and learning from our teachers. It's a really good rejuvenation vehicle."

In New Orleans, Rabbi Polonsky learned about "prayer technology" involving images on screens set up in sanctuaries to enhance prayer. "They call it visual tfillah."

On a broader scale, CCAR members – like their counterparts at the Conservative movement's Rabbinical Assembly convention, which was held at the same time in Las Vegas – discussed the future of their movement.

"The Conservative, Reform and Reconstructionist movements are all going through structured processes about where they will go in the future," said Rabbi Garten.

He added that Reform rabbis are very positive about the movement and that there's a great commitment to its underlying principles.

מלחמות הישראלים בטורונטו

ענת קורן עורכת העיתון הישראלי "אלונדן" באנגליה הגיבה באלה הדברים:

"נחמד מאוד, אני שמחה שציינת זאת. גם בקונגרס היהודי הראשון ניסו אנשים לרצוח זה את זה, ולמרות זאת המשימה הושגה....." אופטימיות היא מעלה טובה.

"כי אתה בחרתנו"- הצגת חובה

שולי נתן בטורונטו

ביום ראשון, ה 15 במאי, תופיע בטורונטו שולי ("ירושלים של זהב") נתן, ולצידה מיקי לוין שלנו. קשה לחשוב על צורה יותר הולמת לחגוג את יום העצמאות. כרטיסים ניתן להשיג בטלפון 4165232305.

Moms form a mitzvah club

Riva Gold
Special to The CJN

Sometimes a whole season of mitzvot can spring from something as simple as a cup of coffee. Or at least it did for three Toronto moms, who came up with the idea behind the Mini Mitzvah Club one day over coffee at the Second Cup.

"A couple of moms and I were talking, and we wanted to get our kids doing regular mitzvot that we could do with them," said Jori Lichtman, who co-founded the club along with Michelle Porepa and Elana Geller.

"In schools, there were many nice things for our kids to do, but we didn't always get to see that as parents."

In response, they created the Mini Mitzvah Club, a group of young families that meet once a month to do a different mitzvah. "We made a calendar of tangible, simple, low-cost things to do with our kids so that they would understand that they were giving back," Lichtman said.

The club, which was founded last October, has hosted a wide range of events, including a Puzzlethon that raised money for three different charities. "For the Puzzlethon, each kid was given a passport and they got to stamp it for every puzzle they completed," Lichtman said. "When they were done, their stamps were exchanged for loonies, which they could put in a tzedakah box for the hungry, the sick or the homeless."

"After the Puzzlethon, my four-year-old kept telling people about the tzedakah box she chose and what it meant," said Lisa Millstein Sone, a Mini Mitzvah member. "It was wonderful to see that she was getting it, and how happy it made her that she was helping others."

The club has also been involved with Jake's Gigantic Give, which raised money for children with neurodegenerative diseases; the Kavanah Garden, an organic educational garden that models Jewish agricultural laws and environmental ethics, and a holiday gift drive for a women and children's shelter.

"We have a cost filter, a feasibility filter and, most importantly, a mission – simple, tangible mitzvot," said Lichtman. "We don't have to change the world. We just want to get our kids to get the spirit of it and, of course, to have fun."

Lichtman stressed the importance of getting kids involved in mitzvot from a young age. "That core of you starts so early," she said. "We want to instil the notion of mitzvot in them from the get-go, so they know it's a part of life."

Millstein Sone agreed, and hopes that by exposing her kids to the club, they will be inspired to continue giving back to the community as they get older. "They're like sponges at this age," she said. "It's also really great to get the kids involved with a group that pairs something meaningful with something fun, and something that they can connect to and appreciate."

This month, the Mini Mitzvah Club will participate in a Passover food drive in conjunction with the National Council of Jewish Women of Canada.

"We see our role as evolving. We do some things that are homegrown and simple, but we also leverage what other groups are doing and invite our members to join," said Lichtman. The club will be assisting with the sorting and packing of food on April 3 and delivery the following weekend.

The club will also be planting trees in Downsview Park on April 17 to celebrate Earth Day.

"Anyone is welcome to join," said Lichtman. "The beauty of it is that it's very grassroots, very organic. People bring ideas, and if the other parents like it and it's feasible, we try to go for it. There's no membership or commitment requirement, but we have a lot of repeat attendees."

For more information, visit the club's Facebook page at www.facebook.com/mitzvahclub or e-mail minimitzvah@rogers.com.

Toronto writer delves into 5,000 years of slavery

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

For Marjorie Gann, slavery is not "just history."

A retired English and English-as-a-second language teacher, she has just co-written a lavishly illustrated book about this "peculiar institution."

Five Thousand Years of Slavery (Tundra Books) reminds readers that the battle for freedom is a never-ending struggle.

And on Passover, which evokes the biblical story of the Israelites chafing under the tyranny of the Pharaohs, this is a particularly poignant theme.

Marjorie Gann

Gann and her co-author and sister, Janet Willen, a writer and editor, were born in the United States and grew up in the 1950s, when America was still steeped in the legacy of slavery.

"We vividly remember travelling down to Florida to visit our grandmother and stopping at gas stations along the way where we saw 'Whites Only' signs on the washrooms and in restaurants," recalled Gann, who has lived in Canada since the late 1960s and has been a member of the jury of the Canadian Jewish Book Awards.

"We even remember seeing a chain gang of black men, all in striped prison uniforms, doing road work under the eye of a white guard holding a whip in his hand," added Gann, who has been deeply influenced by Rabbi Jonathan Sacks' Haggadah, which highlights the message of Exodus. "As you can imagine, that made a powerful impression on us, and ensured our entire family's commitment to the cause of [Rev.] Martin Luther King and the civil rights movement."

Years later, when she was already living in Canada with her husband, a professor of French literature, Gann was shocked to learn that slavery was not merely a mist-shrouded episode in history.

As she put it, "When I organized a speaker for my shul, First Narayever, on the genocide in the Darfur region of Sudan, I was saddened to discover that one of the ways the people of Darfur were victimized was through slave raids on their villages."

At around the same time, Gann's sister read an article about slavery in Mauritania and Sudan that left a deep impression.

"The more we read, the more aware we became that slavery is a pressing moral issue today. In terms of sheer numbers, there are actually more slaves in the world today than ever before, anywhere from 12 to 27 million. So that's when we decided to write about slavery."

In researching their book, a wide-ranging survey of slavery covering every conceivable angle, the sisters consulted more than 200 sources. "We unearthed many engaging stories, told by slaves or their owners. So our book doesn't read like a textbook, but instead bears witness to slavery, often through the words of eyewitnesses."

To delve into Five Thousand Years of Slavery is to be jolted into the realization of how universal and pervasive it was and still is.

They tell of the captives who built palaces for the rulers of Mesopotamia and Assyria, of the Vikings who raided Scandinavian villages for slaves, of the Arab slave traders who shipped Africans to clove plantations in Zanzibar and of the Chinese girls sold into bondage by their parents.

Excerpt from a 14th-century Haggadah. [From Five Thousand Years of Slavery]

"We also discuss the terrible forms slavery takes today," said Gann, the mother of two grown children. "Children slaving at looms in Pakistan or in cocoa farms in Ivory Coast. Women born into lives of domestic toil in Mauritania and, perhaps most surprising to North Americans, workers trafficked into agricultural labour in Florida."

Slavery has always been widespread, Gann observes. "There were few cultures that did not practise some form of slavery, be it perpetual debt bondage, the use of war captives, domestic chattel slavery, forced concubinage or gang slavery in plantations or on construction projects."

Judging by Jeremiah's castigation of his people's failure to free their Hebrew slaves, the ancient Hebrews were not above keeping slaves.

Two passages in the Torah appear to sanction slavery, Gann notes. "Exodus 21:1-2 makes it clear that a temporary form of debt bondage is permitted. In Leviticus 25:40, Hebrews are allowed to keep non-Hebrew slaves in perpetual servitude."

The ownership of slaves transcended ethnicity and geography.

"Arab slave traders trafficked black Africans through the Sahara and across the Indian Ocean. Pacific islanders trafficked other Pacific islanders and white Europeans to work on farms in the Philippines.

"White Europeans trafficked Pacific islanders to do similar work. Native Americans, like the Nootka people of Vancouver Island, captured European sailors and set them to work. And, of course, Europeans sent Africans to the sugar and cotton plantations of the Americas."

During the trans-Atlantic slave trade era, a very small percentage of the traders were American Jews. And in the U.S. southern states, Jews kept slaves. "Any Jew who could afford to own slaves and had a need for their services would do so," the American historian Bertram Korn has written.

Contemporary slavery is a blot on the world's conscience, she says.

In China, political dissidents are dumped into camps resembling Soviet gulags. In Uganda, military groups kidnap youngsters, turning them into child soldiers. Children in Mali are tricked into becoming slaves in Ivory Coast, and in India and Pakistan, children as young as four toil at looms weaving carpets. Latinos in the United States work on farms. Some are held against their will and paid negligible wages.

Though Gann has every right to be pessimistic about the persistence of slavery, she is surprisingly upbeat.

"There is hope for today's slaves," she said. "Two great abolition movements in Britain and the United States in the 18th and 19th centuries made a difference. And today, there is no lack of abolition movements: Anti-Slavery International in Britain, Free the Slaves in the United States and the Kielburger brothers' Free the Children right here in Toronto."

On the eve of Passover, she urges readers to visit the websites of these anti-slavery organizations.

"Passover's message is one of hope, not despair. We are called to remember that we were slaves in Egypt. But remembering isn't enough. As we eat matzah and taste bitter herbs, we should commit ourselves to those still toiling under today's Pharaohs."

Fun should be Weatherproof.

Egyptian Jew recounts her family's exodus

Yosef Tastassa
Special to The CJN

Ethy Lebow was born Esther Anavy in Egypt in 1948.

When she was nine, her family was forced to leave Egypt and flee to Israel.

"The consequences of my life are due to a decision taken by my great-grandfather. At the end of the 19th century my great-grandparents, who were Sephardic Jews, lived in Bulgaria, then a part of the Austro-Hungarian Empire," Lebow said.

"My great-grandfather got an attractive job offer in an Egyptian sugar plant. The whole family moved to Hawamdiyya, a small community near Giza, and lived there for over half of a century."

Ethy Lebow

Lebow describes her childhood in Egypt as pleasant and abundant. The men in the community worked for most of the day in the sugar plant, and the women were housewives who employed servants for housework. It was like living in a British colony, she said.

"We spent the afternoons in the community's country club and also enjoyed other luxurious comforts."

In the village where she was born and raised, there were only five Jewish families, so there was no real Jewish community life, though she remembers celebrating Chanukah and Passover at her grandfather's house.

"Pesach was a paradox to me," Lebow said. "We were celebrating the Exodus of the people of Israel from Egypt in ancient times, while in modern times my family returned to Egypt of its free will."

By the time Lebow was eight, the impending exodus of her family finally came.

In 1956, the United Kingdom, France and Israel attacked Egypt. As a result, the relatively peaceful life of Egyptian Jewry was changed forever.

"I remember that my father was called to the police station. He was told that we had one week to leave Egypt," Lebow recalled.

"Eventually, our family left the village and moved to Cairo and stayed there for a few months. During one of the bombings over the city, I remember hearing one Egyptian threatening to kill every Jew he [saw]. It was scary."

In February 1957, leaving property and memories behind them, the family left Egypt and moved to Israel. They settled in Ashdod, and for the first two months, the family lived in a tin barrack with outhouses. Then they were moved to structures that reminded Lebow of townhouses.

"Don't get me wrong, the so-called townhouses were nothing but a simple structure made of pressed wood. There was running water, washrooms, but no electricity."

"It was quite shocking to leave the comfortable life in Egypt and live in Israel like a refugee. Exactly like the Israelites left Egypt in ancient times and then were refugees in the desert for 40 years. We lived like that for three years until we finally moved to a normal building in 1960," Lebow said.

Lebow joined the Israel Defence Forces in 1966. She served in the armoured corps and was in active service during the Six Day War in June 1967. Afterward, she met Barry, a young Canadian Jew who was a volunteer with the IDF after the war.

"It was very quick and sudden. We fell in love, got married and moved to Canada in 1968. We lived in Toronto near Bathurst and Lawrence," Lebow said. "By the age of 22, I had lived in three different countries and was a mother of a boy and a girl, Ronnie and Stacey. After 27 years of marriage, Barry and I separated and moved [our] own ways." Later in her life, she met Gaston Marks. They were life partners for 12 years. Marks died in 2009.

"I never considered myself as an Egyptian," Lebow said. "Even though I am 43 years in Canada, I see myself as an Israeli. However, when I visit Israel, I say I am Canadian. But above all, I am Jewish, and I'm taking that identity with me anywhere."

Lebow speaks four languages: French, as her mother tongue; Ladino, which was spoken by her grandparents; Hebrew and English. The Arabic she knew as a child is now forgotten.

Since coming to Canada, Lebow has been active in several Jewish organizations, among them the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, ORT and Israel Bonds. In 1976, she joined the Jewish Women International Canada (JWIC) French-speaking chapter, Soleil. She was president of JWIC Toronto in 1994-95.

Her current volunteer activities include raising funds for the Jerusalem Hills Children's Home, an institution in Israel that cares for children who are emotionally disturbed. In Canada, Lebow advocates against domestic violence.

Lumet directed Network, Serpico

JTA

LOS ANGELES — Director Sidney Lumet, who started his career as a child actor in the Yiddish theatre and whose films examining social justice in America stand as hallmarks of his craft, has died.

Lumet died last Saturday of lymphoma at his New York home. He was 86.

His parents were veterans of the Yiddish stage: father Baruch Lumet was an actor and director, and mother Eugenia Wermus was a dancer. In later years, Sidney Lumet attributed his films' emphasis on conscience and struggle for justice to his Jewish upbringing.

Sidney Lumet

Moving with his parents from one New York borough to another, often in antisemitic neighborhoods, the small-statured Sidney learned at an early age to fend for himself.

One of his early acting gigs was in Ben Hecht's 1946 pageant, A Flag Is Born, which rallied American public opinion in support of a Jewish state in Palestine.

After serving as a U.S. Army radar repairman in Burma and India during World War II, Lumet got his start in television and hit it big with his first feature film, 12 Angry Men. The 1957 movie, starring Henry Fonda as a hold-out juror, earned Lumet the first of five Oscar nominations.

During a 50-year career, Lumet directed 43 feature films and hundreds of television episodes. Among them were such memorable movies as Long Day's Journey into Night, Dog Day Afternoon, Serpico, The Verdict and Running on Empty.

In 1976, his movie Network, about a disaffected TV news anchor, immortalized the phrase "I'm mad as hell and I'm not going to take this anymore."

Lumet repeatedly returned to Jewish themes and characters, first in The Pawnbroker, about a haunted Holocaust survivor; followed by Bye Bye Braverman, about Jewish intellectuals in New York; Daniel about the Julius and Ethel Rosenberg spy case, and A Stranger Among Us, unfolding in a chassidic community.

Most of his films were set and filmed in New York City. He didn't hate Hollywood, but disliked the studio system and avoided what he described as "a company town," adding "there is no real world there outside of filming."

Lumet was admired for bringing in his films on schedule and under budget by carefully rehearsing his actors for weeks in advance and then wrapping up the actual shooting in one or two takes.

Lumet was eulogized as "the last great movie moralist," and by fellow New Yorker Woody Allen, who observed, "Knowing Sidney, he will have more energy dead than most live people."

Reena Community Residence an unprecedented model of inclusivity

New facility to open its doors on Lebovic Campus in spring, 2012

By Daniel Horowitz

The Reena Community Residence, the largest and most significant project undertaken by Reena in its history, is proof positive that the world has changed for the better, with people with disabilities included in mainstream society like never before.

Expected to open its doors in the spring of 2012, the Reena Community Residence, located on Vaughan's Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus, will take inclusion to a whole new, unprecedented level.

"Together, Reena and UJA Federation have built strong committees to oversee every aspect of the building and programs which will take place in the Reena Community Residence," says Sandy Keshen, President & CEO of Reena. "The residence will be an 80,000 sq. ft. building that provides housing and support for up to 84 people. Individuals from Circle of Care, Jewish Family & Child, as well as Reena will include the frail elderly, those with mental health and/or developmental disabilities, young adults, women and children fleeing abuse and families with a member requiring support."

Reena and the Reena Foundation have undertaken fundraising for the project, $9 million of which will be allocated for capital, and $9 million for an endowment fund for the future needs of the Reena Community Residence.

An architectural rendering of the Reena Community Residence, located on Vaughan's Joseph & Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus.

"This new residence is an enormous step forward in acceptance of people with disabilities in our community," says Leon Kieselstein, Chair of the Reena Foundation. "It is so heart-warming to see the positive community response to our campaign, and we appreciate where we are to date, but more needs to be done."

To date, Reena has also received grants and commitments of $9.6 million from all four levels of government, as well as almost $5 million towards the Reena Foundation Building Campaign, thanks to the efforts of Tobie Bekhor and Irving Feldman, co-chairs of the Capital Fundraising Committee.

"We are proud and excited to welcome the Reena Community Residence onto the Lebovic Campus," says Ted Sokolsky, President & CEO, UJA Federation. "The residence will allow easy access to a myriad of recreational, cultural and educational programs."

The Reena Community Residence will also be open to the broader community on campus. The Max & Ruth Leroy Holocaust Remembrance Garden, the Neshama Garden, the Greenhouse and the main floor multi-purpose area will welcome youth groups, environmental clubs and others for programs after school hours and on weekends.

For more information, call Reena at 905.889.6484.

Jewish students meet Israeli Apartheid Week head-on

By Leigh Brown

Jewish students across the country are relieved as this year's Israel Apartheid Week (IAW) faded away with IAW events poorly attended and IAW promoters receiving little attention for their cause.

"This year's Israel Apartheid Week showed very clearly that extremism and hatefulness are not effective methods of engaging with a wider student community," said Emile Scheffel, a 4th year student at Ottawa's Carleton University.

But the whimpering presence of IAW can be attributed, in good measure, to a coordinated multi-pronged, multi-dimensional, year-round counter-campaign, organized and implemented by CIJA (Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy) and Hillel of Greater Toronto.

While IAW organizers focused their energy on promoting their anti-Israel agenda, students across the country came together to portray the real face of Israel, through engaging local programs and the support of national initiatives, such as Size Doesn't Matter (SDM) and Truth in Context.

The SDM campaign, launched in February, 2010, is a multifaceted program that uses social media, campus giveaways, videos and an interactive blog to spotlight Israel beyond the conflict. This year alone Size Doesn't Matter distributed over 60,000 promotional items on campuses across the country and hosted several events.

Participants enjoy Hillel of Greater Toronto's Layla Lavan (White Night) event.

Each day SDM posts articles and videos on topics such as the newest Israeli hotspots, advancements in Israeli technology and celebrity visits to Israel.

"SDM has a huge following among the campus demographic and is currently the most popular Jewish student advocacy initiative in North America, with over 6,000 'likes' on Facebook," says Jay Solomon, CIJA's Manager of Campus Advocacy

Truth in Context, by contrast, is a campaign that directly challenges the most prominent distortions propagated by IAW organizers and their supporters. Throughout the year "truth cards" were distributed on campus, drawing students to an interactive website where they could distinguish fact from propaganda on Middle East issues.

Hillel of Greater Toronto successfully spotlighted different dimensions of Israel through Layla Lavan (White Night) - an all-night celebration of Israeli creativity, art and fashion, attended by 500 people.

"Layla Lavan gave students from a variety of religious and ethnic backgrounds an opportunity to see Israel in a completely different light," said Eyal Melamed, a 3rd year student at York University. "We got to hear about Israeli products, crafts and travel opportunities. It was a fabulous event, completely focused on the beauty that is Israel."

Israel, antisemitism key issues in Thornhill

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Environment Minister Peter Kent could face a tough fight in Thornhill from high-profile candidate Karen Mock as the Liberals try to retake a riding that Kent won in 2008 but had been a Liberal stronghold since its creation 11 years earlier.

The Jewish population makes up an estimated 37 per cent of the district's 131,000 residents, making the suburban riding only one of two in the country – the other being Mount Royal in Montreal – with a Jewish plurality.

Kent, a former TV newscaster, beat sitting Liberal MP Susan Kadis by more than 5,000 votes in 2008, a result that many observers interpreted as an endorsement by local Jewish voters of the Conservative government's strong pro-Israel stance.

In addition to Kent and Mock, Green candidate Norbert Koehl and NDP candidate Simon Strelchik are also hoping to represent the riding, which is bounded by Highway 400 in the west, Rutherford Road and Highway 7 in the north, Steeles Avenue in the south and Highway 404 in the east.

Mock – who said she was approached by members of the riding association and the party to become the Liberal standard-bearer after Kadis decided not to run again – stressed that she has devoted her life's work to the Jewish community.

A former president of Canadian Friends of Haifa University and a former national director of the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada, Mock criticized the boycott divestment and sanctions (BDS) campaign against Israel, saying it's based on propaganda.

"We all just have to work harder to… support Israel and help people understand that they really are being duped," she said.

Mock said events such as Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW) on Canadian campuses lead to "antisemitic activity."

"We have to work harder with all the security forces on all campuses to ensure that it is a safe place to be" for Jewish and pro-Israel students, but, she added, "I'm not one of those who would advocate a ban."

Kent called the BDS campaign "hateful."

"It is essentially a campaign against the legitimacy of the State of Israel and the legitimacy of the Jewish People to defend that state," he said.

IAW, he added, is "intellectually dishonest," and "a very selective, hateful isolation of Israel without recognition of the fact that Israel is the only full democracy in the Middle East."

Koehl, general manager of Stonemill Bakehouse Ltd., an organic bakery, said that the BDS movement and events such as IAW are "not necessarily the best way to approach this type of an issue.

"I think a lot of people are adversely affected by such a campaign, and I think there are probably better approaches to the situation. It's a very complex issue, and I think it perhaps oversimplifies the issue and leads to a lot of hardships for everyday people," Koehl said.

Regarding the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, Mock said she supports a two-state solution and "will always stand up for the right of Israel to defend itself, and we will work very hard to make sure that the infrastructure is in place for a secure and lasting peace."

Mock said Canada "previously enjoyed a worldwide reputation as a facilitator and mediator, a credible diplomatic leader… Sadly, that has been lost over the last few years."

But Kent said he was troubled by wording in Liberal campaign literature that says there should be a "principled compromise to the search for a solution in the Middle East."

"To me that sounds ominously similar to the sort of flawed moral equivalence [between Israel and] those countries that would destroy Israel," he said.

"We've invested mightily in the Palestinian Authority on the justice side – to create an effective national police force to bolster the justice system and to help write a new criminal code which would allow the PA to administer an eventual independent state peacefully coexisting with Israel," Kent said.

"Canada has always supported a negotiated two-state solution. We have engaged with both sides."

Koehl said that the Green position on the Israeli-Palestinian issue "is that we should have increased dialogue. We're suggesting to appoint a neutral third party that does not have a vested interest with either side and just get the whole peace negotiation process started again and have some real progress… By getting all sides to the table again, I think it would be a good first step."

Mock, a teacher and educational psychologist specializing in multicultural and anti-racist education, said the increase of hate crimes against Jews in York Region is an issue that needs to be addressed "forcefully."

According to a York Regional Police report released last month, hate crimes targeting the Jewish community in York Region more than doubled in 2010 over 2009.

Mock said that she "would like to see the social science and humanities research grants that used to be given out… to do better research on hate crime and antisemitism… reinstated."

Kent, a member of the Inter-Parliamentary Coalition for Combating Antisemitism, said that "Canadians realize that [antisemitism] is a corrupting influence on Canadian society and it needs to be resisted and prosecuted at every opportunity.

"The police are now better educated in terms of identifying and knowing how to prosecute them than at any time in the past."

Koehl said the community needs to be more aware of the issue.

"By creating more awareness in the community, people will be more willing to step forward and speak up and get the police involved to punish the people that are doing this," he said. "We need to dedicate more resources from the police to investigate these situations and really get to the root cause."

When it comes to Thornhill's seniors, Mock said they're "not better off now than they were five years ago," but she's encouraged by the Liberal platform concerning family and seniors.

"It's about ensuring that there not be an increase in taxes… but that money should go toward families that are helping seniors, pension reform… bringing up the income levels of our most vulnerable."

Kent said Thornhill is a "community of many communities" and the aging population must be supported like any other.

The Conservative platform promises eligible seniors additional annual benefits, and it puts $10 million towards volunteer and mentorship programs, and eliminates mandatory retirement for federally regulated employees.

Koehl said he supports employment insurance benefits being granted to people who have to take time off to care for aging parents. "It will allow the aging family members to stay in their homes and increase their quality of life."

NDP candidate Strelchik did not return The CJN's request for an interview.

Israeli-Canadians talk Election 2011

Yosef Tastassa
Special to The CJN

Comment

For some Israelis who are eligible to vote in Canada, the coming federal election will be their first voting experience outside of Israel.

More than 50,000 Israelis have immigrated to Canada since Israel was established, most of them to the Greater Toronto Area. The majority arrived during the 1980s, but another immigration wave began in 2000, when the second Palestinian intifadah broke out.

Most of the Israelis are proud of having the right to vote in their new homeland, and for them it's a basic privilege of citizenship that they're about to fulfil.

Some feel strange about the fact that they're about to vote for a Canadian candidate. They used to vote in Israel as Israeli citizens, and their considerations were mainly a party's approach toward the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, the Israeli economy, and the relationship between secular and observant Jews.

The CJN interviewed a number of Israeli-Canadians for this story, all of whom wished to remain anonymous.

They expressed hesitancy about allowing their names to be published for two main reasons: a belief that one's political opinion is a private matter and that their comments might unduly influence other Israeli-Canadian voters, as well as the concern that they might mistakenly be perceived as more loyal to their homeland nation than to their adopted country.

The following is a summary of their thoughts on the May 2 election.

All the Israeli-Canadians interviewed said unanimously that their primary concern is a candidate's approach toward the State of Israel and toward the local Israeli and Jewish communities. A candidate, they said, who stands beside Israel in the global arena and expresses understanding of the needs of the local Israeli and Jewish communities will probably get an Israeli-Canadian's vote.

Israeli-Canadians are also very concerned about the global campaign to delegitimize Israel. They think they should vote for a party that supports the cause of a secure Israel, living with pride and peace among its neighbours.

Some of the Israeli-Canadians interviewed have lived in Canada for more than 40 years. Yet their identity is somewhat split, and they see themselves as both Israeli and Canadian. By voting for a candidate that supports Israel, the Israelis believe they're fulfilling their duty to Israel and the Jewish People.

When asked about other voting considerations aside from Israel and the local Jewish community, their key issues include a strong economy, improving the health care system and education, among others.

The Israelis are a community of immigrants. Most of them have to start their professional lives over from the beginning, which is why the economic issue is a top priority. A candidate who can improve the labour market, business opportunities and pull the country out of the recession is someone they will consider seriously. To Israelis in Canada, Jewish education is very important, and to some it's a top priority. Private Jewish education is expensive, and they hope for more government support in this regard.

Asked which parliamentary system they prefer, Canadian or Israeli, all interviewees commented on how, to them, the political system in Israel is very unstable and that the Israeli prime minister has to deal more with the survival of his ruling coalition than with implementing his policies and moving the country forward. In that regard, they find the Canadian system better.

The ballot boxes are carted out in Jerusalem for the 2003 general elections. Some of the Israelis who voted in that election may now be voting in the upcoming federal election here. [Israel Sun file photo]

Volpe hopes to fend off Tory challenger

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

MP Joe Volpe, the Liberal who has held the riding of Eglinton-Lawrence since 1988, thinks his constituents are ready for a new prime minister.

"I'm always cautious, but I think that my constituents are looking to get rid of [Prime Minister Stephen] Harper, and they see me as a way to get that done," said Volpe, a former cabinet minister who is running once again against Conservative candidate Joe Oliver, as well as first-time Green Party candidate Paul Baker. As of The CJN's deadline, the NDP candidate, Justin Chatwin, had not returned calls for comment.

Eglinton-Lawrence is bordered in the north by Highway 401, in the south by Eglinton Avenue West, in the east by Yonge Street, and in the west by the CN line. According to the 2006 census, the riding's population is about 110,000, and 39 per cent of the residents are immigrants. About 17 per cent are Jewish and 11 per cent Italian.

The average family income is $162,855, third-highest in Canada, and the unemployment rate is 5.6 per cent.

The riding has been held by the Liberals since its creation in 1979, although Volpe only defeated Oliver by slightly more than 2,000 votes in 2008, after besting a different Tory candidate by 12,000 votes in 2006.

An educator who was brought up in Toronto, Volpe said that his party's position on Israel is that it has a right to exist within borders that are internationally recognized and defended.

"Israel's values are our values, and those values are Judeo-Christian. We have the same basis in culture, religion and politics. We don't always agree, but we have the same democratic values. Israel is our window on the dynamics in the [Middle East]. Antisemitism has insidious ways of eating away at that friendship."

He noted that Liberal leader Michael Ignatieff spoke on the issue of antisemitism at the second annual conference of the Inter-parliamentary Coalition for Combating Antisemitism (ICCA), held last year in Ottawa.

As well, he said, at the conference of the Inter-parliamentary Committee for Combating Antisemitism (ICCA), held in London, England, in February 2009, the Liberal party sent the largest group of all parliamentarians.

"As a movement, antisemitism needs to be fought vigorously," he said.

Volpe said he's happy that Bill C-442, An Act to Establish a National Holocaust Monument, was enacted into law just before the government fell. "It took entirely too long for something that had unanimous consent from the House. Such a monument is not only important to Holocaust survivors. It is important to everyone. It is of national significance."

Oliver, an investment banker, said he has gotten a positive response from constituents. "More and more people are volunteering for the campaign, and people are welcoming us at the door."

He said that Israel is an important issue in the riding, and "Canada has consistently voted against attempts to criticize Israel in international organizations. The prime minister stands out as a beacon in his support and in his stand against one-sided criticism."

Harper's government is very concerned about hate crimes, Oliver added, "and Canadians can count on them to defend human rights and oppose antisemitism, because that is the right thing to do."

He said the government is also conscious of the dangers of communities at risk, and, in that vein, through Public Safety Canada, has pledged an additional $1.6 million annually for security upgrades at nonprofit institutions such as community centres and places of worship.

Baker, the Green candidate, said he's found constituents frustrated that there is another federal election. "They understand why, but the appetite just isn't there."

His party's position on Israel is that it has a right to exist within recognized borders and that it should enjoy peace and security similar to the peace and security felt by Canada and the United States, said Baker.

All Canadians deserve to be protected against hate crimes, he said. "No one is on the wrong side of the fence. No one should be elevated, and everyone should be protected."

He said he'd like to see the government spend more on teaching youth that hate crimes are not acceptable. "Hate is a learned thing. There is no reason for such behaviour in a forward looking society such as ours."

He is also happy about the passing of Bill C-442. "People should never forget or lose sight of the Holocaust, and again that takes us back to education. We cannot ignore such events. It is worrisome that one group could be blamed for society's problems."

Advance polling dates

Monday, May 2, is voting day for the federal election.

For those unable to get to a polling centre on that day, Elections Canada has set up three advance voting days for Canadians: Friday, April 22; Saturday, April 23; and Monday, April 25.

As a result, observant Jews wishing to exercise the advance voting option will have only Friday, April 22, before sundown, to vote. Monday, April 25, is a yom tov. Advance polls will be open from noon to 8 p.m. local time. Elections Canada will publish the addresses of advance polling stations on April 18.

MP fights back against attack on her age

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Anita Neville, the sitting Liberal MP for Winnipeg South Centre, has started the defence of her seat with a counterattack against Conservative charges that she's "past her expiry date."

The statement, which some considered to be a slur against older people, was issued on the opening day of the campaign by Winnipeg MP Shelley Glover (Conservative-St. Boniface). Glover later rejected calls to apologize, saying she wasn't referring to the 68-year-old Neville's age but to her performance as an MP.

"It's typical of the Conservative party when they don't have anything real or substantive to say to resort to name-calling and personal attacks," said Neville, Western Canada's only Jewish MP and a strong supporter of Israel. "It's typical of the party and of Shelley."

Neville added that she's been hearing a lot of jokes about the remark on the campaign trail. "I was visiting a seniors group, and a 97-year-old woman asked me if I was past my expiry date," she said.

The governing Conservatives have been targeting Winnipeg South Centre for the past three elections without success, and the odds of Neville going down to defeat this time are slim.

In addition to her own constituency work, there are two factors working strongly in her favour. First, the riding has been solidly Liberal ever since it was created in 1987. Former foreign minister Lloyd Axworthy represented Winnipeg South Centre from 1987 until his retirement in 2000.

Neville, a longtime chair of Winnipeg School Division No. 1, was first elected to Parliament in the riding in 2000. She easily won re-election in 2004, 2006 and 2008. The closest contest was the last one, when she beat Tory candidate and popular former Winnipeg Blue Bomber Trevor Kennard by just over 2,000 votes.

Another factor that's likely to make Neville's re-election relatively easy is the disarray in Winnipeg South Centre's Conservative ranks.

The Tories had nominated Raymond Hall, a former airline pilot, to carry the party colours a couple of years ago. But he quit the race on the eve of the election. His last-minute replacement is Joyce Bateman, who had been a Liberal until just recently and who, like Neville, has served as a Winnipeg school trustee.

The riding has 59,444 voting-age residents, with pockets of significant Jewish population.

There's one other Jewish candidate running in Winnipeg: Alon Weinberg is carrying the Green Party banner in Kildonan St.Paul, a riding that incorporates the West Kildonan and Garden City neighbourhoods, which still have a Jewish population of a couple of thousand.

The northwest Winnipeg riding was created in 2004 and has been won handily by Conservative Joy Smith in the past three elections.

Smith is a member of the Canada-Israel Parliamentary Group, and also belongs to the Ukrainian-Canadian Parliamentary Group, and she recently lent her voice to the campaign by the Ukrainian Canadian Civil Liberties Association opposing a stand-alone Holocaust gallery at the Canadian Museum for Human Rights, now under construction in Winnipeg.

Weinberg is the founder of the AdaMah'nitoba Project, a Jewish ecology group. He has a profile in the Jewish community as a peace activist and a strong interest in studying Jewish and other spiritual traditions.

Corporate funding will send Markham councillor to Israel

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Markham councillor Howard Shore will indeed take part in an upcoming civic business trip to Israel, but corporate sponsors will pick up the tab after the municipality refused to pay.

The Town of Markham is scheduled to send a delegation of councillors and business leaders to the Israel Life Science Industry Biomed conference in Tel Aviv from May 20 to 29.

Last month, Markham's town council voted to add Shore, councillor for Ward 2, to the trip, citing his familiarity with the country and his Jewish heritage.

However, Markham Mayor Frank Scarpitti later persuaded council to overturn its decision to add Shore, citing the need to be fiscally responsible by keeping trip expenses to a minimum.

Howard Shore

Shore told The CJN last week that he's looking forward to the trip and that the businesses taking part in it will cover his travel expenses.

Council had originally approved the trip with a $29,000 budget cap to allow Scarpitti, Counc. Carolina Moretti, who chairs Markham's economic development committee, and the town's manager of special projects in economic development to travel to Israel.

Paying for Shore would have added $6,000 to the municipality's costs.

Vancouver Jewish Men's Choir in full voice

Lauren Kramer
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — When Ivan Lindi arrived in Vancouver, the South African native found himself missing the Johannesburg Jewish Male Choir. Rather than indulge in prolonged nostalgia, he partnered with Cantor Yaacov Orzech and the two began the Vancouver Jewish Men's Choir in 1999.

"Just before we started the choir, I was asked to sing at the wedding of a friend's daughter," Lindi recalls. "I managed to get eight guys together, we sang the old South African Jewish wedding service and they absolutely loved it. So when we had the idea for the choir, I approached those same guys and they came on board. Within a couple of weeks we had 26 members!"

Weekly rehearsals followed, and over the years that followed, the Vancouver Jewish Men's Choir has performed at numerous annual charitable concerts. Today its music director is Cantor Stan Shear, a chazzan for the past 25 years and a trained musician with a licentiate in music.

Shear leads a group of 15 men through songs in Hebrew, Yiddish, Ladino and Russian, all based on Jewish themes. The choir is currently rehearsing for a concert at Vancouver's Temple Shalom in June, and is looking for new members to increase its numbers to 25.

"I think our singers get a lot out of being in the choir," Shear says. "It's a means of self-expression and they enjoy the weekly evening rehearsals. The concerts give them an outlet as well, because you have to perform to get pleasure out of what you do."

Syd Goldberg, a Winnipegger who came to Vancouver eight years ago, says his participation in the choir since 2004 has helped foster friendships and introduced him to a talented team of singers.

"There's an excellent camaraderie in the choir," he says. Two recent highlights for the choir were the opportunity to sing primary backup for Cantor Sol Zim last year at the River Rock Show Theatre, and performing with the Italian and Chinese folk choirs at the Michael J Fox Theatre in Burnaby, BC.

"Like any group, people come and go," Goldberg says. "We're open to men who can sing tenor, bass, baritone or alto, and we're trying to let people know we're out there – a volunteer choir group that rehearses Monday evenings and has a good time."

Shoah Week to honour Righteous Gentiles

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Winnipeg's Jewish community has planned several programs for Shoah Week, from May 1 to 6, with an emphasis on remembering people with a Winnipeg connection who risked their lives to save Jews during the war.

The week's remembrance programs begin with the annual Holocaust memorial service at Congregation Etz Chayim in Winnipeg's North End.

For years, the well-attended service was held at the Bnay Abraham Synagogue, where Rabbi Peretz Weizman, the congregation's spiritual leader and a Holocaust survivor, had created a memorial to the Shoah. With the merger of the Bnay Abraham with two other north Winnipeg congregations in 1992, the memorial and the service were moved to the new congregation – Etz Chayim – which resulted from the merger. (Rabbi Weizman has since moved to Toronto.)

On Sunday, May 1, a more recent tradition continues with the reading at the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue of the Megillat Hashoah, a 90-minute service centred around a new megillah whose goal is to create a sacred ritual that will memorialize the Holocaust long after living witnesses are no longer among us.

Megillat Hashoah was Toronto Holocaust survivor Alex Eisen's idea. He persuaded the Rabbinical Assembly to produce it in partnership with the Schechter Institute in Jerusalem. Eisen campaigned to raise the money for the new megillah, which was published in 2003. It was first read in Winnipeg in 2008.

The scroll, divided into six chapters, tells the story of the Holocaust – through a series of first-person accounts – from the Nazis' arrival, the ghetto experience, life in a concentration camp, the death camps and finally the rebirth of the survivors in Israel and the West.

On Monday, May 2, B'nai Brith is organizing its annual reading of names of Holocaust victims with families in Winnipeg. That is followed by the annual public Holocaust commemoration in front of the Holocaust memorial on the grounds of the Manitoba Legislature. In the evening, Yiddish singer Jane Enkin and the North End Jewish Folk Choir will perform music from the ghettos.

On Tuesday, May 3, a seniors Holocaust program takes place, and on Wednesday, May 4, there will be a program organized by Machon Madrichim, a young leadership group based out of the Gray Academy.

The new program for Shoah Week, Survivors and Heroes, is scheduled for Thursday, May 5. "We are excited about this new program," says Shelley Faintuch, Shoah Week's co-ordinator. "We are going to have survivors telling us about how they were saved. We are also going to be honouring three Righteous Gentiles with connections to Winnipeg."

Anje van Tongeren

Anje van Tongeren risked her life to help the Jewish people in her native Holland escape the Holocaust by forging documents for them. She was eventually captured and sent to a Nazi prison camp. She survived and made her life in Winnipeg after the war.

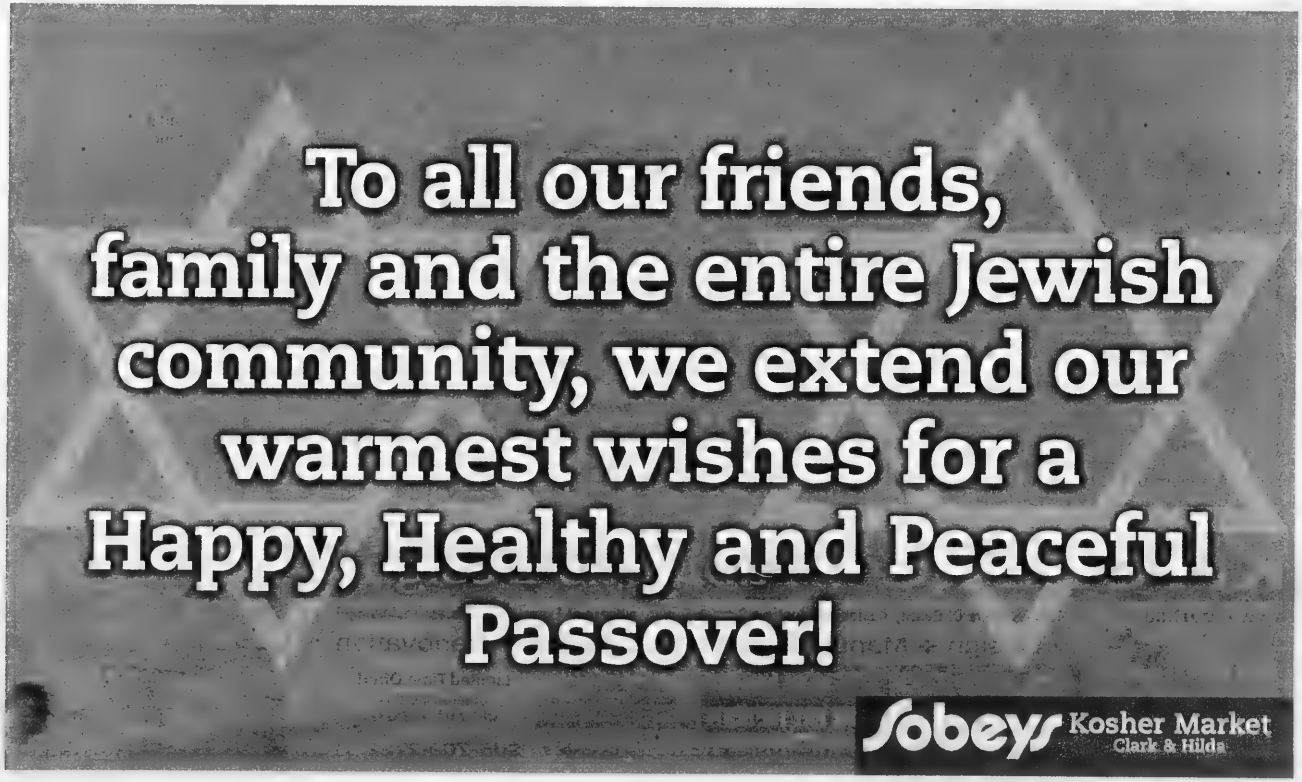
Katy Simons was born in Holland, the daughter of a Jewish father and a Mennonite mother. During World War II, she and other family members risked their lives to save Jews. The Germans imprisoned Simons, and after six weeks, her mother managed to barter her release by giving a Nazi officer a handcrafted doll.

Simons later trained in England to become a nurse and came to Manitoba in 1961 to work at the Ninette tuberculosis sanitorium. In 2002, Simons was recognized as Righteous Among the Nations by the Israeli government for her war efforts on behalf of Jewish people. She died in 2005 at the age of 94.

Blessed Father Emilian Kowcz was a Greek Catholic Parish priest in Peremyslany in Ukraine. An opponent of both the Communists and the Nazis, he worked to save many Jews in his town before he was imprisoned in Maidanek, where he died. His connection to Winnipeg is his grandson, Father Taras Kowch, who is a priest in a community outside of Winnipeg.

The Survivors and Heroes program is being co-sponsored by the Holocaust Education Centre and the Holocaust Awareness Committee.

For more information about Shoah Week, e-mail Shelley Faintuch at sfaintuch@jewishwinnipeg.org or call 204-477-7400.



Winnipeg CJA campaign sets fundraising record

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — With the final results now tallied, the 2010-2011 Winnipeg Combined Jewish Appeal campaign has set a new fundraising record.

"We raised $5.4 million (compared to $5.3 million in each of the two preceding campaigns)," said CJA executive director Elaine Goldstine.

"And we did it despite the loss of $260,000 from a number of donors who either passed away or moved out of town. We had a lot of donors increase their contributions. We had a 21 per cent increase in donations from the 25-to-45 age group. And our women's philanthropy campaign raised $1.275 million, a 32 per cent increase from last year," she said.

"We are very please that the allocations committee will be able to distribute over $100,000 more to our agency partners."

As has been the pattern for the past few years, 30 per cent of the CJA total has been earmarked for Israel-based projects.

Winnipeg remains the only community in North America that continues to have a two-line card, whereby donors can indicate how much of their gifts they want to allocate to local needs and how much to Israel.

Goldstine said the 2011-2012 campaign is scheduled to kick off on Sept. 11.

"We are still in the process of discussing our plans and goals," she said.

However, last year, CJA organizers decided to establish a long-term goal of $6.5 million for the 2012-2013 campaign – rather than setting a new goal each year – by encouraging donors to increase their gifts by a minimum 25 per cent a year.

Donors are also being encouraged to contribute to support the community's year-old Securing Our Future campaign by endowing gifts to the CJA through the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba.

Howard and Hope Morry, the co-chairs of last year's campaign, are continuing on in their roles for 2011-2012. Both are longtime community leaders. Howard also chaired the campaign 11 years ago, while Hope co-chaired the CJA Women's Division campaign with Tova Vickar nine years ago.

Also returning for a third year in a row is Marcia Cosman as Women's Division chair. Cosman is a third-generation community leader. She's been a CJA canvasser for more than 25 years and joined the CJA's management team four years ago.

Shul library going strong after 50 years

Diane Koven
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The Malca Pass Library was recognized for its excellence as it celebrated its golden anniversary here last week.

Established by Agudath Israel Synagogue 50 years ago, the library is named in memory of the late Malca Pass, who was a tireless volunteer with the synagogue's sisterhood.

At a reception at the synagogue on April 5, Estelle Gunner, organizer of the anniversary event, announced that the library had received notice this week of the renewal of its advanced accreditation by the American Association of Jewish Libraries in recognition of its excellent collection and its professional operation, a rare honour for synagogue libraries.

Judy Pass Kronick

"This award is a tribute to past librarians," Gunner said, as she listed those who had served: Leah Schnitzer, Esther Kaiman, Ruth Poplove, Frieda Luaterman, Donna Guttman and current librarian, Jack Schecter.

A display of memorabilia from the library's half-century contained photographs of past librarians, programs from various events, lists of books that have been reviewed at the library's book club and copies of articles of interest. Over 100 people attended the celebration to reminisce about the early days of the library and its growth and success over the years.

Judy Pass Kronick, daughter of the late Malca Pass, spoke on behalf of her family. "Richard, Harriet and I must commend you on your diligence in keeping the library in our mother's name for 50 years," she said.

Over the years, the library has been supported by the synagogue, endowment funds and donations. In its early years, the Hillel Academy of Ottawa day school was housed in the synagogue, and the Malca Pass Library served its students as well as adults. When the library moved to a new, larger space in 1986, the children's collection was donated to Ottawa Hebrew schools and to the Greenberg Families Library at the Soloway Jewish Community Centre.

The Malca Pass Book Discussion Group, an offshoot of the library, was established in 1989. It hosts six or seven reviews each year, attracting book lovers from the general community as well as synagogue members and featuring well-known authors and media personalities as reviewers.

From time to time, the library hosts larger, special literary events as well, some of which include lectures by Eleanor Wachtel, host of CBC's Writers and Company; professors Andrea Most and Adele Reinhartz; and members of the Pass family, Harriet Pass Freidenreich and David Freidenreich. The book The Elegance of the Hedgehog by Muriel Barbery, was reviewed by veteran CBC reviewer Alvina Ruprecht following the anniversary celebration.

Supermarket restores Stars of David

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Stars of David are back up over the Passover food section at the Metro supermarket in Westmount after numerous people expressed disappointment at their removal.

Last week, the chain's head office admitted it made a mistake in directing the store's franchisee to remove the stars – three blue ornaments hanging from the ceiling – after one anonymous complaint.

On April 3, a person visiting the store objected to such religious symbols being on public view, took photographs and then went to the French-language media, some of whom ran the story the following day.

The longtime manager, Graham Fletcher, refused to accede to the unidentified man's complaint, but he did take down the stars April 4 after the order from his superiors.

Marie-Claude Bacon, director of corporate affairs for Metro, told The CJN that the head office takes full responsibility for the hasty decision to remove the stars and that it now regrets it.

However, she characterized it as having been a temporary measure and that it was recognized early on to have been wrong.

"We were not as familiar as Mr. Fletcher with how important that symbol is at this time of year for the Jewish community. We just wanted to have time to look into this and see what was the appropriate thing to do."

After at least a dozen phone calls from Jewish people, she said, the chain realized it had erred. "Some were angry, some were just voicing their opinion. It was very informative for us."

Within 12 hours of the three stars being taken down, one of the stars was put back up over the Passover display, Bacon said, which also includes blue and white balloons. When complaints continued to be received that things should be restored to the way they were, Metro agreed to let all three stars shine once again.

In previous years, the Sherbrooke Street store has decorated the Passover section with one smaller star, and there were never any complaints, Bacon said, adding that Metro doesn't know the name or contact information of the man who complained this year.

"We never, never, never meant to offend anybody. We have an important Jewish clientele that we want to serve... The star is appropriate. We don't think it is offensive to anybody. We should have listened to Mr. Fletcher," she said.

Fletcher, a 43-year veteran of the grocery industry, also apologized, saying he regrets not having stood up more firmly against the order from head office.

A trip to New York

Students from Congregational High School – a supplementary Jewish studies program for teens, based at Adath Israel Congregation and Beth Tzedec Congregation – visited New York on March break. Cantor Eliezer Kirshblum, principal, top right, and Linda Schwartz, administrator, accompanied the teens on the four-day trip. The program is subsidized by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, and the Canadian Council of Conservative Synagogues (CCCS).

Postcard suggests Jews as pigs, critics say

Rhonda Spivak
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Ukrainian Canadian Civil Liberties Association (UCCLA) has sent out a postcard to supporters that appears to depict Jewish backers of a prominent Holocaust gallery in the Canadian Museum for Human Rights as pigs.

The card was mailed out over the last several months, going back as early as this past December.

The picture on the front is taken from the 1947 Ukrainian edition of George Orwell's novel Animal Farm. It depicts a fat pig with a bullwhip overseeing an emaciated horse dragging a wagon.

In Orwell's story, the pigs represent the Stalinist Communist ruling class who enslave and dominate the other farm animals, but claim hypocritically that "all animals are equal." The back of the postcard features a pig who whispers into the ear of a sheep in a conspiratorial manner, "All galleries are equal but some galleries are more equal than others."

The UCCLA sent the postcard out as part of its campaign against the proposed content of the new federal museum, which is now under construction in Winnipeg and will include an exhibit dedicated to the Holocaust.

The UCCLA has been lobbying to have the Holodomor – Josef Stalin's mass murder by starvation of Ukrainians farmers who refused to go along with collectivization efforts in the 1930s – get equal billing with the Shoah. The Holodomor will have a permanent display in the "Mass Atrocity" zone, immediately adjacent to the Holocaust zone.

The museum has said that it decided to single out the Holocaust for a number of reasons, including the fact it was the catalyst that prompted the world to forge a legal framework for the development of international human rights law, specifically the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the United Nations Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide.

The UCCLA has demanded that the Holocaust not get what it calls "favoured treatment," and it has publicly called for "all 12 of the 12 museum galleries to be inclusive, comparative and thematic."

By contrast, the Ukrainian Canadian Congress has not called for all genocides to be treated equally, but it, too, wants the Holodomor to be given a prominent and permanent gallery in the museum.

Catherine Chatterley, founding director of the Canadian Institute for the Study of Anti-Semitism in Winnipeg, wrote an article in the April 2 Winnipeg Free Press chastising the UCCLA for sending out the "hateful postcard," which was distributed "without shame or conscience," she said.

"Clearly [in the postcard], the pigs are supporters of the Holocaust gallery, which is characterized as a vehicle of domination, inequality and exploitation. The image of the Jew as a pig has a very long and well-established history in European antisemitism, and, of course it is also a theme in Islamic antisemitism (Jews are purported to be the descendants of apes and pigs)."

Per Rudling, a scholar of eastern European history who has specialized in antisemitism in Ukraine and currently teaches at the University of Greifswald in Germany, said that "the argument of Jewish Communists is a staple in Ukrainian nationalist rhetoric and has led to protests from non-nationalist scholars."

Anita Neville, Liberal MP for Winnipeg South Centre, said she received three or four of the postcards, which she called "deplorable." She added that she has had a "couple of calls" from Ukrainian constituents who said "this group does not represent us."

In an e-mail exchange, Lubomyr Luciuk, the UCCLA's director of research and a professor of political geography at the Royal Military College of Canada, did not comment on how many postcards were sent out by the group, nor did he comment on whether he felt the postcard contained antisemitic imagery.

Instead, he wrote that Chatterley's Free Press article "misrepresents the positions taken by the Ukrainian Canadian Civil Liberties Association, as any honest reading of our media releases (and postcards) will confirm... Where did UCCLA ever say that Jews (or anyone else for that matter) are 'descended from pigs?' Answer: nowhere."

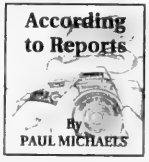
Israel's critics persist, despite Goldstone reversal

In an article written for the Jewish Daily Forward (April 4) about Judge Richard Goldstone's recanting the central and most damaging charge in the Goldstone report about the Gaza war – that Israel intentionally targeted civilians – Harvard Law professor Alan Dershowitz made the following observation: "Goldstone's reassessment… pulls the rug out from under those who are currently using the Goldstone report as a centrepiece of their efforts to accuse Israel of war crimes, to delegitimize the Jewish state in the court of public opinion, to impose boycotts and to suggest a moral equivalence between the democratic nation of Israel and the terrorist-group-cum-'government' of Hamas."

Unfortunately, Goldstone's retraction has not pulled the rug out from under those determined to see Israel branded as guilty of "war crimes" in Gaza. Foremost among this crowd is Ken Roth, head of Human Rights Watch, one of the major NGOs whose "findings" the authors of the Goldstone report relied upon.

In an April 4 Jerusalem Post opinion piece, Roth argued that his organization never alleged that the Israel Defence Forces had a policy of deliberately targeting civilians. Rather, he said that only the accretion of individual acts of Israeli soldiers and commanders involving civilian deaths, injuries and extensive property damage in Gaza leads to the conclusion that "the allegations of serious laws-of-war violations remain and have yet to see the credible domestic investigations that they require."

Roth was thus dismissive of something Goldstone in his Washington Post piece commended Israel for doing – investigating allegations that individual soldiers may have made mistakes or even been negligent. "In fact," Roth argues, "Israel's investigations look good only by comparison with Hamas, which has done nothing to investigate its war crimes."



Having initially said that Israel didn't have a policy of targeting Palestinian civilians, he then went on, in effect, to reiterate this charge: "Most important, Israel has failed to investigate adequately the policy-level decisions that apparently resulted in wide-scale attacks in Gaza. Those decisions are obviously the most sensitive, because they involve senior officials."

Some would say that the distinction between a "policy" and a "policy-level decision" is one without difference, especially given Roth's tenacious insistence that the IDF still stands accused of war crimes. Senior Israeli officials may yet face prosecution at the International Criminal Court if Roth and his cohorts have their way.

Does Roth apply the same harsh judgment and allege possible war crimes by U.S. and NATO forces in Afghanistan, where, over many years, large numbers of civilians have been killed and maimed in bombing operations aimed at the Taliban? Apparently not. These are invariably chalked up to "mistakes." The charge of "disproportionate" force, let alone "war crimes" is evidently not part of HRW's lexicon in these cases.

Such slanderous rush-to-judgement seems reserved for the IDF, which must struggle to counter thousands of missiles that are stored and launched into Israel from among Palestinian civilian centres.

Dershowitz appropriately reminded us of Col. Richard Kemp, former commander of British forces in Afghanistan, who said in testimony that the Goldstone commission rejected: "I don't think there has ever been a time in the history of warfare when any army has made more efforts to reduce civilian casualties and deaths of innocent people than the IDF is doing today in Gaza."

The time has come to examine how respected organizations such as HRW are holding Israel not only to a double standard, but to a uniquely unjust set of standards.

Richard Goldstone

On a positive note, in "To save a single life, they're willing to travel into the heart of chaos" (Toronto Star, April 5), Catherine Porter spoke with Dr. Ofer Merin, head of the IDF's 50-member field hospital located in the tsunami-damaged region of Japan. Referring also to Israel's field hospital in earthquake-damaged Haiti, Porter placed Israel's medical relief efforts in the broader context of the Jewish concept of tikkun olam – the commitment to repair the world. Porter's moving story reminds us that, when it comes to the coverage of Israel, not all news is bad news.

Sutton Group Admiral's record growth continues unabated

Murray Goldkind
Broker of Record

Using a simple formula of maximizing opportunity and minimizing hassle for its agents, Sutton Group Admiral Realty has experienced the kind of spectacular growth that has surpassed even its own high expectations. The "R" word isn't in their vocabulary.

The record-breaking sales achieved by its ever-growing team, which now numbers over 220 agents, has allowed Sutton Group Admiral to not only consolidate its niche atop the residential resale market, but also to enter the highly competitive field of new home construction sales.

Broker of Record Murray Goldkind prides himself on his ability to read and respond to the needs of home buyers and sellers. Says Murray: "Today's home buyers are looking for one thing: VALUE. The agents and brokers who give them maximum value for their hard-earned dollars will earn their business. Those who don't, won't." And implicit in this value, he notes, is the quality of service provided by the broker or agent. "If you have to do more than say, 'I'll take the red one,' we're not doing our job."

In its dual capacity as reseller and new home purveyor, Sutton Group Admiral's access to both resale homes and new construction allows it to offer home buyers the best of both worlds, says Sol. "Whether you're looking for a resale home or a new one, you can now explore ALL your interests and options with us."

One thing that hasn't changed, says Sol Goldkind, is Sutton Group Admiral's commitment to work "24 hours a day to earn your trust and ensure your satisfaction."

Students work for peace in Kenya

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Hillel of Greater Toronto has partnered with a peace project in Kenya to provide students with a unique volunteer opportunity that will continue once they return home.

Jaime Reich, Hillel of Greater Toronto's tzedek initiatives co-ordinator, said that most volunteer trips organized by Hillel are in conjunction with NGOs that lead students on a project, such as building a school.

But the participants who choose to travel to Kenya in July to work under the umbrella of Youth Ambassadors for Peace (YAP) will be taking the lead in creating peacebuilding initiatives and workshops for the youth in local villages.

"The students are going to get to know the community and the villages and the youth they are working with, and they'll see what the specific needs are and what the challenges are," Reich said.

"What's unique about this program is that it gives these students almost complete freedom to create these workshops."

YAP, founded by Adam Hummel, Hillel at York's former president, is an independent project meant to spread the message of peace while empowering youth and establishing leadership opportunities.

Hummel, a 25-year-old law student at the University of Windsor, said his relationship with Kenya began shortly after the December 2007 Kenyan general elections, which led to civil war and the murder of about 1,300 people. The violence spread along tribal lines, particularly, the Kalenjin, Kisii and Luo tribes.

During a three-week volunteer trip in 2008 to a village in Kenya called Kiptere, Hummel learned that the root causes leading to that violence were tribalism, which is akin to racism, and idleness in the farming communities, where there are no programs in place to occupy the youth.

Adam Hummel, founder of Youth Ambassadors for Peace, helped bring peacebuilding programs, including a soccer tournament, to a village in Kenya.

As his volunteer trip came to an end, he was approached by a community member who hinted for a donation.

"I didn't have any money to give, but I said, 'Why don't we start a project that we can get people in the village involved and take ownership over?' We decided to start a soccer tournament, and I told him that when I got home, I would send some money to run the tournament and he could get people in the community involved to actually plan it," Hummel said.

He said he managed to scrape together $300 for the event, which turned out to be a great success.

"When I saw how successful that was and how well-received it was in their community, I thought it would be a good opportunity to do some other projects there," he said.

Hummel wanted to put a foundation in place for a project that would create a shared understanding of history, values and culture between tribes, and help the idle youth turn away from negative influences such as drugs and violence.

In May 2009, Hummel returned to the region for a month and worked with a group of 25 Kenyan youths to create YAP.

Since then, they've developed an unofficial peace treaty that was endorsed by government officials; a drama club that was created to advocate for peace through the arts; a poultry project that involves raising chickens and donating the eggs to people who are newly diagnosed with HIV/AIDS; and a soccer tournament that brings teams from different tribes to compete together.

Hummel said the 2008 soccer tournament brought together the Kalenjin, Kisii and Luo tribes for the first time.

"It's been amazing. We had another soccer tournament on April 2... between the three tribes. They had 3,000 spectators come to watch the final game," Hummel said.

Until now, he has worked on YAP on his own, but partnering with Hillel has given him an opportunity to share his vision with others.

"I really want other people to have a hand in doing this. And the success is because of them [in Kenya], not because of me. It's because of the dedication and the commitment of the people on the ground there wanting to change the situation. I want other people to share in being able to make that happen."

Hummel said that the participants will be divided into groups of three or four and will be staying in different villages in Kenya.

"We want to reach out to other tribes and the ultimate goal is to make sure that the next elections, which are scheduled for December 2012, won't result in the same violence that the last one did."

The Hillel-subsidized trip costs $2,500 and the eligible students who attend universities in the Toronto area are expected to fundraise to reduce individual costs and contribute to the program. Reich said she is currently accepting applications.

Hillel has organized two volunteer trips to Israel taking place this summer, one to Bat Yam and the other to Safed. There is also an opportunity to participate in a 10-day volunteer mission to Latvia and Lithuania.

Standing up to anti-Israel rhetoric

Sam Vlessing

Guest Voice

Sam Vlessing

It is relatively common for representatives from different student bodies, including student governments, to enter tutorials and promote certain events.

But last month, when a student promoting Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW) came into my classroom at Dalhousie University to promote an anti-Israel event on campus, the blatant lies she told made my blood boil.

Some of the allegations she made included that Israel's security fence and segregation of the Palestinian people is comparable to South African apartheid and that "the murder of innocent Palestinians over the past 50 years by Israel is a genocide negated by the global community."

Being a graduate of the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), I was extremely prepared for this.

After listening closely to her blatant lies, I got up, walked to the front of the class, stood next to her and started talking. I went on the best rant I will never regret.

I took her argument and tore it apart piece by piece by stating globally accepted facts about Israel's history to the entire class.

The young woman promoting IAW could never have known that she would encounter me, an outspoken supporter of Israel.

I had just finished a case study about apartheid in South Africa and was more than ready to explain to her and my newly acquired audience why her claim was ignorant and outlandish.

When I explained why her statements were wrong and asked her if she knew what she was promoting, she had no reply. She was shocked.

Rather than stop me – they probably couldn't have if they tried – my entire class listened carefully and seemed to be intrigued.

After directing them to read Alan Dershowitz's book The Case for Israel or go online to research simple facts to gain a better understand of the issues, I ended with one my favourite quotes from Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu: "The truth is that if Israel were to put down its arms there would be no more Israel. If the Arabs were to put down their arms, there would be no more war."

Despite that I was perhaps the only Jewish student in the tutorial, everyone stood up and started clapping. The young woman, dejected, left the room.

Many students are not equipped to respond to such allegations. But I just went with my gut instinct and used the knowledge I had.

I acquired the information to refute her claims through years of reading articles and online sources, but mostly because of my CHAT education.

As part of the curriculum, there is a focus on the history of Israel and the Jewish people. In Grade 11, I went on a school trip to hear Dershowitz and other pro-Israel activists speak.

Last year, the Grade 12s took part in a series of workshops on how to deal with IAW.

At the time I didn't see the point, but I do now.

Sam Vlessing, 18, is a first-year Dalhousie University student majoring in political science. He is involved with both Hillel@Dal and Chabad@Dal.

Family Lawyer & Mediator
for 30 years

Question: I am divorced. We have one seven-year-old child. My ex-wife decided to move abroad. She insists our son not travel alone on the plane for our two access visits to Canada yearly, which greatly increases the flight costs. Is there anything I can do?

Answer: If you honestly feel the child is old enough to travel alone on the plane, then your lawyer should write her a letter explaining that court proceedings may be necessary if she fails to relent. If that doesn't work, then as your lawyer, I would go to court and ask a judge to order both parties to pay for a child psychologist or child social worker to assess whether the child is truly mature enough to handle such a trip.

Such a motion would likely be granted, so if your ex refused to agree, she might be obliged to pay for your legal costs.

If you are right about your son's maturity, then after a few interviews or psychological tests the expert will issue a written opinion to the court explaining there is no reason why the child, with proper preparation, cannot travel alone. A judge will usually agree with it.

Question: My ex-boyfriend's name appears on my son's birth certificate even though he is not the father. We are no longer together. What are his rights and how do I get him off the certificate?

Answer: I assume that the gentleman is not being co-operative. This means that he has bonded with the boy emotionally. If that is the case, it may not matter much that he is not the biological father of the child. So it's not so easy to dismiss a claim for access by a "psychological dad".

On the other hand, if the gentleman was simply doing you a favour at the time and really has no bond with the child, you can take the following steps, assuming he doesn't oppose. Get a court order for DNA through cheek swab tests, another court order to declare he is not the father and then have the birth certificate amended with the Registrar of Ontario.

On behalf of my family, and all of us at Garfin Zeidenberg, I wish you and your family a happy and healthy Passover.

Centenarian 'a big believer in workers rights'

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Rose Frydman at age 18

Rose Frydman, who turns 100 next month, credits her long life to her family and to hard work.

"Now, I'm trying my best to keep going," said Frydman from her home at the Apotex Centre.

Born in Poland, Frydman came to Canada with her uncle when she was "15 or 16" and immediately went to work in a pants factory.

"It was a real sweatshop. We made very little money, and the owner's wife kept complaining that they were going broke," she said.

She worked there for 10 years and then went on to a purse factory. "I was paid piece work, and my first week I made $19. I felt rich."

The matriarch of a five-generation family, Frydman, whose room is filled with family pictures, talks to her daughter, Pam Frydman-Roza, in Milwaukee by Skype regularly. "She makes me feel alive."

Frydman-Roza said her mother lived independently until she was 92. "She walked five miles a day, and she sang in a Yiddish choir."

Now, said Frydman-Roza, 57, her mother stays interested in what's going on.

"My daughter sends me e-mails of articles I might like to read, and I always have a book. Now I'm reading Joshua Then and Now [by Mordecai Richler]."

She reads The CJN and the Jewish Daily Forward. "I'm not happy when I read about what is happening in Israel. Why are they having so much trouble?"

She also likes reading the short stories of Isaac Bashevis Singer. "He is my favourite Yiddish author. I love his short stories," Frydman said. "He has children's books that are as good as his adult books."

Frydman-Roza said that her mother is a worrier, "about her family, and about about the rest of the world. She's a big believer in workers' rights, and once tried to start a union in her workplace. It just never happened.

"My daughter, Shira, works for a labour law firm in New York City, and my mother is very proud. She says that it is in [Shira's] blood."

She said that her mother even worries about the other Baycrest residents. "She wants to know that they're being taken care of properly, and that they have visitors. She wants them to be treated with dignity."

Frydman, who was born "two weeks after Passover on Thursday in 1911," said that the party her family is planning, "is not for me. It's for the rest of the family to get together and have a good time."

Pan pal shares sweet memories from Pesachs past

By Norene Gilletz
Special to The CJN

My readers love when my "pan pals" share their favourite food memories. I firmly believe that when someone recalls a favourite dish served at a seder or family dinner, they often remember who was sitting at the table beside them and what they were discussing, just as if it were yesterday. Food memories are extremely powerful, transporting us back in time to meals and meichels of times long gone.

People often tell me they feel intimidated at the idea of inviting me to be a guest at their dinner table. I reply, "It's not about what's on the table – it's about who is at the table that counts!"

Tolsa Greenberg and I often share recipes and stories about many of our favourite food memories that we experienced with family members – many of them no longer alive today – either sitting round the table or cooking together in the kitchen. It seems that food is the umbilical cord that connects us to our Jewish roots and Jewish foods, many of which are associated with that mysterious ingredient, Jewish guilt!

When I told Tolsa that I was writing an article about my "pan pals" and their food memories, she sent me a lovely, long e-mail, sharing some her favourite Passover food memories along with some treasured family recipes that I am privileged to share with you, my readers.

Tolsa wrote, "When you think of Passover, the first things your memory recalls as a child is the aroma of the cooking at your house – the chicken soup simmering, the fish cooling and the sponge cake baking in the oven.

"Rena, my late mother, always made me my own little sponge cakes in small tins that I still use today when I bake for my own grandchildren. I've saved my mother's Passover baking tins that I found in a box with all her Passover pans, gadgets and utensils. So when I started to bake sponge cake, of course it was from Rena's hand-written recipe. It was always yummy – but sometimes it seemed to be drier than hers after a day or two!

"One day, I was talking to my aunt, Pearl Caplan, and she told me to try my grandmother's recipe that she always used... and that's what I've been doing ever since! I savour this treasured cake recipe, as well as the visual memory of my mother baking in her kitchen. I also remember my grandmother coming to my house and baking in her street dress wearing an apron and a hat!

"My daughter Lesley would always reach for the Passover sponge cake to eat for breakfast, lunch or dinner... and maybe even between meals. But my girls also had their own Passover favourites.

"My grandma, Anne Greenberg, made wicked brownies and I was always trying to copy them because we always would run out of brownies and then we would have to wait until Grandma Anne would make more brownies for all her grandchildren. (I would always compare Grandma Anne's recipe with my old Manishewitz brownie recipe and Grandma Anne's recipe was always the winner!)

"And, in competition with the brownies, there were Grandma Rena's coconut macaroons that we always savoured for Passover. I would make them during chol hamoed for our house for the 'cookie/macaroon snatchers.' Nowadays, I concede and make them for other special holidays and birthdays, not just for chol hamoed.

"My mom's been gone 26 years now – I still can't believe it, but she's always in my heart and head."

MY GRANDMOTHER KATE SIMMON BROOKS' SPONGE CAKE

1 cup potato starch
2 heaping tbsp. cake meal juice of 1 orange zest of 1/2 an orange juice of 1/2 lemon (fresh is best)
2 tbsp. wine
9 egg yolks
1 1/2 cups sugar
9 egg whites
filling/topping: 1 tsp. ground cinnamon mixed with 1 cup finely chopped nuts, optional

Preheat oven to 350. Sift together potato starch and cake meal; set aside. In a small bowl, combine orange juice, orange zest, lemon juice and wine; set aside.

In the large bowl of an electric mixer on medium-high speed, beat egg yolks until light. Slowly add sugar and beat well. Add potato starch mixture alternately with juice mixture to egg/sugar mixture.

In another large bowl, using clean beaters, beat egg whites on high speed until stiff but not dry. Carefully fold beaten egg whites into yolk mixture.

Pour batter into an ungreased 10-inch tube pan. (Optional: Pour half of batter into pan, sprinkle with half of cinnamon-nut mixture. Top with remaining batter and sprinkle cinnamon-nut mixture on top.) Bake for 1 hour. Cake is done when no imprint remains when you touch it lightly with your fingertips. Yield: 12 to 15 servings.

GRANDMA ANN GREENBERG'S PASSOVER BROWNIES

1/2 cup oil
1 cup sugar
4 eggs, separated
1/2 cup cake meal
6 tbsp. cocoa
pinch of salt

Preheat oven to 350. Grease an 8-in. square pan. Cream the oil and sugar together in an electric mixer until light. Add yolks to mixer and beat together until blended.

Add cake meal, cocoa and salt and mix until combined. In a clean bowl, beat egg whites on medium-high speed until stiff but not dry. Carefully fold whites into batter, just until whites barely disappear.

Pour carefully into prepared baking pan and spread evenly. Bake for 30 minutes, or until edges of brownies pull away from sides of pan. When cool, cut into squares. Yield: 16 brownies.

GRANDMA RENA APPLEBY'S COCONUT MACAROONS

3 egg whites
1 cup sugar
1 package (about 1-1/2 cups) shredded coconut
1 tbsp. lemon juice
2 tbsp. potato starch

Preheat oven to 300. Grease a large cookie sheet or jelly roll pan, or line it with parchment paper. Combine egg whites and sugar in a Pyrex bowl or large measuring cup and place bowl in a pot of boiling water.

Beat at high speed with a hand mixer for exactly 5 minutes (or so my mother told me)! It will become almost like marshmallow.

Add potato starch, lemon juice and coconut to whites and mix together with 2 forks. Drop from a fork onto prepared pan and bake for 20 minutes.

Turn off the oven and open the oven door partway. Leave the macaroons in oven for 10 minutes. Yield: about 2-1/2 dozen.

Gefilte fish – a brief 'history'

Sybil Kaplan
Special to The CJN

Gefilte fish is a staple of Passover. Ground freshwater fish is mixed with matzah meal, eggs, chopped onions and spices. Gefilte, the Yiddish word for stuffed, explains its origin. The ingredients were originally not made into balls but stuffed back into the skin of the fish, which was sewed up and baked. This dish goes back to the Middle Ages and Germany.

Around the 17th century, or possibly earlier, the dish travelled to different countries and Jews made their own additions and changes.

In the mid-19th century, Jews of Poland made it with carp and sweetened it. Not only did they associate a sweet gefilte fish with the joy and sweetness of a religious celebration, but sugar was attractive, it was a source of energy and it provided a contrast to their daily diet which contained sour foods like pickles, pickled vegetables, herring, sauerkraut and sour cream. Chassidic Jews also made their gefilte fish sweet.

The Jews of Lithuania also made their gefilte fish with carp, but they spiced it with pepper and served it with horseradish.

In Ukraine, Jews also made gefilte fish with carp.

In the 16th or 17th century, housewives stopped stuffing the fish into fish skin and began to make it into balls and then cook them that way.

The size of the balls also varied. For example, German Jews made it the size of golf balls.

Fried gefilte fish became a popular dish among the Jews of England, but it appears to have remained there and was not a taste acquired by other Jews.

The possible explanations for why gefilte fish became so popular among different Jewish communities also vary. According to the Mishnah, eating a fish with bones was defined as work, so the fish balls may have been used because there would be no work in eating it prepared this way.

The Hafetz Hayim, a 19th-20th century scholar, author and leader of Polish Orthodox Jewry, taught that one should eat fish at all three Sabbath meals, so some follow this precept by serving gefilte fish.

Passover memories from Lebanon

Yosef Tastassa
Special to The CJN

For the Lebanese Jewish community, Passover was a significant religious and cultural event. In order to meet the high standards of Passover in Lebanon, people started preparing immediately after Purim.

Clairette Hallak was born in Beirut in 1945. Like most Lebanese Jews, Hallak lived with her family in Wadi Abu-Jamil, the Jewish quarter in the heart of Beirut.

"The modern knowledge of the common person about Lebanon is of a country that suffers from a continuing civil war, violence and, of course, hatred to Israel. This is why I, my husband and our two little daughters left Lebanon in 1971. We have lived in Israel ever since," Hallak said.

"Before the civil war in Lebanon broke out, our life was convenient and we were a part of a multicultural society – over 20 synagogues served a community of 12,000 people. Those days are gone now, and as far as I know, only a few dozen Jews live in Lebanon, and most of them are old," she added.

Hallak grew up in a kosher home, and, as a child, she attended a day school where kosher food was also provided.

"Don't take the kosher issue for granted," she said. "Lebanon is an Arab state, the Jewish community was relatively small and no kosher food was available on the shelves. We had to make most of our food on our own. When Passover was at our doors, making Passover kosher food was a real challenge."

Hallak described a situation in which the word Passover meant, first of all, full renovations of property and person.

"The interior walls of our house were painted, we replaced all bed sheets with new ones and even renewed the feather-based material in the duvets. No child would dare show his face in public before wearing new white clothes, new shoes, and even having a haircut," Hallak said.

For a small Jewish community in the heart of the Arab world, keeping the tradition was a challenge. Hallak described a past in which neither kosher wine nor kosher matzah was available in the regular food stores, and you had to either import these products from Europe or make them yourself.

"Months before Passover, my mother bought red grapes in order to make wine at home. It took nearly nine months for wine to be ready. It was made under the rabbi's instructions and supervision, and we were happy to have a kosher wine for Passover.

"The same was [true for] the Jewish bakeries. Those that were not shut down for Passover went through a Passover koshering process and manufactured matzah for the Jewish community, all under rabbi's supervision. I remember the matzot were big and round. We used to cover the matzot with sheets until Passover evening," she said.

Most of the kitchenware was made of copper or clay and got "Passover approval" after being cleaned and steamed.

Passover evening is an unforgettable memory for Hallak. Unlike in Israel, where regular lettuce is used for the maror (bitter herb), they used real bitter leaves that twisted the young participants' faces when they ate it.

Hallak's grandfather used to read the Haggadah in Hebrew and then translate the words into Arabic. Living in the Diaspora, they celebrated the seder twice, once at her parents' house and once at her in-laws' house.

As is the case in many Jewish homes around the world, the afikoman was a matzah hidden by an adult, and the finder was rewarded with money.

"Another Passover game I remember was children playing with hazel nuts, [but] I don't know why we played with those," Hallak said.

Above all, Passover night was a culinary celebration. Using a variety of herbs and making recipes of all kinds is something Hallak still does today.

"The appetizers are various salads. They are made of coloured vegetables, potatoes, eggs, beetroot and celery. In the main dishes, you can find the hamud – a vegetable soup flavoured with parsley, garlic, lemon and mint. Rice balls (kube) are added to the hamud.

"There were also what we called 'Garbage meat balls' [using] a mixture of ground beef and lots of beet leaves," Hallak said.

Clairette Hallak

Her favourite dish is lamb with artichokes and mushrooms. The main dishes are served with rice-stuffed grape leaves, rice-stuffed onions and rice-stuffed peppers.

The tasty Lebanese charoset is made of dates, raisins, nuts, sweet red wine and cinnamon.

"We still make the traditional citrus jam, almonds, stuffed dates and, of course, chocolates, pralines and marzipan," she said. "It may not be the healthiest thing on Earth, but at least everyone is happy," Hallak concludes.

Food ideas with a twist

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

Cooking maven Bonnie Stern's philosophy on matzah ball perfection may be helpful for people worrying about the success of their Passover seders: "Sometimes my matzah balls are hard and sometimes they're fluffy. After years of making matzah balls, whichever way they turn out, I eat them."

In other words, relax and don't try to achieve culinary pefection at Passover.

Stern was speaking to some 40 women who braved a major snowstorm to attend Kolel Cooks with Bonnie Stern, at the prossermanjcc culinary arts studio.

Stern, National Post food columnist and author of 12 best-selling cookbooks, co-hosted an evening of Passover cooking demonstrations with Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, director of Kolel, the adult centre for liberal Jewish learning.

There was plenty of wisdom to be gleaned from both Stern and Rabbi Goldstein. The rabbi spoke about all the foods that are now available for Passover. "You can get almost anything – spaghetti, matzah bagels... it all depends on how much you want this week to be different.

"The less processed [the food], the closer it is to the spirit of the holiday."

She stressed that all fresh fruit and vegetables are kosher for Passover, adding that cumin was newly permitted this year.

She also noted that all Israeli wines could be used at Passover and that more than one kind could be drunk at the seder. "You have to fill up the cup each time and finish that one. Don't put new wine over the old wine... And have a designated driver."

Stern recalled that romaine lettuce and Belgian endive were both considered bitter when she was a child. "We've changed our tastes."

She offered lots of cooking advice. For instance, for people who find they can't get rid of the fishy smell of homemade gefilte fish, she recommended cutting way back on the cooking time. "You only have to cook it 15 to 20 minutes, not three hours."

Choosing fresh fish is also paramount. "Fish does not get better with age."

The rules for making light matzah balls "defy logic," Stern quipped. "Some people use sparkling water, some people leave them in the fridge for two hours. Some people separate the eggs, some use no oil, while others use more oil.

"Everybody has a secret on how to make their matzah balls light. But [these secrets] never work consistently."

Her final word on the art of matzah balls: "Whatever way your mother did it, do it the same way."

ISRAELI ORANGE VEGETABLE SOUP WITH ZHOUG

3 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
3 cloves garlic, finely chopped
1 onion, diced
4 cups cubed buttercup squash
2 large sweet potatoes
2 lb. carrots, sliced
1 tbsp. fresh thyme
1 1/2 tsp. salt or to taste
8 cups vegetable stock or water

Zhoug:
2 cloves garlic, peeled
1 jalapeno, cut up (less if it is very hot)
1 tsp. kosher salt
1 bunch fresh cilantro
1/2 cup extra virgin olive oil

Heat olive oil in a large pot or Dutch oven. Add garlic and onion and cook gently for a few minutes until fragrant and tender. Do not brown. Add squash, sweet potatoes, carrots, thyme and salt. Cook a few minutes. Add liquid. Bring to a boil. Reduce heat and simmer 20 to 30 minutes until very tender. Puree soup in a food processor, blender, food mill or with an immersion blender. Return to pot and season to taste.

Meanwhile, make zhoug by chopping garlic and jalapeno in a food processor. Add salt and cilantro. Chop until fine. Drizzle in olive oil. Season to taste. Serve soup in wide soup bowls drizzled with zhoug. Makes 10 to 12 servings.

Charoset – not just apples and nuts

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

Many Ashkenazi Jews may not realize that their culinary customs are not universal to all Jews. Sephardi Jews have different dietary laws at Passover – unlike Ashkenazim, they are permitted to eat rice and beans.

At a recent Passover cooking demonstration with cookbook author Bonnie Stern and Kolel director Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, the rabbi pointed out that in some countries, romaine lettuce was used as a bitter herb, rather than horseradish, because the horseradish crop was not available. She also noted that ingredients and recipes for charoset were different as well.

Charoset, one of the ritual foods eaten at the seder, symbolizes the mortar that the Israelite slaves used to make bricks when they were building the Egyptian pyramids. Ashkenazi Jews tend to use apples and nuts, but there are many variations. Rabbi Goldstein has been collecting international charoset recipes, and provided The CJN with most of the recipes that follow.

Dahlia Organ, one of the participants at the Kolel cooking demonstration, told the group that Iraqi Jews eat charoset made with a date honey called silan. It's actually a syrup made by boiling dates, but a ready-made kosher for Passover version is available at some stores, including Sobeys and Hartman's in Toronto, she noted.

Organ, who grew up in Israel, said the silan charoset was eaten throughout Passover. "My mother had in it the fridge all week. It's delicious on matzah."

To make the charoset, the silan is mixed with freshly ground walnuts. "It's best to shell your own walnuts so you can get the freshest tasting walnuts," Organ advised.

For the seder, the Iraqi tradition is to serve the date honey charoset with romaine lettuce, the vegetable traditionally used as the bitter herb, she said.

While Organ grew up with the Iraqi silan charoset, she also makes an apple-based charoset. "My husband is Ashkenazi, so I serve both kinds of charoset at our seders."

IRAQI CHAROSET

1/2 cup silan
1/4 cup freshly ground walnuts

Combine the silan with the walnuts.

YEMENITE CHAROSET

From Joan Nathan

1/2 cup almonds, slivered
1/2 cup dried apricots
8 dried figs quartered
2 tsp. ground coriander
2 tsp. lime rind, finely grated
1 tbsp. honey
3 to 4 tbsp. sweet white wine
2 tbsp. sesame seeds, toasted

Process almonds and apricots in a food processor. Transfer to a small bowl. Process figs to a fine consistency. Stir into almond apricot mixture. Add coriander, lime, honey and enough wine to bind ingredients. Refrigerate for 1 hour. Roll into balls, 1-inch in diameter. Roll the balls in sesame seeds and place each in a paper cup or small muffin liners, or shape into small pyramids and press seeds into sides.

GREEK CHAROSET

From The Cookbook of the Jews of Greece (Jason Aronson Inc., 1996) by Nicholas Stavroulakis.

1 1/4 cups dates finely chopped
3/4 cup black currants, finely chopped
3/4 cup raisins, finely chopped
1/2 cup almonds, finely chopped
3 tbsp. honey
sweet wine to taste

Put chopped fruit in a large bowl and cover with water. Soak overnight. The next day simmer the fruit in the same water until it is soft. Remove from heat and strain, saving the liquid. Put the fruit in a large bowl and mash it with a fork against the sides of the bowl. Add small amounts of the reserved liquid or add sweet red wine to moisten fruit. Mix in honey and add nuts. Stir well and chill. This can be made a week ahead. Makes 6 to 8 cups.

Cookbooks help spice up the holiday

By Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

The time of year is upon us when we anticipate the Passover seder, plan for those who will be sitting at our table and feel queasy at the thought of matzah overload.

The anxious among us worry about what we'll eat once the seders are behind us. How will we keep a family satiated from dawn to dusk? We page through recipe books, look through old menus and remember the feeling of hunger that gnaws at our insides on Passover.

Every year I make a mental note to plan Passover meals ahead of time and invest in a better selection of recipe books to help me through the process. Four new ones landed on my desk recently, and Susie Fishbein's Passover By Design (Artscroll) quickly made it to first place. Like the other books in her Kosher By Design series, this one contains tantalizing pictures of many of her dishes.

From the pictures of her seder table and her ingenuity and attention to detail (Passover bento boxes, anyone?), I found myself wishing I could be a guest in her home this Passover. Since that's not likely to happen, Passover By Design presents recipes that look so good we couldn't resist trying them long before the festival approached.

Each recipe is neatly laid out with its serving count and a brief background as to why it appears in her book. Of her ratatouille chicken stew, she explains: "Many people do not eat roasted meats at the seder. Stews work well and can be the perfect answer when looking for an all-in-one main dish."

For beef alone, she features 19 different recipes. Other major proteins, as well as soups, desserts and side dishes, get the same attention, with different cooking styles – some easy, some more complex – and enough variation to keep your meals interesting.

By the time you've looked through the first 100-odd pages, Fishbein feels like an old friend and her recipes jump off the page, demanding to be tried. You rush to don an apron, check the pantry for ingredients and suddenly feel inspired and excited about Passover.

The New York Times Passover Cookbook, edited by Linda Amster (William Morrow), promises 200+ recipes from top chefs and writers. Lamb, chicken, tzimmes and charoset are among the foods with their own individual chapters, many of them prefaced with short essays on their significance to Jews worldwide or to a particular family. This cookbook also contains a few memoirs about Passover that add interest and depth.

One writer, Mimi Sheraton, recalls of her childhood seders: "I can still feel the excitement in the room as my aging grandmother and grandfather, trembling with combined laughter and tears, embraced their children whom fate had moved so far away."

These glimpses of seder rituals in other families touch on foibles and snobbery, warmth and love and the wonderful Passover rituals that bind us inexorably together.

Many recipes in this compilation are drawn from other recipe books but are attributed to their various sources. There's "Cecile Ratner's Russian cabbage soup" and the "Angel family's salmon in rhubarb and tomato sauce." There are famous names like Charlie Trotter's lamb shanks braised in red wine, and newer entities like the Margareten family's apple kugel.

Most of the recipes feel as though they come from someone's kitchen, and there's enough variety in the book to satisfy beginner cooks and those who are more advanced.

A Taste of Nostalgia: tales & recipes to nourish body and soul (Artscroll) begins with an assertion that it is definitely not just another Passover cookbook. "It's a storybook with some great recipes [and] the spices of stories from the vast treasury of our Jewish heritage," writes its author, Rabbi Abraham Twerski.

There certainly are a few recipes, drawn from the private stash of Judi Dick, who collaborated with Rabbi Twerski on the writing and recipes. Of vegetable kugel, she writes, "This one is a winner. My cousin Eudice Nathan gave me the recipe. She got it from her cousin Ruth Kipust."

But this is the kind of book you take to bed to read at the end of the day or for a quiet hour on Shabbat.

There's a chapter on each of the Jewish holidays, with pictures drawn from historic Jewish archives. The images alone make this book a page-turner – fruit peddlers in Kazimierz, Poland, men burning chametz in a small European village in 1925, herring sales in Otvosk, Poland, in 1927. There's a sense of connectedness between these pages, a feeling of the extent to which tradition is our bedrock, even in changing times.

Rabbi Twerski writes in a conversational tone throughout, and his essays draw from his personal experience. He describes how slavery pervades our modern-day context: "There are countless ways in which people are enslaved. A person who cannot control his anger, greed or lust is very much a slave to them. A compulsive gambler is a slave. A person who does not want to get cancer or heart disease, yet cannot stop smoking, is a slave. An obese person who cannot stop overeating is a slave. That is why we must repeatedly be reminded of the Exodus. We are constantly subject to becoming enslaved."

Finally, the Complete Passover Cookbook by Frances R. AvRutick (Jonathan David Publishers), first published in 1981, has a full preface on Passover ingredients and how to keep kosher for Passover. This is your more traditional recipe book, with a "back-to-business" approach that's instructional but not very colourful.

It contains a ton of potentially useful Passover recipes, but you need to do some serious reading to find the ones that will work for you. No glossy images jump off the 419 pages, just a heavy tome filled with recipe after recipe. This author's no-nonsense approach is certainly useful. But you don't find yourself longing for an invite to her Passover table as you do when you read Fishbein's fun, contemporary approach to food and celebration.

Itamar murders still under investigation 30 days later

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

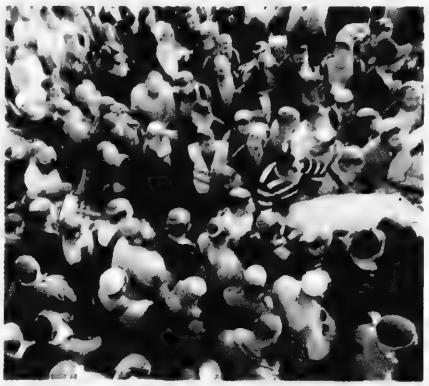
JERUSALEM — Israeli security forces believe there will soon be a breakthrough in the investigation into the murders in Itamar, where five family members were stabbed to death in their home.

On Sunday, Israel Defence Forces soldiers arrested more Palestinian suspects in Samaria in the West Bank, after dozens had already been taken in for questioning regarding the murders.

Last month, terrorists entered the West Bank settlement of Itamar and murdered Ehud and Ruth Fogel, as well as three of their young children, including their three-month-old baby, before fleeing the scene.

Since the murders a month ago, the IDF and the Shin Bet have arrested dozens of residents of the village of Awarta, which is near Itamar. Several suspects were released following a brief investigation, and others are still being investigated.

Residents of Itamar on Sunday marked 30 days since the murder of the Fogel family. They laid the cornerstone of a new building intended for Torah study, named after the head of the family, Ehud Fogel. At the same time, IDF soldiers from special army units were operating in Awarta.



Hundreds of people attended the funeral of the five members of the Fogel family murdered last month in Itamar. [Israel Sun photo]

In related news, one-third of Palestinians surveyed said they supported the attack on the Fogel family, according to a team of Israeli and Palestinian pollsters.

Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas condemned the attack, calling it despicable, immoral and inhuman.

Many Palestinian commentators have denounced the Fogel family murder as well, but not without noting that Israel and the settlers share some of the blame.

In Palestinian Authority newspapers and on the social network pages of private citizens, denunciations of the murder could be found alongside condemnations of Israel's approval of the construction of 400 new homes in the settlement blocs. Many writers compared the murders to the actions of the settlers themselves.

According to the poll released late last month, 63 per cent opposed the attack and 32 per cent backed it.

Pollsters from the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and the Palestinian Center for Policy and Survey Research surveyed 1,270 Palestinians in the West Bank, Gaza Strip and Jerusalem. The margin of error was three percentage points.

Goldstone refuses to retract report

JTA

NEW YORK — Richard Goldstone said he will not seek to quash his report to the United Nations on Israel's conduct during the war in Gaza, despite his retraction of a key finding.

Reports that he told Israeli Interior Minister Eli Yishai that he would seek to quash the report prepared at the behest of the UN Human Rights Council are false, Goldstone told Associated Press. The report presented to the council in September 2009 accused Israel of war crimes and possible crimes against humanity.

Goldstone, a former South African judge, wrote in a recent opinion piece in the Washington Post that Israel did not intentionally target civilians as a policy during the Gaza war, withdrawing a critical allegation in his report.

"We know a lot more today about what happened in the Gaza war of 2008-09 than we did when I chaired the fact-finding mission appointed by the UN Human Rights Council that produced what has come to be known as the Goldstone report," Goldstone wrote. "If I had known then what I know now, the Goldstone report would have been a different document."

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and a host of Israeli officials and organizations have called on the United Nations to cancel the Goldstone report following the publication of the piece .

Goldstone, who is Jewish, said he accepted an invitation from Yishai to visit Israel and tour its southern communities, which have been besieged by Hamas rockets. Yishai said he called Goldstone to thank him for his reassessment and to invite him to visit the country. Goldstone will visit Israel in July as a guest of Yishai.

In related developments, a group of American Jewish lawyers is set to file a civil lawsuit against Goldstone initiated by Israeli lawmaker Danny Danon.

The class action suit is set to be filed next week in U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York in Manhattan by attorney Steve Goldberg, according to a statement issued last Wednesday from Danon's office.

Danon met with the attorneys during a recent visit to the United States, the statement said. It gave no further information on Goldberg or the other attorneys involved in the suit.

People in Gaza celebrated the Goldstone report when it was released some 18 months ago.

The lawsuit will demand that Goldstone publicly apologize to the State of Israel and pay a symbolic amount of damages for the charges he made in the UN Fact-Finding Mission on the Gaza Conflict report.

"The Goldstone report is nothing less than a modern version of the infamous blood libels against the Jewish people," Danon said. "The distorted image that Judge Goldstone spread about Israel and the Israel Defence Forces has caused immeasurable damage to our citizens, and it will continue to do so for many years to come. I call on Goldstone to publicly apologize for his erroneous report with the hope that perhaps this will begin to repair some of the immense damage that has been inflicted on the international standing of the State of Israel."

The Jerusalem Post reported that Danon said he plans to file a similar lawsuit in Israel that would go into effect if Goldstone visits the Jewish state, as he plans to do in July.

Israel Briefs

Ceasefire reported

A Palestinian official close to UN- and Egyptian-mediated talks told Reuters on Sunday that Israel and militant groups in Gaza had agreed to a truce, as cross-border violence abated. The latest upsurge in fighting began last week when members of Hamas, which rules Gaza, fired an anti-tank rocket at an Israeli school bus, critically wounding a teenager. Israel's retaliatory air strikes have killed 19 Palestinians, while Palestinians have continued firing rockets from Gaza into Israel. However, no Israeli air strikes were reported on Sunday. Israeli police and military officials said some 10 missiles had been fired from Gaza, a significant fall from the 130 of the previous two days.

Free Bieber tickets

Some 700 children from southern Israeli centres that have been hit by rockets and missiles from Gaza were given free tickets to Canadian pop star Justin Bieber's concert. The tickets for the April 14 show in Tel Aviv, as well as transportation, are a gift of the Schusterman Foundation-Israel, the Morningstar Foundation and ROI Community of Young Jewish Innovators. The tickets were provided at a discount to help the Israeli children. Bieber arrived Monday in Israel and reportedly was to visit Christian sites in the Galilee, as well as the Dead Sea, Masada, Acre and Caesaria, as well as meet Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

Lieberman to be charged?

Israel's attorney general was reportedly set to announce that he will file an indictment against the country's foreign minister, Avigdor Lieberman, on graft charges. The draft indictment on charges of fraud, money laundering and breach of trust was to be announced Monday or Tuesday, Ha'aretz reported. Lieberman can request a hearing to try to prevent the indictment, but if he rejects a hearing in order to avoid exposing his defence strategy, the indictment will be served. He has said that if he is indicted, he will resign as foreign minister.

Missiles intercepted

Israel's Iron Dome missile defence system for the first time intercepted rockets fired from Gaza. Ashkelon's Iron Dome intercepted two rockets fired April 7 on the southern Israeli city. The unit had been set up three days earlier. One Iron Dome unit is also set up in Haifa. Another will soon be put up in central Israel.

Journalists harassed

The severe harassment of Palestinian journalists by Palestinian Authority and Hamas forces in the West Bank and Gaza has had a chilling effect on freedom of expression, a new report by Human Rights Watch says. The 35-page report documents cases in which Palestinian security forces tortured, beat and arbitrarily detained journalists in the West Bank and Gaza, in addition to confiscating their equipment and preventing them from leaving Palestinian areas. "Palestinian security forces are becoming notorious for assaulting and intimidating journalists who are just trying to do their jobs," said Joe Stork, deputy Middle East director of Human Rights Watch.

Winery wins big prize

For the first time, the grand prize at Italy's leading international wine competition has been awarded to an Israeli winery. The Golan Heights Winery, founded in 1983 in Katzrin, beat out 3,720 wines from more than 1,000 producers in 30 countries to take home the so-called "Wine World Cup" – the Gran Vinitaly Special Award granted ahead of Italy's annual Vinitaly wine trade fair in Verona, one of Europe's top wine events, which opened April 7. It was the first time the grand prize went to an Israeli winemaker, although the Golan Heights Winery had already won Grand Gold Medals at Vinitaly in 2004 and 2006. The 105-member jury included international wine experts and journalists.

Germany increases allocations to survivors

JTA

BERLIN — The German government will increase funds given to Holocaust survivors by 15 per cent.

The new deal reached last week between Germany and the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany, known as the Claims Conference, means that the German government's contribution to homecare funding for Holocaust survivors around the world will rise from $156 million in 2011 to about $180 million in 2012. The allocations will rise to nearly $200 million by 2014.

"With restitution-related sources of funding on the decline, this long-term agreement obtained by the Claims Conference is vital to addressing the growing social welfare needs of aging Holocaust survivors," said Claims Conference chair Julius Berman.

"It will provide survivors and the agencies that care for them the certainty that funding will be available to meet the anticipated growing demand over the next few years."

The Claims Conference will allocate money to agencies around the world that provide in-home nursing and vital help with basic activities of daily living such as eating, dressing and bathing that greatly ease the lives of elderly Holocaust victims, and enable them to remain living in their own homes.

"Once again, the German government has recognized its historic responsibility to help care for Jewish Holocaust victims in their final years," said Stuart Eizenstat, the Claims Conference's special negotiator.

"Over the decades, the government has demonstrated its commitment to alleviating the plight of elderly victims who need the care that these funds will provide."

Since 2004, the Claims Conference has negotiated with the German government for homecare funding, obtaining increased amounts each year.

The conference also negotiated an increase in pension payments to survivors. While previously a minimum of 18 months incarceration in a Nazi-era ghetto was the criteria for receiving payments, the German government will now review cases on an individual basis to determine if those who spent less time in the ghetto are also eligible for funding based on hardship and persecution.

Yad Vashem puts Eichmann trial on YouTube

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Yad Vashem, the Holocaust Martyrs' and Heroes' Remembrance Authority, has opened two new YouTube channels showing the video documentation of Adolf Eichmann's trial, to mark its 50th anniversary, one of them with a simultaneous English-language translation.

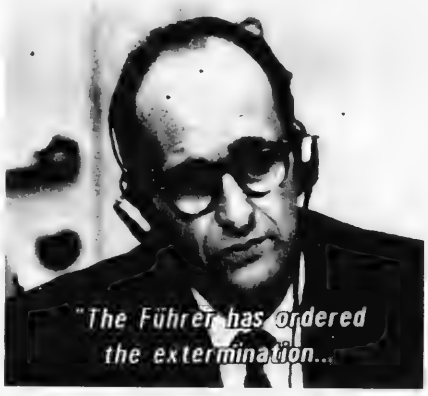
In addition to the English and Hebrew videos, information about and descriptions of the trial and meetings were put on the Internet in both languages. The channels are a co-operative effort between Yad Vashem, Israeli government archives and Google.

Fifty years after the landmark trial of Nazi criminal Adolf Eichmann began, Israel on Monday marked the event that ushered in a new era of openness toward the Holocaust and its survivors with an exhibition that highlights the man and his murderous legacy.

Known as the architect of the Holocaust for his role in co-ordinating the Nazi genocide policy, Eichmann fled Germany after the war, was captured in Argentina by Israel's Mossad and hanged after his 1961 trial in Jerusalem.

The gripping public testimony of more than 100 Jews who survived extreme torture and deprivation captured world attention and vividly brought to life the horrors of the Nazis' final solution to rid Europe of its Jews.

The hearings also marked a watershed moment for the young State of Israel, where Holocaust survivors were often disparaged as weak victims in a nation that saw itself as heroic.



The trial brought out stories of Jewish bravery and resistance that shattered the myth of Jews meekly walking to their deaths. As a result, more survivors went public with their lingering pain, greatly helping those involved in research and commemoration efforts.

Canadian JNF representatives tour Mount Carmel

Jenny Hazan
CJN Israel Bureau

Delegates who attended this year's recent JNF World Leadership Conference toured the Mount Carmel forest to see the damage from the December fire and met with the country's top forestry experts.

"[JNF] is working with a team of scientists and foresters to determine the best way to help rebuild the forest," said Josh Cooper, executive director of JNF Toronto. "We want to get more Canadians thinking about the future protection of Israel's forests."

The organization's immediate priority is the purchase of more equipment, including fire trucks and hoses, that was sorely lacking in December. "We need to make sure we're ready for the next one," said Cooper.

The Keren Kameyeth L'Yisrael-Jewish National Fund's conference in Israel, from March 27 to April 1, attracted leaders from 32 countries. The conference, the organization's sixth, marked its 110th anniversary. Among the delegates were a dozen Canadian representatives, from Winnipeg, Ottawa, Toronto and Montreal.

Montrealer Joe Rabinovich, executive vice-president of JNF Canada, said JNF has had offices in Canada for more than 60 years, and that Canada is the third-largest JNF fundraiser on a per capita basis, after Switzerland and Australia. "We are quite proud of what we do," he said.

The jam-packed five-day event took delegates across Israel to visit past JNF projects and learn about new ones.

The organization is continuing its construction projects in the Negev and Arava. Delegates visited Halutza, an organic farming community developed by the JNF for families that left the Gaza Strip during the disengagement of 2005.

Cooper was moved by his visit to Halutza. "It was the most tremendous thing we saw. We are literally building a city – with water, electricity, roads, schools, a synagogue – in the sand, on land that has been uninhabited since the beginning of time," he said.

Many people think JNF is just about planting trees, he said. "Though we're very proud of our... tree-planting roots, JNF is one of the only organizations that existed before the establishment of the state. There is now such a range of things that JNF is involved in. We are literally building the country. Every aspect of what it takes to build and maintain the country."

Cooper was not the only Canadian delegate moved by Halutza. "They have turned the desert green," said Jerry Werger, former president and current chairman of the JNF board in Toronto. "We like what we see happening there."

Mel Lazareck, president of JNF Prairie region, agreed. "They are doing fantastic work in the Negev. They are almost single-handedly responsible for developing the Negev. It is green because of JNF."

The organization is also involved in boosting the country's image, including dealing with anti-Israel and anti-JNF propaganda.

For Lazareck, who in addition to his role with the JNF serves as Manitoba's special representative to Israel for economic and community relations, this issue is of utmost importance.

"Perception of Israel is rated among the lowest in the world, and JNF is trying to change that through a branding program involving many of the positive things that are going on here," said Lazareck, who came to Israel ahead of the conference for a series of meetings with various environmental, medical and technological companies. He was aiming to strengthen existing ties and establish new ones between Israel and Manitoba.

"In my experience, no one comes to Israel and leaves with the same ideas and attitudes. The thing to do is to bring more people here," Lazareck added.

The JNF is working to solve many challenges facing Israel today, including combating the country's water crisis by constructing reservoirs and upgrading water recycling programs, developing communities, restoring important historical sites, sponsoring research and development, and investing in tourism and recreation. "We really cover every aspect of Israel. There is no one else that can lay claim to Israel the way JNF does. At the end of the day, everything we do is about Israel. JNF is 100 per cent Israel," Cooper said.

The conference gave Canadian delegates an opportunity to meet and learn from other JNF chapters. "We learn from each other, share best practices, talk about what works, and what doesn't," said Cooper, who ran a session on young leadership.

Lazareck intends to take one idea that he learned about from JNF America back with him to Manitoba. JNF America has developed a great relationship with the US Forest Service, he said, which funds JNF in exchange for Israeli forestry expertise.

"Who would ever think that the department of forestry would take an interest in Israel? But as a matter of fact, they were so impressed with Israel's ability to grow trees anywhere, they're implementing [Israeli techniques] in arid parts of the U.S.," said Lazareck.

He intends to bring a similar JNF-government co-operation model back to Manitoba, which boasts huge forests and may benefit from Israeli forest-preservation expertise. "We're going to pursue this, not only provincially, but federally," he said.

Canadian delegates took more than just practical ideas from their international counterparts. "It was a thrill to meet with delegates from more than 30 countries, all with the same goal of building Israel through JNF," said Cooper. "Here we were [at the farewell party in Timna Park], all together, Jews from every continent on the planet, dancing and singing and celebrating being Jewish and having Israel."

Werger added, "I wish we could transport that feeling to an event in Toronto. The camaraderie has been wonderful. It's unbelievable how people mesh together. That's our common bond."

Rabinovich, who chaired the conference's summary session, said, "Although we're from 32 different countries and speak all different languages – German, French, Spanish, English, you name it – there are common factors bringing us together – that we're all Jewish and we're all interested in supporting Israel."

Federations raise $1 million for Japan relief

JTA

NEW YORK — Jewish federations throughout North America have raised nearly $1 million to help Japan recover from last month's massive earthquake and tsunami.

The federations' Japan, Hawaii and Pacific Relief Fund, opened immediately following the earthquake and resultant tsunami that struck Japan on March 11, has collected the money to support relief and recovery efforts in the damaged areas.

The Jewish Federations of North America, the umbrella group of the federation movement, has directly raised more than $187,000 through online, mobile and mailed donations.

Several individual federations have also opened funds, which have yielded about $680,000 in combined donations. As of April 8, the Jewish United Fund/Jewish Federation of Metropolitan Chicago and the UJA-Federation of New York have raised more than $125,000 each, while the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's fundraising has totalled more than $150,000.

The emergency committee of The Jewish Federations of North America voted last week to allocate $135,000 of the funds raised to the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC), which is supporting victims on the ground in Japan through local humanitarian organizations.

"The Jewish federations stand ready to respond to disaster with the strength of our collective action, to ensure that the funds contributed by generous donors are put to work in the most effective way possible," said Jerry Silverman, president and CEO of The Jewish Federations of North America. "Working in partnership with our trusted overseas partner, JDC, we can be sure that these funds will have the greatest impact where they are needed most in Japan."

'Mompreneurs' combine business with family

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

It's not exactly a conventional schedule for the average hard-working entrepreneur: 2:30 p.m., call supplier; 2:45 p.m., check finances with bank loan officer; 3 p.m., pick up toddler at pre-school; 3:30 p.m., prepare snack; 4 p.m. plan strategic expansion into new markets.

Well, perhaps it's not typical for most entrepreneurs, but Amy Ballon and Danielle Botterell have found that a growing number of young women are choosing to combine their careers with raising a family.

"Danielle and I believe that mompreneurship is a new trend that is taking off," said Ballon, a 39-year-old mother of three.

To address the increasing number of women trying to span two worlds, Ballon and Botterell have authored Mom Inc.: How to raise your family and your business without losing your mind or your shirt. The book is designed to address a growing cohort of young women who are opting to leave the corporate rat race behind or to simply find a rewarding way to pursue a career while still raising a family.

It was an experience both women went through themselves. "We wanted to be available for our kids, to be around for them, and to work and to have some flexibility," Ballon said.

"We thought about being available to the people you love when they need you. That's not always possible at a downtown job," said Botterell.

Ballon and Botterell, 40, met years ago in business school and have been friends ever since. They worked for consulting firms but found the corporate grind unsatisfying. "We had the sense the careers did not mesh with the kids and the family life we wanted. We always said we didn't want to work 100 hours a week" in a downtown office, Botterell said.

"For us, we wanted to be available for our families, supplement family incomes and grow a business that would be ready to take off when the families got bigger," she added.

Both agreed a key factor in their shift to mompreneurship was the one-year of maternity leave they received under the Employment Insurance system.

Ballon, whose kids range in age from eight to three, said being with children for one year is changing the attitude of many women about returning to work.

"Being at home gives you long enough to look at how life was before you had kids."

A lot of women came up with their business ideas during that period, often devising products they felt were lacking. One referenced in Mom Inc. was the leather-stitched footwear know as Robeez. The company was founded by Sandra Wilson, a mom who was frustrated by the type of footwear being marketed for infants. Unsatisfied with what was on offer, she developed her own solution.

Danielle Botterell, left, with son and daughter, and Amy Ballon, right, with three daughters, authored a how-to book for "mompreneurs."

Ballon's and Botterell's blanket business is another. In 2002 they started their own company, Admiral Road Designs, named for the home in the Annex which served as their corporate headquarters. It was, in fact, Ballon's dad's home and their headquarters was in the basement.

The company designs and ships fleece blankets that are aimed for children's use.

Their mompreneurship did not end there. About two years ago, they conceptualized Mom Inc., pitched it and, in a span of eight weeks, wrote the book.

In doing their research, they interviewed 50 women at various stages in life who were running their own businesses. In addition, 200 other women completed an online survey.

They found the reasons for starting a business were as varied as the women themselves. Some started their business before they had children; others did so while the kids were still young and at home; yet others waited until the children were older and in school.

Citing a CIBC study, Ballon said there are an estimated one million female entrepreneurs in Canada and "it is one of the fastest growing segments in the economy." There are now more women entrepreneurs than men, she added.

The book advises anyone considering mompreneurship to prepare themselves with a thorough business plan. "You need to think about things in a more strategic and calculating way by having a plan," Botterell said.

One area she advises women to stress is to "run the numbers...You need to plan up front, track things and evaluate which are going right and which aren't."

The moms' research came up with some interesting findings: of the more than 200 women who completed their online survey, 71 per cent invested less than $10,000 in their business; 43 per cent worked fewer than 30 hours a week at it; and 54 per cent took less than $10,000 out of the business last year.

Ballon speculated that a couple of things may be at play. "I think when kids are in the picture, you look at risk differently. They still need to eat. There's a different risk analysis if kids are still at home."

What's more, "the whole point is that you are there for your kids when they need you."

In that respect, she contends, the statistics aren't that important. "The point of the how-to aspect of the book is to set yourself up so you're successful in what matters to you."

In polling the women, Ballon and Botterell found "almost all felt they were successful. They were there for the kids, doing something they loved and pursuing their passions."

Bike-a-thon to aid trauma victims in Israel

Compiled by CJN Staff

What do the children of Mississippi, Chechnya, Sri Lanka, Haiti, and Israel have in common?

They have all benefited from the expertise of the Herzog Hospital – Israel Center for the Treatment of Psychotrauma.

While the physical scars of natural disasters, wars, and terrorism may be visible, those of trauma are not. Trauma is a condition with devastating effects, which if left untreated can last a lifetime.

Fortunately, the Herzog Israel Center for the Treatment of Psychotrauma (ICTP) has developed successful ways to help heal the pain. Since 1989, the ICTP has been developing and providing services and programs for populations exposed to trauma in Israel and internationally.

In an effort to assist their work, bicyclists have begun training for the Herzog ICTP Cycle for Hope Bike-a-Thon.

From May 2 to 5, bikers from Israel and around the world will cycle throughout Israel (one day option available), commencing in the Golan Heights and ending in Jerusalem.

The goal is to raise money to support the ICTP'S child resilience programs in Israel, which help educators, parents, and children in order to create comprehensive systems of support for traumatized children.

A bike-a-thon in the hills of Jerusalem, the sort of which, cyclists will join on behalf of Herzog ICTP Cycle of Hope. (Flash90 photo)

The money raised through the Cycle for Hope will go directly to support three projects.

- Parents Place in Sderot is for families in Sderot who have been living under fire since 2001 from over 10,000 Qassam missiles. With high rates of children suffering from post traumatic stress disorder and developmental delays, parents have been finding it difficult to cope and properly care for their children.
- Children with Cancer and their Siblings, is a program that develops innovative ways to help families cope with a severe illness of a child. Counselling is provided for parents whose child finished radiation or chemotherapy. Recognizing the need to provide services for siblings of ill children, the ICTP implemented Steven's Project, a camp for siblings of children with cancer, providing therapeutic services combined with outdoor activity.
- National School Resilience Project was originally developed and implemented by the ICTP in 2000 in response to ongoing exposure to terrorism. The program aims to educate and prepare professionals in educational settings to strengthen the resilience of children in the face of crisis, disaster, and other trauma. This program has been implemented widely in Israel, in both Jewish and Arab schools. By training teachers in 40 schools, ICTP can affect the lives of over 30,000 children.

The ITCP centre was established to contend with the growing phenomenon of psychotrauma in Israel, where an estimated 10 to 12 per cent of Israelis suffer from post traumatic stress disorder, three times the level of that in the United States and other western countries.

The ICTP has become a world recognized innovator in the research and treatment of the widespread effects of trauma. In order to best serve the different segments of society, the ICTP offers a wide range of programs and services, each specialized and directed towards specific parts of the population.

Through collaborative efforts with specialists around the world, ICTP is able to widely share its unique expertise. Responding to disasters, they have sent teams to Sri Lanka in the wake of the tsunami, and to the United States in the wake of Hurricane Katrina. They have also offered assistance in Chechnya and Turkey, working with regional neighbours to enhance capabilities in the face of ongoing conflict.

Tennis phenom expands horizons

Compiled by CJN Staff

Tennis phenom David Volfson continues to tear up the court with victories in singles and doubles at the Akademik Cup's under 14 competition last month in Kosice, Slovakia.

Volfson, 13, defeated Michal Dembek, the top-ranked player from Poland, and also won the doubles event with his partner from England, Lucas Taylor.

It was his best international showing in 2011 since the AEGON Junior International in Bolton, England, where he advanced to the final 16. In four tournaments this year, he's played 10 singles matches and won seven.

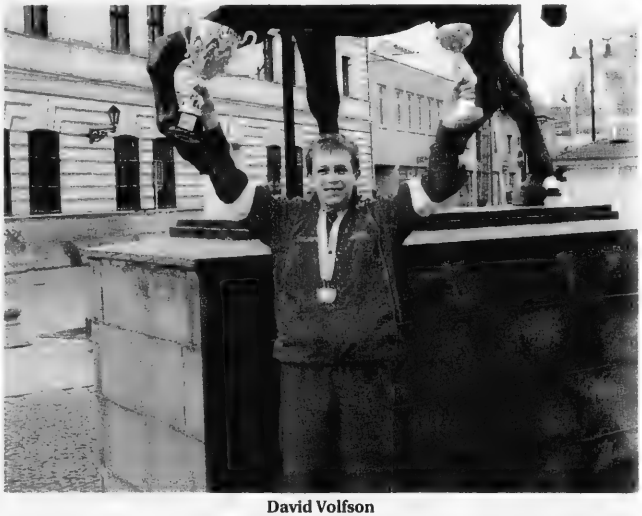
Volfson's 2011 season is building on successes from 2010. Last year, he registered first-place finishes in singles and doubles at Tennis Canada's under 14 Rogers Junior National Championships in Edmonton, along with first-place finishes in singles and doubles at the Jug Open in Skopje, Macedonia. He came close to winning the Subotica Open in Serbia soon after that, losing in the final to number 1 seed Bogdan Borza of Romania.

A Grade 8 student at the Leo Baeck Day School's north campus, Volfson took the opportunity while in Kosice to learn about the city's Jewish heritage. He met the rabbi at the local synagogue and was told that before World War II, Kosice had nearly 12,000 Jews. Now there are only about 200. "Before the Holocaust, every fifth person in the city was Jewish," Volfson said.

In conversation with his principal, Yvette Burke, they discovered that her parents were married at the same synagogue in Kosice he visited.

Volfson's budding tennis career has taken him to tournaments around the world. One of the advantages of his playing tennis at an elite level is the opportunity to travel, learn about Jewish communities around the world and expand his horizons.

Since he misses quite a bit of school while competing, Volfson enjoys learning about the history of each country, finding it a good way to be educated in world history.



David Volfson

During his trips, he builds time into his schedule for touring with his parents and coaches. While Volfson does not have a particular "favourite country," he enjoys comparing one country to the next and learning about the different ways people live.

"I love playing against different people from across the world and also the competitive atmosphere," Volfson said when asked what he loves most about playing tennis. He realizes the commitment he has made to tennis but has always been taught to enjoy his time on the court.

In an interview with The CJN last June, Volfson's coach, Guram Kostava of the Players Edge Tennis Academy, said the young player's future is virtually unlimited. "He's going to make history, that's what I think. Time will tell, but he has all the potential.

"He's very good at everything, good at the baseline, he's got good first and second serves, and he's mentally strong. He has a good fighting spirit.

"He keeps the ball inside and fights until the last point. He's like a machine, he never breaks down."

A member of the National Training Centre program at York University, Volfson get the best of coaching, has access to nutritionists, sports psychologists and all the other elements of the program designed to develop world class players.

His dream is to win Wimbledon one day and be ranked No. 1 in the world.

Troupe of young dancers performs for charity

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

BBK Showstoppers, a dance and theatre troupe made up of performers aged 10 to 14, performs at charity events and fundraisers in the Toronto area.

The dancers have to audition to join the troupe, which is directed by Brianne Buckman-Kalechstein.

The troupe's current set-list features upbeat musical theatre material as well as routines about serious subjects, including children finding foster homes, autism awareness, women around the world, and children of the Holocaust. Buckman-Kalechstein also choreographs event-specific routines when necessary.

"The BBK girls are a great group, and they are really gaining experience not just in performance, but as future leaders," she said.

The troupe rehearses six hours a week and receive technical training in jazz, ballet and musical-theatre choreography.

At a young age, Buckman-Kalechstein developed a passion for helping others. As a dance teacher, she has always choreographed routines with meaningful stories, either in memory or in honour of specific causes, but her routines were never performed for the audiences she intended them for.

"I really wanted to do more as a mentor and teacher, and have the dancers get out there and perform for the community and the groups we were supporting," she said.

Buckman-Kalechstein created BBK Showstoppers, in partnership with the Koffler Centre of the Arts, in 2009, to inspire young dancers to use their talents for a purpose.

"As a firm believer that not all classrooms have four walls, I take great pride in teaching my team about the various causes and charities we support, and showing them that they can make a difference, regardless of their age, by giving back with their talents," she said.

Last October, the BBK Showstoppers performed at Light the Night, raising more than $2,000 for the Leukemia and Lymphoma Society in memory of Buckman-Kalechstein's aunt, Shirley Kirsh. The girls also created blogs, where they wrote about their volunteer performance work.

They have performed for Women's Habitat, and they danced at the press kickoff for Mount Sinai Hospital's Yoga in Motion fundraiser last month.

Last month, the BBK girls served tea and danced at Baycrest's Café Europa in memory of the children of the Holocaust.

"After doing the Holocaust workshop with me in January, the BBK girls were very excited to perform for a group of survivors," Buckman-Kalechstein said. "While our presentation was upbeat, it meant a lot to me and the team to perform for this special group."

The BBK Showstoppers are invited to perform their memorial routine for an audience at Baycrest's Wagman Centre on the evening of May 2. That same afternoon, the girls will also dance at Associated Hebrew Schools and Leo Baeck Day School.

"This routine [built around a choral reading from the poem The Butterfly] takes us on a journey from freedom to hiding to ghetto to camp, through resistance and final uprising. It concludes with a message of 'no more hate,'" said Buckman-Kalechstein.

Christine Ting, a dancer in the troupe, said she enjoys performing the Holocaust dance because it "tells a good story, starting from the start of the Holocaust, through the war and ends when the war is over."

BBK Showstoppers "makes everyone happy and smile," she added.

On May 26, the girls will host the BBK Showstoppers Dance for Sick Kids. Proceeds go to the Crafting For a Cure Fund at the Hospital for Sick Children. The dancers have made posters, and they have created a blog. Their parents are donating items for a silent auction.

For more information about BBK, visit bbkshowstoppers.com. E-mail brianne@bbkshowstoppers.com for information about auctions on June 1 and 4 for the 2011-12 troupe.

Alon Nashman stars in Forests

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

Toronto actor Alon Nashman has a role in Forests, which he says is the "most titillating Rubik's Cube of a play" he has ever worked on.

Forests, written by Order of Canada recipient Wajdi Mouawad, is the third work in a four-play cycle that includes Incendies (Scorched).

Alon Nashman

The film version of Incendies was nominated for an Academy Award in the Best Foreign Film category earlier this year, and it recently received a Genie Award for Best Motion Picture. Forests takes audiences on a quest that spans six generations and two continents. Bonds of family are tested, stretched, broken and, finally, all is redeemed by love.

"It follows the journey of a young woman from Montreal, Loup, who traces her roots back through time and a very complex bloodline, which takes her into 18th-century Prussia, the First World War and the Holocaust," says Nashman, who plays Baptiste, Loup's father.

"It is a very strange circumstance that her legacy is discovered. This search brings her in contact with some of the most fascinating people who were affected by the complex history of Europe," he adds.

All the elements that made Scorched so gripping are in Forests, but in overdrive, Nashman says.

A mystery surrounds the death of Loup's mother, which Baptiste and his daughter probe. "The father-daughter relationship develops through the play, but it follows this young woman as she traces her family history," Nashman says.

Forests is "going to engender a deep sense of wonder and, at the same time, an incredible emotional connection, on a personal level, with the events of the 20th century and how they still impact on our lives."

Nashman says he can relate to the play in the way that he's always thinking about the legacy he's leaving his children. Nashman and his wife, Elizabeth, have three children, Tiferet, 16; Hershel, 13, and Neshama, 11.

In addition to Nashman, the cast features several talented Canadian theatre thespians, including Dmitry Chepovetsky, Matthew Edison, Vivien Endicott-Douglas, David Fox and Sophie Goulet. Nashman's most recent theatre credits include productions of Democracy, Alias Godot and Remnants at the Tarragon Theatre. This summer, Nashman will take two shows to the Edinburgh Festival in Scotland, Kafka and Son and Alphonse.

Forests, translated from the French by Linda Gaboriau and directed by Richard Rose, has its English-language première at the Tarragon Mainspace on April 27 and runs until May 29. Previews begin on April 19. For tickets, call 416-531-1827 or visit https://tickets.tarragontheatre.com.

Comic opera satirizes Brian Mulroney

Sherry Smither
Special to the CJN

While director Larry Weinstein was making the documentary Inside Hana's Suitcase in 2009, he was secretly working on a film of a different kind – a political comic opera about the trials and tribulations of Canada's 18th prime minister, Brian Mulroney.

"It was secretive because the subject is very explosive and political," Weinstein said over lunch at a Bloor Street café.

"If Brian Mulroney got hold of it before – or some of the people who were featured in the film – they may have done things to stop it. But also because the genre is so unheard of – nobody gets it when we say we are doing a political comic satirical opera about Mulroney. People can't figure it out because they've never seen anything like that before."

Mulroney: The Opera premières with a matinée on April 16 and an encore screening on April 27 at select theatres across the country.

This movie is not the first comic opera Weinstein has created with writer Dan Redican and composer Alexina Louie. They collaborated on the Bravo!FACT (Foundation to Assist Canadian Talent) shorts, Toothpaste (2002), about a couple arguing over who left the cap off the toothpaste tube, and Burnt Toast (2005), a series of comic mini-operas about romantic relationships. Both films received critical acclaim.

"What I love about opera is taking something as mundane as in Toothpaste and Burnt Toast and elevating it to opera," explains Weinstein, whose films have garnered almost every award possible.

"In the case of Mulroney: The Opera, what is fascinating is that politicians are already larger than life – like Mulroney with his baritone voice. They kind of act as they project. And there's something about the humour of taking these people's lives and putting it into operatic form that's so much fun, and it's crazy."

And crazy it is! Mulroney: The Opera is an ingenious parody. Mulroney, seen as misguided and egotistical, is portrayed by Rick Miller (former host of the Just for Laughs TV show) and voiced by bass-baritone Daniel Okulitch. The film exposes scandals involving Mulroney's cabinet ministers – for example, defence minister Robert Coates' (Sean Cullen) visit to a German strip club.

In a ridiculously witty scene with a stripper, Coates sings, "Who can blame me? Can you blame me?"

To satirize John Fraser's (Dan Lett) "Tunagate" fiasco, the minister of fisheries sings, "I let them sell the tainted fish... stinky, stinky, stinky fish... I meant well... sorry for the stinky smell."

Weinstein, Redican and Louie masterfully marry satire and art, turning Mulroney's Tories into babbling idiots.

Other actors include Stephanie Anne Mills as Mulroney's wife, Mila, Colin Mochrie as Jean Chretien and Wayne Best as Pierre Trudeau.

Many cast members lip-synch lyrics while opera singers like soprano Zorana Sadiq, tenor Martin Houtman and baritone Joel Katz voice their parts. Houtman and Katz also appear on screen as the angel and the devil, respectively, offering Mulroney advice, but give up, chanting, "Good luck, pal, you're on your own!"

In keeping with Weinstein's style, the movie is set in esthetically striking locations. Mulroney and Trudeau "tango" in Casa Loma (over Meech Lake) to Habanera from Carmen; Pioneer Village is transformed into Baie-Comeau, Mulroney's picturesque hometown; and the Leslie Street Spit creates a wonderful backdrop for Brian and Mila's romantic beach scene reminiscent of From Here to Eternity until Karlheinz Schreiber of the Airbus scandal appears and slips Mulroney an envelope.

Is Weinstein secretly scripting another opera? Maybe the Royals will be his next subject – with William and Kate's wedding a few weeks away, there's plenty of folly there!

For tickets and screening information, go to www.mulroneytheopera.ca.

Our Class explores Jewish-Polish relations

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Human relationships are manifestly fragile, determined as they are by upbringing, temperament and circumstance. Our Class, a play by Polish playwright Tadeusz Slobodzianek that ends its run at the Berkeley Street Theatre Downstairs on April 30, explores this broad theme courageously.

Based on Jan Gross' book, Neighbors, and directed by Joel Greenberg, Our Class unfolds over many decades in pre-war and post-war Poland. However, it concentrates on the Holocaust period, when Poland was occupied by German and Soviet armies.

The play, whose English version was written by Ryan Craig, takes place on a bare stage with 10 chairs. The simplicity of the set accentuates the unsettling and harrowing events that transpire.

Please see related story on page 73

Ten classmates, several of whom are Jewish, discover that their respective friendships do not withstand the test of time. Dormant animosities surface in a welter of racial cliches.

Our Class covers a span of time from the 1920s and 1930s, when Poland was a sovereign nation, to the outbreak of World War II and beyond.

The death of a major Polish politician, Jozef Pilsuski, generates a whiff of anti-semitism.

The Soviet occupation era, with its arrests, disappearances, rapes, food queues and wholesale nationalization of property, prompts accusations by some of the students that Jews welcomed the Red Army to their town in northeastern Poland.

The town, Jedwabne, is not explicitly mentioned due to a desire by the playwright to universalize the theme, which, historically, turns on the fraught topic of Polish-Jewish relations.

The German occupation brings death to the town's Jewish inhabitants in the form of a massacre perpetrated by its Catholic residents. At least two Jews survive the rampage – punctuated by rapes – thanks to the assistance of local Poles.

Cognizant of the debate spawned by the pogrom, the play is careful not to commit itself to firm casualty figures. A Jewish character refers to 1,600 deaths, but a Polish one puts the toll at "700 tops."

The actual number of Jews murdered in this obscure town is ultimately irrelevant. What counts is the obvious: Polish neighbours killed Jewish neighbours. In a flash, friendships vanished in blood curdling screams and a pall of smoke as a burning barn consumed scores of Jews.

Our Class, with fine performances from its young cast, explores the tenuous nature of the Polish-Jewish symbiosis and of human behaviour under duress.

Inexplicably, the events of 1968 and 1969, during which tens of thousands of Jews were forced out of Poland by a state-sponsored antisemitic campaign dressed up as anti-Zionism, are virtually ignored.

The Solidarity trade union period, which foreshadowed Poland's ascent to democracy after some 40 years of communism, is given short shrift as well.

This should not be taken as criticism. In the end, Our Class is about the tissue of prejudices, lies, denials, misunderstandings and hypocrisy that all too often marked Jews' relations with Christians in Poland.

TORONTO JEWISH FILM FESTIVAL TO FOCUS ON "THREE LENNYS" – BERNSTEIN, COHEN & BRUCE

The 19th annual Toronto Jewish Film Festival has announced a lineup of 118 diverse films from 21 countries that it will show between May 7 and 15, beginning with the North American première of Looking For Lenny, an illuminating look at the iconoclastic comedian and social commentator Lenny Bruce.

Directed by Elan Gale, Looking For Lenny opens the festival with a May 7 screening at The Underground, a new theatre at 186 Spadina Ave., one of seven venues in which the TJFF is presenting its wares. (The others are the Bloor Cinema, the Al Green Theatre, the Cineplex Odeon Sheppard Centre, SilverCity Richmond Hill, Canada Square and the TIFF Bell Lightbox.)

TJFF is also showing Leonard Cohen: Bird on a Wire, directed by Tony Palmer. The documentary, which captures Leonard Cohen in surprisingly candid moments, was made in the early 1970s and went missing for 38 years until Palmer discovered 294 rolls of raw footage in a Hollywood warehouse. With Cohen's consent, he painstakingly reconstructed it.

Several offerings in the festival's 19-part sidebar series on the Three Lennys focus on the legendary late composer Leonard Bernstein, whose son, Alexander Bernstein, is expected to be in attendance, just as Bruce's daughter, Kitty Bruce, is expected for the opening night.

Also on the bill is a world première of Between Two Worlds, a documentary by Deborah Kaufman and Alan Snitow that "explores the divisions that are redefining Jewish identity and politics," including loyalty to Israel, interpretations of the Holocaust, and intermarriage. A panel following the film will address the resonant question, "Who Speaks for the Jewish Community?"

Other titles include I Shall Remember by Russian director Vitaly Vorobjev; Crime After Crime, Yoav Potash's study of a California woman imprisoned for her part in the murder of a man who brutalized her; The Karski Report, about a Polish exile who alerted the Allies to the dire situation of the Jews in the Warsaw Ghetto; and A Jewish Girl in Shanghai, the first animated feature from China to deal with the Holocaust.

This is just the tip of the proverbial iceberg, so please visit the festival website at www.tjff.com for more details.

Orchestra Toronto: Jean Coulthard, Howard Shore, Samuel Barber, Leonard Bernstein and John Williams are among the composers highlighted as Orchestra Toronto celebrates Music of the Americas. A story of absolute and unconditional love

Joseph Serge
Arts Editor

"On 13 October 1991, my grandparents killed themselves. It was a Sunday. Not really the ideal day of the week for suicide."

So begins Johanna Adorján's touching and creatively reconstructed memoir of her grandparents, Hungarian-born Holocaust survivors Vera and István, who committed suicide in their home in Denmark.

Sixteen years later, in An Exclusive Love: A Memoir (Knopf Canada), translated by Anthea Bell, Adorján imagines the last day of her grandparents' lives, from the moment they wake up to their final minutes together holding hands in bed after taking a fatal dose of sleeping pills.

"What do people do on the morning that they know will be their last?" she wonders. "I imagine that they tidy up, get things done. Take out the rubbish… fold clean underclothes."

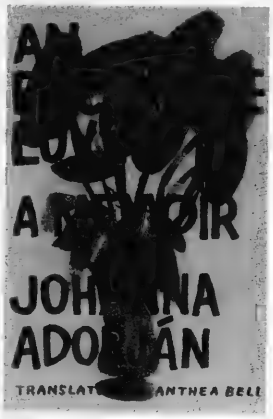
Adorján, now a 40-year-old living in Berlin, also intersperses her own memories as a young girl visiting her grandparents' home. She remembers fondly that her grandmother had two favourite sayings: "Shit happens." And "Tel Aviv" – a humorous distortion of "C'est la vie."

She also meets with their elderly friends and relatives to glean information about her grandparents' earlier days.

Like many survivors, Vera and István, her father's parents, were reluctant to talk about their Holocaust experiences.

We do learn that they were born in Hungary and met in a theatre. Her grandfather came from a family of assimilated Jews, more Hungarian of Jewish origin, than Jewish-Hungarian.

Vera was already pregnant with the author's father when the Germans occupied Hungary in 1944. Vera was able to obtain forged papers and survive the occupation in Budapest, but István was sent to Mauthausen. She doesn't know much of his time there, only that he "learned to sleep on his feet" and survived a death march to another camp at the tail end of the war.



István returned to Hungary after the war and reunited with his wife and son. After the Soviet invasion during the uprising in 1956, they fled Hungary and settled in Copenhagen.

Above all, this is a love story – a story of absolute and unconditional love. The title comes from Adorján's imagining of her grandmother's motive for suicide. Her grandfather, we know, was terminally ill and his condition was worsening. In Adorján's telling, she imagines that Vera could not live without him and implies that they made a pact a long time ago to die together.

Adorján uses a casual and informal style with dashes of her own brand of humour. She mentions that once in New York she was talked into signing up for J-Date and was rather disappointed. "If someone tells you in his profile that he is 36 years old, it doesn't necessarily mean that he is 36. It can mean that one or two decades ago he was 36 and still has a lively memory of what it feels like."

Although she wasn't brought up Jewish in any sense (her mother in fact wasn't even Jewish), in tracking down her grandparents' lives she discovers her own connection to Judaism and observes that "maybe it's typically Jewish to think everything is typically Jewish."

This is a different type of family memoir. Obviously a lot of it is made up – more fiction than memoir. In re-imagining her grandparents' last day on earth, Adorján creates a scenario that is plausible and, perhaps, one that she can live with.

In the hands of another writer this memoir could have been overly sentimental and mushy. But Adorján sensibly avoids that trap and it reads almost like an ode to her grandparents. A gift they would have approved of.

Richard Alther's Siegfried Follies (Regent Press) also has the search for one's Jewish roots as one of its themes.

The book follows the unlikely friendship between two orphan boys. Given up by his foster parents, Franz is raised in a maternity ward for Aryan mothers in Munich. One day, in the last year of World War II, he happens to fall upon a young boy who was thrown out of a transport train.

Franz secretly takes the malnourished boy back to the hospital where he nurses him to health. He names him "J" for the tattoo on his arm.

The two boys become good friends and after the war hide out in a bombed out theatre where Franz begins to show his business acumen and J his academic smarts.

As J gets older, he goes to school (how he managed to do that without paperwork and a legal guardian is never satisfactorily addressed) and becomes drawn to his past and his Judaism. He visits Dachau and wonders if his mother, whose face he can't even picture, died there.

The book follows the boys into adulthood, during which after a separation when J goes to a kibbutz, they're both living in America; Franz as a successful married businessman and J, as a moody, depressed writer of children's plays based on German folk heroes.

The first part of Siegfried Follies, dealing with the main characters as young boys surviving in a tragic, indifferent world, is enjoyable. But as the boys become adults, the laboured narrative veers into heavy topics of collective guilt and forgiveness, and the book becomes weighted down by Dostoevsky-style broodiness and references to Wagnerian operas, Mein Kampf and the Talmud.

Play causes controversy

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

A play about a 1941 pogrom in Nazi-occupied Poland has opened new wounds in Toronto.

A Polish community organization claims that the play is historically inaccurate in at least two vital respects – the number of Jews killed in the massacre and the extent of Polish involvement in it. But the theatre company staging it counters that the group is missing the point.

Our Class, mounted by Studio 180 Theatre in association with the Canadian Stage Company at the Berkeley Street Theatre Downstairs, is based on the book Neighbors, written by Polish-born historian Jan Gross and published in 2001.

Adapted for the stage by Polish playwright Tadeusz Slobodzianek, who appeared at a press preview last week, Neighbors is about a group of 10 Catholic and Jewish classmates in a small Polish town whose friendships are torn asunder by a series of events starting in prewar Poland.

Our Class, directed by Joel Greenberg, focuses on the Soviet and German occupations of Poland and climaxes with a pogrom that claimed the lives of virtually the entire Jewish population of the town of Jedwabne.

In Our Class, which runs until April 30, the name of the town where as many as 1,600 Jews were murdered by their Catholic neighbours under the eyes of the German occupiers goes unmentioned.

The play, which has been shown in Israel, had its world premiere at the National Theatre in London in 2009 and was staged in Warsaw last year.

Presenting Our Class in its North American premiere, Studio 180 bills the two-hour play as an examination of Polish-Jewish relations in the 20th century touching on universal themes such as collective cowardice and individual bravery.

Studio 180 says its mission is "to produce socially relevant theatre that provokes public discourse and promotes community engagement."

The Canadian Polish Congress has criticized the play.

Claiming it is factually inaccurate, CPC spokesperson Hanna Sokolski said that several hundred rather than 1,600 Jews were killed and that the atrocity was organized by the Germans with the participation of about 40 local Polish residents.

Conceding that the number of victims is in dispute, Greenberg said that the play is not about numbers but about "neighbours killing neighbours."

Peter Jassem, chair of the Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation of Canada, said the issue is clouded.

A decade ago, an exhumation of the bodies was carried out in Poland by the Institute of National Remembrance to establish an exact count.

"It was not completed due to opposition from a concerned Jewish community, driven by respect for the dead in accordance with Jewish religion and tradition," said Jassem. "At that point, the work was halted and the investigation ended."

The Institute of National Remembrance subsequently issued a statement that the remains of at least 340 Jews lay in a mass grave.

"Technically, the number of victims is still unknown," Jassem added.

"It may have been 500, 1,000 or close to the figure cited by Gross. From an ethical point of view, it doesn't matter. One victim would have been too many."

He added, "The fact remains that the Jewish inhabitants of Jedwabne were murdered by their fellow citizens. This has been debated and acknowledged by Polish historians and the Polish media and accepted by a great majority of Polish society."

Jassem made one final point: "Of course, if not for the brutal consecutive Soviet and Nazi occupations, the preconditions for the pogrom would not have been created, and the pogrom would likely not have taken place. The play explores these preconditions with honesty."

Matisyahu performs at Chabad benefit concert in Toronto

Daniel Koren
Special to The CJN

Reggae superstar Matisyahu indulged his Toronto fans yet again last week with an acoustic performance, a meet-and-greet and his personal reflections on Judaism.

Matisyahu, who performed at the Toronto Centre for the Arts as part of Uptown Chabad's fourth annual benefit evening, has struck a chord with Jews and non-Jews alike ever since his breakthrough record Live at Stubb's was released in 2005 and his song King Without a Crown reached the Billboard Top 40 a year later.

Organizers of the annual benefit, who work to expose more Jews to Chabad's philosophy and raise money for the services provided by Uptown Chabad in Toronto, hoped that the presence of Matisyahu – both a reggae star and a devoted Chabadnik – would draw some positive attention.

Led by Rabbi Moshe Steiner and his wife, Yehudis, Uptown Chabad offers a multitude of services and programs, including women's events, preschools and weekly Shabbat dinners at their shul.

The April 5 event was built around 31-year-old Matisyahu, also known as Matthew Miller, who was raised a Reconstructionist Jew but immersed himself in the Chabad Lubavitch community in Crown Heights, Brooklyn, more than a decade ago.

Matisyahu is known as one of the most original reggae musicians of the decade, the foundations of his music stemming from the philosophy of Chassidism.

An active enthusiast of the Jewish community, he was more than willing to share some of his thoughts and stories with the crowd, but not before playing fan favourites from albums Youth, his most recent recording Light, and even a cover of Bob Marley's Running Away.

Matisyahu

But before Matisyahu took to the stage with guitarists Trevor Wall and Adam Weinberg for his acoustic reggae, rock and rap set, the audience heard testimonies from Uptown Chabad members and viewed videos that showcased the various projects members work on.

Hundreds of fans, as well as Jewish community leaders and politicians, including York Centre Conservative candidates Mark Adler and Michael Mostyn, and Toronto mayor Rob Ford, were in attendance.

Ford, who thanked the Jewish community for inviting him to the gala, said "that Toronto is made up of compassionate individuals who shape a city that we can be all proud to call home."

Matisyahu, dressed in his traditional black attire and sporting a blue kippah, started the set off with Silence, at the end of which, and nearly with every song after it, the musician showcased some of his formidable beat-boxing abilities, accentuated by the soft acoustic accompaniment.

The singer laughed and told jokes in between jams, constantly asking for more water, proclaiming how the stage was as dry as a desert and was in dire need of fluids.

He interacted frequently with the audience, humouring them as they begged him to play his most popular tune, One Day and, at one point, handed the mike to a girl in the front row and asked her about the meaning of a song he had just performed called Lime Tree.

The girl said that, to her, the song describes the world as a beautiful place but sour all at once, and that outside of the lime tree you had to find God and deeper meaning.

You could tell that he was impressed by her reply.

Watching the talented artist craft beats and sing simultaneously, as his payot and long grey beard swayed and he moved his entire body to the sound of his own rhythms, was no doubt an intimate experience for the audience.

He played favourites such as Lord Raise Me Up and Jerusalem, acappella, and seemed genuinely comfortable on stage in front of his fellow Chabad supporters.

His performance was uplifting, brimming with stories of the Torah that have shaped the principles of his music.

After an hour-long set, he left the stage, only to return a few minutes later to the furious chanting of "encore, encore!"

He saved his best known anthems for last – the overly requested One Day and his most celebrated King Without a Crown.

As he has on several occasions, Matisyahu thanked his fans for their support, and thanked Uptown Chabad for having him.

To show his appreciation, the approachable musician gave fans the opportunity to take photographs with him and to hear his thoughts on how Judaism has influenced his life, during a dinner reception to which The CJN was not granted access.

Schools measure 'footprints'

Ontario EcoSchools is an environmental education program for kindergarten to Grade 12. Developed and run by school boards, the program allows students to acquire ecological literacy and learn about practices that will make them environmentally responsible citizens. In addition, Ontario EcoSchools helps to improve operations within school buildings in order to reduce environmental impacts.

Several Toronto Jewish day schools participate in the program, including the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School, the Toronto Heschel School, Bialik Hebrew Day School and the Associated Hebrew Schools, Kamin branch.

Many of the Toronto District School Board (TDSB) public schools are part of the EcoSchool program. TDSB schools have recently added a quantitative element to their efforts using the Zerofootprint Challenge, a program that encourages schools around the world to measure, compare and change their environmental footprint.

Sustainable Jew

Fred Winegust

TDSB gathers monthly data about electricity, water and natural gas consumption from many of its schools. The key is to visually benchmark performances against one another. Data can be manipulated in order to compare usage per student or per square foot of the school. With this information, students and teachers can select specific elements of the EcoSchools program to help improve energy conservation measures, the impact of which could be measured over time.

The York Catholic District School Board measures and displays electricity consumption in near real time. Its Eco Champions program enables students and teachers to act when consumption gets too high and to see the impact of their actions within two minutes.

What about Israel? Sviva Israel, a leading environmental education organization for school-aged children, develops and implements programs that promote environmental literacy while exploring the connections between Judaism and the environment. Its website, http://bit.ly/tsj1104-05, does not have a quantitative benchmarking capability. A session at the recent Eilat/Eilot renewable energy conference was on how schools in Israel teach environmental responsibility with a focus on renewable energy. Curriculum development in Israeli schools has begun, but has not yet reached the level of Ontario EcoSchools curriculum integration.

Eighteen schools in Eilat are considering a pilot project using the same application that TDSB is using to make its energy consumption visible. Over time, the information gathered would allow the staff in the Eilat schools to implement exercises for energy-consumption reduction and the effects could be quantifiably measured.

Unlike the Ontario public, Catholic and Eilat schools approach, there is no centralized way for the Toronto Jewish day schools to measure, compare and change their energy consumption. Perhaps the Eilat schools and the Toronto Jewish day schools should partner with each other.

Elements of Ontario EcoSchools could help accelerate curriculum development and link environmental and conservation ideas. And the Toronto Jewish day schools could get a better understanding of the value of making energy-consumption data more visible to its community through a centralized effort. This would give them the ability to measure, compare and reduce energy consumption, and apply operational savings to educational needs.

Sounds like a possible community engagement project to bring the twinned cities of Eilat/Eilot and Toronto together. Anyone want to help?

Pesach, Guyana, My Boy

I'm explaining Pesach to my son, Noah. He's almost five.

As I do, I have to simplify the Exodus and understand it through his eyes, those of a child. There's something about this perspective that makes sense, as Pesach is the holiday of the child. It's the holiday of "why."

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

As I tell him the story, I see a raw nation of people, tired, hopeful and (mostly) raring to escape Egypt. I imagine the clouds as being their taps and God being always nearby.

Noah recognizes the resilience of the Jewish people. He asks how they could spend 40 years in a dry, desolate desert. Good question. How could they?

I tell him, in words that suit his young mind, that our people were forced to get used to the sandstorms and freezing cold desert nights. I tell him that having a dream – called the Jewish People – made it easier on the 600,000 who left Egypt.

I find it hard to explain slavery to my boy. Mostly become I am too ashamed to admit my people once cowered in corners afraid of other men who were forcing them to abandon their Jewish soul and sense of self. How do you explain brutality to a child?

To help him get the dream part, I then explained how a team of doctors and public health educators from Toronto just travelled to Guyana, with Ve'ahavta, to work in a dense jungle with monkeys and tarantulas to help Amerindian villagers.

I explained to Noah that the team included three religious Jews who were so committed to their beliefs that on a Friday morning, they awoke at 5:30 a.m. in that boiling hot country to bake challah for Shabbat.

I told him the team made an eruv in the village of Akawini so they could help out in a medical clinic on Shabbat. I drew an eruv, explaining that it comprises posts and wires set up so Jews can carry stuff outside on Shabbat, objects that would otherwise be forbidden by Torah law.

I recounted that when Shabbat was over, the team made Havdalah. He liked that.

(While in Guyana, Ve'ahavta's team set up clinics wherever possible, encouraging families and individual to come to get medical attention. For many years, Ve'ahavta has sent multifaith volunteer medical teams to Guyana. The missions have always enabled team members to work effectively in extremely resource-poor settings while avoiding travel on Shabbat and maintaining the laws of kashrut. Interestingly, a number of the local communities that Ve'ahavta partners with are Seventh Day Adventist. They celebrate Shabbat just as we do, from Friday evening until nightfall Saturday. Many of them enjoy attending Ve'ahavta's Shabbat services and meals, and join in the blessing over bread and wine.)

Pesach is upon us. Look closely at it through your eyes and through those of a child. Imagine human beings streaming out of old Egypt, crossing a split sea, after suffering through the building of palaces and pyramids, and finally feeling the freedom we all crave.

See thousands of Jews huddling in the desert tasting the flatbread matzah and lifting their heads to the heavens, capturing some of God's rain on the tips of their tongues and on their sweaty foreheads.

Within all this, I feel great joy at adhering to the mitzvah of "And you shall tell your child on that day as follows: 'Because of this, HaShem did for me, when he took me out of Egypt.'" I feel such joy. Chag Samayach. Happy Pesach.

Life Doesn't Frighten Me At All

Sofia Freudenstein
Age 12

Dare-Devil Charlotta. That's what my friends called me. Improper. That was my parents' name for me. Stupid. That was my brother's favourite name for me. I am 10, almost 11, and I have ALWAYS been known for my "schemes." When I was five, I revealed my pantaloons in front of my class. The boys started laughing hysterically, and the girls just blushed red. The teacher wasn't very fond of it either.

Ever since, I have been a "wild" child. I would jump into muddy puddles, just after rainfall, and ruin my clothes. I would then leave a trail of mud across Mama's rug. I would jump on my bed and try and touch the ceiling. I would scream and shout at the top of my lungs. I would pass by dogs that were barking and baring their teeth, and I would just bark back. Even when the rest of my family would read quietly by the fire, I would run and dance to my own songs.

But then things changed: Mama gave me a yellow cloth bracelet with a star sewed on it, and she told me not to ruin it. Then she said that I wouldn't be able to run and play tag with Elsa and Greta at sunset anymore. I wouldn't be allowed to ride my bike in the park to my heart's content, and I could not take dancing lessons at the library anymore. When Mama told me this she looked strained and worried. But I wasn't frightened.

A few days later, Greta, Elsa and I were playing jump-rope in the square. Mama was closely watching and staring at her watch and a run-down house nearby. We were playing in broad daylight, the time Mama said it would be okay to play. A group of young men passed by us. They looked at us – me, Elsa and Greta. Then they spat at us. They walked close to Mama, and spat at her with disgust. I stared at Mama. Why hadn't she told those men that spitting is nauseating and gross, just like she told me whenever I spat? But she didn't even move away when they did so. Why? I thought maybe this question I would keep to myself.

About a month later, Mama woke me early and put a finger to my mouth. It was still dark outside. Mama dressed me in many layers of clothing, but it was summertime. We went on a walk outside. There were many eerie sounds and shadows, but I still held my head high.

We stopped at the run-down house. Ferdinand, my brother, did not have his usual smirk on his face. He actually looked frightened. But I wasn't.

We went in quietly. It felt as though large gleaming red eyes were following me in the darkness, but I was not going to let that bother me. We went up a rickety flight of stairs. By an accident, I stepped on a loose board that made a creaking noise. Mama's face turned completely pale, the whiteness standing out like a ghost in the darkness. Even Papa, who wasn't afraid of anything, stared at me with bewildered eyes. Everyone froze for a moment. Then Papa made a signal to move on.

We arrived upstairs. Papa walked over to a dusty bookcase. Being careful not to leave any marks from his hands on the case, he pushed it quietly aside to reveal a staircase. We went up it. I was not in fear, but I was confused. We started to unpack our things on a rickety wooden table, but I didn't ask any questions. Mama served potatoes for dinner (which I am not very fond of) but I kept in my curiosity. We did not leave the little room where we slept and ate. Whenever we talked to each other in that room (which was very seldom), we would talk very quietly, so I didn't raise my voice either. I yearned for sunlight. Frankfurt was such a beautiful city. There was a little crack in the window. I would sometimes spend hours just staring out that crack and looking at the children playing in the square. Elsa and Greta were not there playing jump-rope or hop-scotch on the square.

Usually, I was the one who broke the rules, but there was a certain seriousness and gloom to our new home.

Then one day, we had visitors, but they were unexpected. They were loud and impolite. They were treating Papa disrespectfully. No one insults Papa. Now, I was truly frightened. They put us in jeeps and took us away from the run-down house. I didn't understand; Mama and Papa and Ferdinand were so crestfallen.

Now I know why.
I used to be the dare-devil.
Not anymore.
I used to laugh.
Not anymore.
I used to not be afraid of anything.
Not anymore.
Not now.
I used to live.
Not anymore.

This story uses the names of my family members, and I dedicate it to them. They were from Frankfurt-Am-Main, Germany, and left for America before the Holocaust. I decided that the main character's name would be Charlotta, my namesake and my great-grandmother. Ferdinand is the name of my late grandfather. Elsa and Greta are my great-aunts, who are healthy and alive.

Kill It At Dusk

Bruce Jacobs Davidovitch

Upon a timeless landscape
Where I'd aspire to be Millennia and some years more
Cast on an ancient sea

To celebrate a Passover
As time has passed, to know
How o'er the years rituals changed
Since Israel fled its foe

Decades ago in cheder
Reading Exodus 12:13
'When I see blood I'll pass over you'
This edict was ordained

And further on when Pharaoh said
He'd let the people go
In thanks for Egyptians drowned and dead
Moses did in gratitude show

In Exodus 12:3
There'd earlier been decreed
'...take to them a lamb..' (for slaughter)
Once each year recall this deed

'...and the whole assembly of Israel...'
Should gather upright and just
At a time of day directed
They '...shall kill it (the lamb) at dusk...'
Now dusk is not the time of day
That I would favour most Unless some awesome sunset dipped
'longside a tropic coast

Nor dark of night nor starlit sky
Off'ring the Paschal lamb
In bygone years of BCE
Echoes across the sand
Desert oases gathered in tents
Early Temples One and Two
From rural to urban, pleas and laments
Diaspora synagogues grew
Evolving not static protocols change
Recalling an enslaved nation
Kiddush to Nirtzah and the seder plate
Commemorate our liberation

Since Middle Ages it has become
A pageant held in homes
Four questions plus, 'who's home will be host?'
Seeds of family politics sown

Passover vacations, Passover resorts
Passover tours at hotels of all sorts
In Orlando, glatt kosher, Scottsdale for golf
Tiberias, Totally Jewish Travel of Israel's borders north

There's Pesach Cruises via Panama Canal
Hosted by renowned rabbis, there's even a Spa
'Meaningful seders!' casinos, Broadway shows
Was it all 'as advertised', I truly don't know
It's up to you dear reader
If you'd like to be judgemental
To discern if Pesach's transforming growth
Is capacious or tangential
As a shank bone rests in its honoured place
We sit leaning at the table
In the likelihood of sounding brusque
Let the local shochet kill that lamb at dusk.

The Unexpected Guest

Rachel Berman

In looking over the numerous adventures I shared with my good friend Mr. Sherlock Holmes, there have been many of note that have been published. There have also been many instances where our adventures were too outré for publication. These other accounts I have left safely in my bank until such time as the public will be ready to accept them.

One tale in particular has remained with me. I hope, if you are reading this, that Shakespeare's words still hold true and that you the reader believe that "there are more things in heaven and earth than are dreamt of in our philosophy." –John H. Watson, MD.

I remember it was early morning on the 19th of April 1895 when my friend and I entered our sitting room to find a waiting client. Our landlady shut the door behind us looking far from pleased at having to wake at such an hour to save the doorbell from another desperate client. The gentleman appeared to be a man of means, his clothes although in disarray, indicated.

"Good morning sir, I am Dr. Watson, This is Mr. Sherlock Holmes," I said in greeting.

"Mr. Holmes, I have had the most trying experience." Our client had risen as he spoke but Holmes waved him back to his seat.

Holmes began immediately. "Now sir, please tell us what has occurred to cause you a sleepless night and an early morning rush to consult me."

Our client replied, "Mr. Holmes, my name is Ian Norant, owner of Norant Jewellers."

Holmes nodded, "I am familiar with your name, Mr. Norant. Some of your clients have become mine over time."

"Yes, Mr. Holmes, it's from one of our mutual clients that I was given your name."

Holmes sat in his chair, and steepled his fingers. "Very well, Mr. Norant, please tell us what occurred to so disturb you. Begin at the beginning and leave nothing out, no matter how minute. The smallest detail could mean volumes."

Mr. Norant gathered his thoughts and began: "As I have just stated, I am the owner of one of the most respected jewellers in the country, serving the wealthiest and noblest in England. I had occasion recently to purchase a very large diamond. Once cut, it will be of immense value. I employ a number of gem cutters, but for this particular piece, there was only one man I would trust to cleave the diamond, a Mr. Asscher."

Holmes nodded. "The name is familiar." Holmes motioned for our client to go on.

"I spoke to Mr. Asscher on the 17th regarding the diamond. He said he would call on me in 10 days to see the diamond and appraise the cost of cleaving it. Well, Mr. Holmes, news of the diamond had already spread. The next day, I began receiving a number of telegrams from clients and a visit from a most esteemed client. All were interested in purchasing the diamond once it was cut. My clients did not seem inclined to wait 10 days, so I went over to see Mr. Asscher at his business, but no one was there."

"What did you do next?" Holmes inquired.

"Well, it was getting on to evening so I went home to supper. I intended afterwards to go to Mr. Asscher's home, but various matters detained me, so that by the time I arrived at Mr. Asscher's residence it was close to 11."

Holmes raised an eloquent eyebrow.

"I know it is late to call on a person at such an hour, but the diamond is worth many thousands of pounds, I could not wait." Mr. Norant's pitch rose.

"What happened then, Mr. Norant?"

"That is when the mystery began, Mr. Holmes."

My friend's eyes glittered with anticipation.

"I was about to knock upon Mr. Asscher's door when it opened suddenly. There was a lad, perhaps five years of age holding the door. He appeared surprised by my presence. He turned and spoke to someone inside the house."

"Father, there's a man at the door!"

"Of course there is, Berel," replied an amused voice that I recognized as Mr. Asscher's. "No father, I mean someone else." "It appeared, Mr. Holmes, that the family was expecting a caller. Mr. Asscher came to the door. He did not appear pleased to see me, but invited me in nevertheless. The entryway opened into the dining room. I was asked to wait a moment. Mr. Asscher returned to the dining table and the family began some sort of chant in what I assume was the Hebrew language. I noticed the lad was still at the open door. I could only assume that their guest was expected momentarily.

"As I waited, I began to look about. I noticed a large, round platter in the centre of the table. There were various unusual items on it. I recognized an egg and a piece of what I took to be a roasted animal bone. The other items I did not recognize. In the centre of this platter was a large silver goblet filled to the brim with what I took to be wine. As I looked at the goblet, I saw the wine drain away. The chanting ceased and the lad shut the door. The entire family seemed much amused, Mr. Holmes. It was then that Mr. Asscher took me aside to discuss my purpose in coming to see him."

All three of us sat in silence as we absorbed this unusual tale.

Holmes broke the silence. "Did you not ask Mr. Asscher to explain this singular event?"

"No, Mr. Holmes. I confess I did not remain long; I could not focus on the business I had come for. I bid a hasty goodbye and left. I only wanted to be away from there. Mr. Holmes, either I am going mad or those Hebrews were practising some form of sorcery. I went home and spent the night turning over in my mind whether it would be wise to report this to Scotland Yard. Although I felt I should consult you first."

At this last statement, Holmes sat up, rising slowly and stood towering over our client. "I would be very careful if I were you, Mr. Norant. Such a libelous charge as practising Dark Arts would have a highly undesirable effect on all the inhabitants of this city."

Mr. Norant shrank at Holmes' tone and hard grey eyes. "But what else could it be Mr. Holmes?"

"If it is the Dark Arts, you have consulted the wrong professional. I deal in facts. If you are not amenable to a solution derived from facts, I suggest you consult a man of the cloth."

Our client was dispirited. "Mr. Holmes, I turn to you for an answer to this bewildering affair and to relive my mind."

"Then I suggest you go about your day, Mr. Norant, and I hope to call on you tomorrow with a solution to your puzzle."

Mr. Norant thanked Holmes profusely and left.

Holmes went back to his chair, curling up with his chin on his knees. "Dangerous fool," he muttered. I sat quietly and waited. After a time, Holmes roused himself from his reverie. "Well Watson, what do you make of our client's adventure?"

"I'm no expert Holmes, but surely a man of the Hebrew faith who is away from his business for such a lengthy period during the springtime, and is witnessed performing some sort of ritual, surely it is the holiday of Passover."

"Excellent Watson, correct on every point. You are a learned and intelligent man. Mr. Norant knows no more than carats, cuts and clarity."

"But Holmes, we must still discover who the Asschers were waiting for, and how the wine disappeared from the goblet."

Holmes raised an admonitory finger, "not disappeared Watson, drained. That is what our client stated. The question is how was the goblet drained?" Holmes stood, "I think we will pay a call on Mr. Asscher tonight. I'm sure once the situation is explained, he will be only too eager to clear up yesterday's events. Although I don't foresee this incident being anything serious."

Close to 11 that same night, we found ourselves in the Jewish quarter. Once Holmes had identified himself and his reason for coming, Mr. Asscher was indeed most willing to be of assistance.

"Mr. Holmes, what Mr. Norant witnessed was merely part of our telling of the story of the exodus of the Hebrews from Egypt. My son Berel opened the door so we might welcome in the Prophet Elijah, who visits the Jewish homes on Passover. Mr. Norant happened to arrive just in time." Mr. Asscher looked at my friend, "I suppose this is a strange custom to you, Mr. Holmes."

Holmes smiled, "No stranger than Saint Nicholas visiting all Christian homes in one night. Well, you've explained the open door, but not the drained goblet."

Mr. Asscher chuckled, "It is only a prank Mr. Holmes, a trick cup. It was given to me as a boy. Over the years, it has become a family tradition to use it on the first night of Passover. The children enjoy it." Mr. Asscher's smile faded. "It did not occur to me that Mr. Norant would be so troubled. I am sorry this prank has caused such a disturbance, and that you have been bothered over such a trifle."

"Not at all, Mr. Asscher, I appreciate a good theatrical prank, and it is pleasant on occasion not to have a criminal investigation. But I do believe we have taken enough of your time. We'd best be on our way Watson."

I spoke up quickly. "Mr. Asscher, if it is not too much trouble, I should very much like to see your welcoming of the Prophet Elijah"

"Ever the dramatist Watson," Holmes mocked gently. "That is the writer in Watson speaking,"

Holmes whispered to Mr. Asscher.

Mr. Asscher graciously invited us to stay.

"I will be outside, Watson." Holmes did not care for anything outside of the material and rational world.

I watched as the previous night's events were repeated. The family chanted as the youngest child opened the door. I watched in amazement as the wine in the goblet visibly diminished, as if some unseen person had quenched his thirst.

"That is quite the trick" I said jovially, only to frown in confusion at the expressions of astonishment on the faces of the Asscher family.

"Is this not the same goblet as yesterday?" I asked Mr. Asscher.

All I received as reply was a dazed shake of the head. I made my farewells as quickly as politeness permitted and left the house moments later. As I left the house through the open door I felt a draught pass me by. I hurried to where Holmes was waiting.

Holmes was whistling a light tune and appeared to be in good spirits, "Ah Watson, as you see there was no great mystery. The matter was cleared up with a simple and reasonable explanation; most things are. I'm sure our client will be most relieved." I opened my mouth, only to close it.

We walked down the street toward the main road where we might catch a cab home. As we walked down the street, doors began to open, throwing rays of light onto the dark street. The doors opened invitingly, but not for us.

"There are more things in heaven and earth than is dreamt of in our philosophy" I muttered under my breath.

"What was that, Watson?"

"I said, you're absolutely right, Holmes."

I will not infer from your black suit and stiff blanched collar an absolutist's stance since moot distinctions were your passion,
nor read prophecy into your ashen beard
though your forehead, pale as a candle, burned, as did the bald dome beneath your silk skullcap.

Your terse lips questioned transcendence, your magnified eyes ponfrom behind the flash of spectacles.

Man of substance, you were suspicious of these captured appear-

you who inhabited thought

The Last Yiddish Poet

Translated by Charles Heller
In memory of Leon Eisner z'l

This poem was found after clearing out a house in Bathurst Manor, and was translated with the kind assistance of the late Shmuel Pupko z'l

Here I sit.
The last poet.
No one comes to see me.
No one comes to read my books.

Not even a PhD student.
I sit alone.

Today someone knocked on my door.
At last! Someone wants to read a Jewish word.
No – it was the cleaning lady.
She wiped the dust off my shelves and all my books.
Now they are all clean.

Time to go.
I switch off the light.
I close the door.
Take care.

Wishing good health and happiness to our friends and clients during this season of celebration and reflection.

The Chocolate Orchard

Ellie Clavier

It was a bitterly cold evening in the small, modern German suburb; so cold that the usually bustling thoroughfare of the industrial park beyond their snow-laden fences, lay eerily still. It made seven-year-old Clara think of the Christmas carol Schtille Nacht. With her small nose pressed right up against her living room window, Clara could see large, lacy snowflakes drifting effortlessly down in the white light of the halogen street lamp. The road could not be more peaceful, more calm or more bright.

"Come away from the window. It's cold where you're sitting," her mother called.

"I like the cold!" Clara replied.

From the corner of the room, where she sat knitting by the electric heater, Clara's elderly grandmother softly murmured, "Let Clara be. There's something very special in the cold. Maybe if she watches very carefully, she will catch a glimpse of the harvesters trekking back home through the snow."

Clara's mother's ears picked up when she heard this. She stole a worried glance at the old woman. This was not the first time her words had seemed confused and misplaced. In fact, more and more often lately, the realities of her 2010 existence had seemed to blend with her memories of days long gone. Although she hated the thought, perhaps it was time to admit that senility had crept up on her.

As if reading her thoughts, the old lady continued, her voice gaining in strength as she spoke."One icy cold winter, many years ago, when I was just a young girl, not much older than you, Clara, our peaceful little village became filled with noisy soldiers that roamed the streets at all hours of the day and night and handsome, uniformed officers who would give us penny candies for shining their big black boots. At that time, there existed near a railway station at the outskirts of town, beyond a tall barbed-wire fence, a run-down group of snow covered shacks, where a small community of strangers came to live. I say live, but these men, women and children never stayed there for very long. They kept to themselves and were always being replaced so the townsfolk never really got to know any of them.

"Some people said they were a nomadic race who had been exiled from their country, refugees in search of a new homeland. Others said they were dangerous prisoners waiting for transportation to work camps. But the story I loved most and, if truth be told, most of us children wanted to believe, was that they were migrant farmers, here to harvest the chocolate crop.

"Chocolate, we were told, was a very delicate kind of fruit that grew in ancient orchards. These orchards were becoming fewer and farther between and it took a crew of specially trained workers, who were sworn to secrecy, to pick the rare delicacy off the trees. Being too fragile to be handled in the warmer months, it could only be picked in the dead of winter when it was in its most solid state. It was said that the children among them were their most valued workers, for only the smallest of hands could reach among the tangled branches.

"Beyond the edge of town," she continued, her voice quieter now yet somehow heavier, "not far from that train depot, stood a dark forest, so deep and dense that it was off-limits for any of us children to play in. Rumours abounded about what went on in that forest. Rumours that were sparked by the strange noises that escaped the thick foliage and drifted over to our quiet homes. I remember being told by a soldier that there was an ancient chocolate grove there and that the loud sharp sounds that reached us over the snow-laden fields were the echoes of the hard blocks of frozen chocolate as they hit the gatherers' baskets and that the cries and screams we heard were ones of joy as the farmers reaped their delicious bounty.

"Oh how we wished we could be part of that select group. Our own hands were small. Small and innocent. Small and innocent…"

Clara's grandmother's eyes filled with tears. Clara's mother's cheeks burned red as she watched Clara's face, reflected in the cold glass, as she eagerly looked out into the peaceful, silent night, hoping to catch a glimpse of the chocolate harvesters trekking through the deep, white snow.

Jackie looked squarely into my eyes. I know he did. His were dark, vacuous and glassy. I looked intently into one eye. It was almost impossible to see both of his at the same time. He could hardly rotate his silvery, slimy body around the bathtub filled with his girth and lots of water. It must have been so difficult swimming in that environment, he being more than two feet long and weighing forty pounds or so. I remember thinking "does anyone take a bath here during the week Jackie is swimming, and what about going to the toilet with those empty but alive eyes watching you?" I was visiting my grandparents' house. And in this large, old tub swam a carp. His name was Jackie. In fact, every carp that swam in this bathtub was named Jackie. Who invented that name I couldn't tell you, but it stuck.

I can see, but only in my imagination, my grandmother getting up at 5 a.m. and taking the bus and then the streetcar to the fish shop in Kensington Market. They lived midtown so this must have been quite a feat. This trek for a live fish happened only once a year in my family, just before Passover. How did my grandmother carry him home on the bus and streetcar? Perhaps in a metal pail with Jackie's tail flapping – thud, thud, thud. My grandparents never owned a car nor would they have asked for help.

"Janis, you're going to fall in, you're leaning over too far," said my bubbie. She adjusted her apron and smoothed it over her dress. "You're getting all wet, he's not a toy you're playing with, come and eat something. All of you, come and eat something."

My bubbie always wore a dress and an apron. She was always cooking or cleaning or moving around her house in a brisk manner. I think the apron gave her an air of authority.

My three younger, male cousins and I were all crowded into the bathroom watching. This was a ritual. Come and see Jackie and then come and eat Jackie a few days later at the seder, miraculously turned into gefilte fish, a form of fish patty made by combining carp, egg, matzah meal and spices.

"Let's play school," I would say. I would dangle my hand in the water and noticed how cold it felt. If I was in a daring mood I'd touch Jackie's spine, bony and foreign.

"Do we have to?" asked my older cousin. Much later he became a rabbi, a writer and a professor. I'm sure he put my early teaching methods to good use.

"Yes," I would say. Protesting was useless and they knew it. I was the oldest of them.

Earlier in the day we had played in the backyard vegetable patch of our grandparents' home. The tangy smell of cucumber plants and tomatoes was intoxicating. "Touch them again!" we would shout when one of us dared to put a finger on a prized tomato hoping it would dislodge itself. Sometimes we were lucky and we all shared the juicy, red flesh. By the time we left the garden our clothes were muddy and stained. I remember this because pedal pushers, a type of capri pant were very popular that spring. Mine were black and I had an orange and black matching top. I felt quite sophisticated in this outfit. Black was not usually worn by ten-year-olds in those days. This was the origin of my love of clothes.

"Have you been eating my tomatoes again?" asked our zaide in mocked anger as we trooped into his bungalow trekking our muddy shoes on the clean clean carpet. How did he know? Surely the red, sloppy, juicy fruit was inside us, not outside.

"So what is six times six?" I'd ask in my best teacher's voice. We got out the little blackboard and white, gritty chalk kept in one of the bedrooms. My four-year-old cousin was useless at this so I would glare at the eight- year-old - all good methodology for my later use.

A week later we all arrived in the evening for the seder meal. The delicious aroma of knishes greeted us and we all ended up in the kitchen inhaling deeply the fragrant smells. Many pots were bubbling on the stove – one filled with the joy of chicken soup, one with stock giving life to the matzah balls and one with tzimmes, a warm mixture of prunes and carrots and sweet potatoes merging together and tasting as sweet as toffee.

My bubbie had a clean apron on over her shirtwaist dress. "Eat, eat," she'd say. As an immigrant food, and especially the lack of food, was always on her mind. And she was the best cook I knew of foods destined to kill you at an early age – chicken soup with chicken eggs floating delicately on top, chopped liver, gefilte fish with fiery, red horseradish, knishes, kishke, kreplach, succulent chicken and tzimmes. These were hard names to pronounce, and hard to digest, but not then to my ten-year-old self.

We all were encouraged to sit around the old table made beautiful with a long, white cloth and the flame from the candles dancing in the silver trays. The seder plate took centre stage. My zadie's smiling, gentle face would start to recite the Hebrew words, so well known to him. Eventually, the dinner could be eaten, starting with the chicken soup.

"He has more chicken eggs than I do."

"No I don't," my cousin would say as he popped another one into his mouth.

"Not fair."

"Stop fighting," said one uncle as he moved to turn the television off. Another uncle, the youngest one, was determined to watch the Stanley Cup playoffs at the same time as the seder was happening.

The gefilte fish would then be brought in on large platters. Here sat Jackie, just in another form.

Our Mother's Beitel

Aviva Ravel

Our mother's beitel
was small, black, and frayed,
it snapped shut with a click.
She kept it tucked in her apron or in her black, frayed purse.
When it was swollen with pennies, nickels, dimes, or even a quarter or two,
we'd jump up and down and clamour:

"Chewing gum, candy,
a comic book,
an ice cream cone."
Then she put coins carefully into our sweaty palms with a smile and a song that followed us all the way to Irving's candy store.
Often her beitel collapsed like a punctured balloon, and when we clamored for
"Chewing gum, candy

a comic book,
an ice cream cone,"
a tear glistened on her cheek as she displayed
a few solitary coins.
"These we need for:
bread, potatoes,
a quarter pound of butter."
Then we sat on the stoop and I told my sisters about the magic golden beitel, no matter how many coins

you took out, it always remained full.
They believed my story
and went searching for it, but all they found was the small, black, frayed one, that snapped shut with a click,
in our mother's frayed black purse.

Did any of us have any qualms about eating Jackie? I don't know, it was never discussed, just thoroughly enjoyed. Much later I learned the process of making these fish patties. The carp would be killed by a heavy blow to the head. The head and bones were put in a pot with water and made into a stock. The flesh was mixed with egg, matzah meal and spices, formed into small round shapes and cooked in the stock. Many generations ago, the skin from the fish would be carefully peeled back and reserved. The cooked fish would be stuffed into the skin, hence the name gefilte which means stuffed. My grandmother didn't do this step but I always wonder which female in my past would have proudly presented her culinary skills in this way.

In the background hovered our grandmother, never sitting, always moving to get more food, the next course, the pop, (stuffing mouthfuls into herself, too busy to sit with us), making endless trips to the kitchen, breathless and happy to fulfill her destiny.

The starchy crinoline under my new dress was so annoying. But I was suffering for the sake of fashion. My mom, dad and brothers and I all wore our new clothes like badges of arrival. This too was a tradition – new clothes each year for the seder.

We would soon all pile into my dad's '58 Buick and make our way home, totally full and never questioning how bubbie killed Jackie for our consumption, never asked how many hours she must have worked to create all the food needed to feed all the relatives, never offered to help with the dishes because it was her kitchen and we would be trespassers.

A few years ago, I read about a wealthy business man who commissioned an artist to create a carp and bathtub sculpture for the lobby of his company. He never wanted to forget his roots. I understand.

Katia Didn't Eat Lunch Today

Katia didn't eat lunch yesterday either. It's not because she's dieting. It's not because she was too busy studying. And it's not because she forgot. Katia didn't eat because she couldn't afford lunch this week. Roughly, one in every four students at Na'amat's Hadera Technological High School goes to class hungry.

You can help youth in Israel overcome this hunger epidemic! Please give through Na'amat Canada and feed a hungry student this Passover.

Belief in God

Jennifer (Jinks) Hoffmann

I am asked if I believe in God? I say I believe in Maples which know how to bud at the end of a weary winter, in the impatience of the female swallow calling to her partner.
I say I believe in crocuses that push through eager soil, in young farmers who seed tomatoes in basements in Winter's waning days. I say
I believe in school-children who organize bake sales and who proudly announce they have raised one hundred and seven dollars to send to school-children in Haiti.
I say I believe in the mother who after a wretched night of almost no sleep, sings as she feeds her children breakfast. I say I believe in people who argue that there are two or more sides to the Middle East debacle and who cheer the woman who carries a Torah
to the Wall in Jerusalem.
I say I believe in heeding
our very lives as teachers:
our moments of unease,
our dreams, and our difficulties in relationships.
I say I believe in silence as well as music, in knowing that for some, silence is God while for others, God is the hallelujah reaching the heavens.
I say I believe in everything that anyone says is God, except, I say, if they harm others or themselves in God's name.
For I believe, I say, that if there is a God, that God would desire respect: for ourselves and for others.
I say I believe in love,
although, I say, sometimes people get mixed up about love.
Do I believe in God? I ask.
I say that I think the question is more than my mind can answer.
But our lives, I say, our lives can hold infinite clues to the answer.

Leap frog of infinity.
A child's game.
But a solid back,

My Kaddish

--In memory of Jacob Adler, z"l
By Pearl Adler Saban

I've never stopped saying Kaddish.
Not really.

That Aramaic prose-poem, with its rhythms and wordmusic whispers to me
And I whisper right back. Under my breath.
Yisgadal v'yiskadash
Shmai raba.

The prayer's magical pull enshrouds me in its holiness consoles me with its cadence.

From the women's side of the Great Divide
I quietly say the words.

A chorus surrounds me.
A proclamation. A refrain.
Back and forth.
Backandforth.

A well-orchestrated, very dignified liturgy whose words magnify God's majesty and the world He has created.
They beckon to the truth and desire for peace in this lifetime and for all days.

I yearned for peace for you in this lifetime.
I continue to yearn for peace for you for all days.
This is my Kaddish -- my spiritual hand-clasp for eternity.

I'm Rooting For You

Miriam Malowitzky

I'm rooting for you.
Yes you.
The one struggling to get out of bed
each morning.
The one forcing himself to put on Tefillin
because maybe, just maybe it will make some difference.
I'm rooting for you.
Yes you.
The one aching to be heard by someone who cares.
The one chastising herself for messing up
yet another time.
I'm rooting for you.
each and every one of you,
who somehow got caught in the net of destruction,
But who is trying slowly and steadily to become untangled.
Know. There is someone out there
Rooting for you.
Yes, you...

From slavery to freedom
Though not for all
The truth casts a pall
Over popular elation

How many matzah balls
Will Pollard's spoon carve?

Freedom is a ruse
If restricted for some
Whose liberty comes and goes
While inept leaders dither

Festive poignant melodies dance gently in the air
Rich with flavour to be savoured like a glass of fine red wine

Songs bud like spring flowers
They blossom in your soul
Set free once more to be reborn
Sweet dreams of long ago

Chanting niggunim from childhood
You lift your hands up high
Rejoice again with lost loved ones
Their voices now resound

You see your mother's loving face father's pride and sister's glance
The ones whose lives were stolen when time stood completely still

Your brother's laughter can be heard
You turn your head to listen now
Languish in your memories
Bring the past forward in time

They join with us and sing with us melodies that will not die
Songs of happiness and pain of hope and promise never gained

The Boy Who Could Fly

April Laufer

" Vayepach b'apav neshmat chaim…"
"And He blew into his nostrils the breath of life…" (Bereshit 2:7)
The word neshamah (soul) stems from the word neshimah (breath).

The thing about flying is, it is best not to think about it too much. A person can use up a tremendous amount of energy trying to understand what cannot be understood.

No matter how clever a person might be, no matter how many books they might read, some things can never be understood.

It is something that happened. End of story. But not quite of course. Not quite.

The ending. What might have been.

It was very important that he stop himself from thinking about what might have been. But sometimes…

Sometimes, when he least expected it, when his brain wandered and what if suddenly popped up, the story would come speeding out, no stop signs, no mile limits.

And then he was back at that moment. That moment that never ended.

That memory took away his breath every time. He knew many things that he tried very, very hard to forget, but of course, that was not possible.

That moment of flying was easily the moment in which his life had stopped. Except his heart was still beating. He was still breathing.

For him, life was always maybe or we'll see. And really, nobody ever blamed him. He knew that. But he was aware of their looks; their appraising gaze; the stare that lingered just that fraction too long; the one that told him that they knew that he had known how to fly. Once.

Nobody dared mention that.

But of course he did, mention it. Sometimes.

There were those occasions, those unexpected times that were not planned but just were, and then he did mention it and knew without bothering to look that others were gazing at him, over him, around him and really he could not dwell on that either.

Not today.

And yesterday, yesterday when all of it had happened, it was just about breathing, breathing in and breathing out, because if one did not just breathe, in and out, well, if someone stopped breathing, well that was dead wasn't it?

Wasn't he supposed to be dead?

Wasn't that the question that floated in his head in this oh well present-ness of I guess my life didn't quite end because I am still here, still breathing. And therefore…

He tried not to think of his flying. As in airborne. Without wings. Not like Icarus. Icarus, who had a father.

He had not known the story of Icarus and his wings that melted under the sun's hot glare. He had not heard that story. Not then. Not when he was just a six-year-old. Nor would he have believed it if he had been told that Greek myth of father-son.

That story did not exist for him. What existed for him was being all alone. No father. No mother. They were gone. They would not come back.

How did he know that?

So many mothers and fathers. Also sisters and brothers. Grandmothers, and grandfathers. Aunts and uncles. All gone. All gone. All gone.

Swallowed whole by a frenzy of death. But really and truly he did not know it then. He only knew later, much later, when after years and years and years of waiting, his mother, his father, they did not come back.

The woman who took him in was kind. He thought that is what he should think. He wasn't 100 per cent sure, but he hoped it was true.

She cried a lot and sometimes she seemed not to notice him. Except when she did and then she made sure to find him and feed him. And then she did not notice him again.

And it was OK. She was not his mother. He knew that she did not have to notice him. He did not expect the touch of her hand against his cheek. He did not expect his favourite meal. He did not expect the hug that wrapped him so that he felt safe and protected and just a little suffocated.

Flying. The sensation of moving up through the air, the ground below him. And if you are only six years old and you did not ever know that there was such a thing as a person flying, or that someday it might happen, then, after it happens, is it any surprise that you could hardly remember anything else?

In the air. And then back on the ground.

There was pain and numbness. There was anotherness. It was not him who had been flying in the air. Not him. Not the six-year-old boy, who knew too much, who had seen too much, who had more worries in his head than he could ever sort out. Not him.

He got up; he brushed himself off in a kind of numb awareness that he might possibly be hurt.

He had not understood what had happened, but when he took a breath he found that he was still breathing.

And never, never, never in a million years, or in six million moments, never would he understand why.

But still, there it was.

The Boy Who Could Fly

And that not knowing of the why of it was deep inside him his entire life.

No one to ask – the only person he would have trusted with this question was his mother – and she was gone. So what was the point of the why? What was ever the point of trying to understand?

And after all of the not understanding and the not thinking about flying, he was still breathing.

And that breathing, which he knew meant that he was alive, became all. Just like going to work became all; just like getting up in the morning. The moment was all.

To those who asked for his memories he could only answer, "I don't remember much. After all I was only six years old. I really don't remember." But then in the same breath, the breath that had told him he was still alive after flying through the air, in that very same breath he said, "I remember flying."

But of friends, school, his home, there was no memory. There was a curtain that remained shut on those memories. A curtain that would not be parted. Not a little, not even to peek.

The memory of everything, every tiny thing and every big thing and every in-between thing and not yet thing and thing that might have been or could have been or thing that would have been nice or thing that would have been wonderful or thing that brought a smile to his dimpled face. Every thing was gone. Taken from him.

Every day he worked so hard not to think about those things, those feelings, that knowing.

But still he knew. Inside him. In his heart that seemed to skip a beat if he dared to think of the things that were gone; in his legs that wanted to run away if he tried to remember the feelings that had vanished; in his head that became all blurry so that he could not focus on his breathing.

He had to focus. He had to remember that he was still breathing and therefore he was alive.

Six years old.

A time for silliness and fun and warm hugs and trying out new adventures and birthday surprises and becoming bigger and stronger and learning to do things by yourself.

Every year after that, every moment, and second and millisecond, become about breathing.

A cousin came and declared, "I will write a story for you. I will tell your story."

In a whispered voice he replied, "But I don't remember." What he might have said is "I don't want to remember." What he meant to say is "There is just too much pain to remember." And he listened to the sound of his breathing.

His memories? It was only a blink of the eye and he was there again.

His six-year-old self worrying about men in uniform marching through the town.

Coming to where he lived. Taking things. Taking mothers and fathers and sisters and brothers. They took things that were not theirs to take.

He worried about what food he was going to eat and where it might be found or if someone might actually offer food to him.

He worried about how he might find shelter at night so that he did not have to suffer from the cold.

He worried that the woman who took care of him might disappear one day too because she could be taken anytime, anywhere, even though it wasn't right to take things that didn't belong to you.

He knew that those men could do it, would do it because they had guns and they did what they wanted and took things.

Though he did not understand.

He worried whether the woman would continue to care for him but knew that this was something that neither she nor he would have any control over.

This was a little boy who knew that life and death were different sides of the coin. Knew that every day, every hour, every minute, it was one or the other.

That is why his smile, the innocence in that smile, the smile of the five-year-old before he knew the things he knew at six, was so remarkable.

That smile survived being six. That smile, with the deep dimples that appeared when there was something worth smiling about, that smile made him seem like everyone else, that smile believed the things that he knew and the things that he didn't know, the things that he had seen and the things that he would never see. That smile made those who gazed on him forget what they knew about him. Sometimes he pretended that he could forget what he knew too.

His story, sinewed to his bones.

He thought that he kept the story locked up and so he was always surprised at those occasions when the story took off, flying into the air around him, the bits and pieces of him remembering the moment. The story just sneaking past his lips, spoken out loud. But never in its entirety. That would break his heart. And there was the ache that he felt whenever he forgot to remember that it was only about breathing in and breathing out.

At age 70, the story has not faded. Not for him.

He remembers what was not. No birthdays, no presents, no friends, no laughing. No family.

The thing that he could not understand was that the world had turned itself upside down. And he had been caught in that. That is how he came to be flying. Airborne.

Which war was that? Which war was it that stole his childhood? Which conflict was it that placed him at the mercy of adults? Which took his parents from him when he was only just learning to tie his shoes? And which war never had an ending, no last chapter, because no one ever said this is where your parents were killed. This is their grave. This is their ending.

Wars don't have endings for six-year-old children who became orphans because adults have guns and boots. Boots that they use to kick a six-year-old child out of the truck because he takes up more room than is necessary or because someone is screaming please or because they like to see how their boots work.

When they kick a child and make him fly, is it like kicking a soccer ball?

The Package

Pearl Cojocaru

The warm, late summer afternoon was comfortably cool when Anita Bookbinder chose to trim the shrubs and hedges around her property. From the shed she retrieved her old clipping shears and the small wheelbarrow for collecting discarded twigs. Immersed in her task, Anita was startled as a courier swerved his bike to a sudden stop in front of her cottage, and pulled out a FedEx-encased package.

The messenger, perspiring and anxious to continue on with his deliveries, jostled from foot to foot, as he waited for the elderly Anita to initial his electronic clipboard. Swiftly mounting his bike, he raced off to his next destination, never looking back.

Receiving her first-ever FedEx parcel, and anxious to reveal its contents, Anita left her tools in the front yard under cover of some overgrowth. Back inside and seated on the plush sofa in her living room, Anita peeled open the adhesive plastic strip to reveal an unimpressive looking package wrapped in brown paper and tied with a double strand of twine. She wondered why anyone would bother to send it by special delivery. There was nothing to distinguish it from the numerous other packages daily passing through the regular postal system. Nevertheless, it was different – very different.

How unusual, thought Anita, peering through her reading glasses at the vintage paper and rough twine. Who sent this... is that German? Unable to further decipher the script, Anita pushed herself off the sofa. Taking the package with her, she searched for her large magnifying glass.

The German bomber, the Arado Ar 234 Blitz, pride of the Third Reich, thundered across the open air on a front line reconnaissance mission. Squinting skyward, Herr Jürgen Müller, postmaster (and sole postman) in the German town of Krüger, followed its path as it disappeared into the distance.

Herr Müller was a dedicated employee of die Deutsche Post AG. Neither Mother Nature's cold November days nor human nature's current mayhem would deter him from his duty-bound pledge to deliver the town's mail. Especially not now.

Some citizens of Krüger believed the situation would improve; the "troubles" would pass.

Herr Edgar Buchbinder, owner of the town's bookshop, did not share their optimism, and sent seven-year-old Ada to stay with "family friends."

There were others like him, cautious men and women. "We must save the children," they said, and sent them into hiding.

"Schnell!..." There was no time! Herr Buchbinder and the others quickly prepared packages, wrapped in butcher's brown paper and tied with twine – as that was all they had left. To the postmaster, they pleadingly entrusted their precious packages. "Schnell!... Raus!" And they were taken away...

With the coarse burlap sack slung over his shoulder, Herr Müller carefully descended the narrow steps to the cellar of his modest one-bedroom home, and proceeded to keep his word.

Years later, when the world was somewhat back to normal, Herr Müller retraced his steps down to the cellar. Finding the telltale spot he sought, Herr Müller used a crowbar to pry open the old floorboards... it was time.

As promised, the now retired postmaster transported the sack full of packages, left in his care in 1939, to Düsseldorf's main post office.

Great efforts were made to locate addressees. Eventually, most of the parcels were stamped "undeliverable," and remained stored in the "lost mail" centres on four of the world's continents. But not all... a handful were traced.

Rummaging through her crafts box, Anita found the magnifying glass among her partially completed embroidery projects. Carrying everything into the well-lit kitchen, she sat down at the formica grey, "cracked ice" patterned dinette table, and brought the lens up to the package.

Although faded, the writing on the wrapping paper was now sufficiently legible... it was indeed German:

Fräulein Ada Buchbinder...ins Ausland Verzogen 1950 – moved out of the country... die Deutsche Post AG – 1957. Bei Umzug Anschriftenbenachrichtigungskarte! - New address requested! If recipient has moved, send a change-of-address card!... Postfach 23447... America...

In disbelief, her eyes moistening and with trembling hands, Ada freed the twine – hastily tied 72 years earlier by her father – and opened the package.

Epilogue:

In Flatbush, Brooklyn, the driver double parked his brown UPS truck in the cul-de-sac. He rang the doorbell below the mezuzah.

In the London Borough of Camden, the mail carrier petted the barking dog as it came up to greet him, tail wagging. The door opened before he could knock.

Near Be'er Sheva, in the northern edge of the Negev Desert, the sabra children ran up to the postman's vehicle as he drove into the kibbutz.

God's Wonders

Lewis Lang

When skeptics say there is no God,
And others cast their doubt,
Their minds are sealed, and eyes are closed,
For proof lay all about.

When little David flung his stone,
T'was guided from above,
Which struck Goliath on his head,
He earned his people's love.

When the Israelites, in a foreign land,
Because enslaved by Pharaoh's hand,
God chose Moses, to lead the way,
Out of bondage and out of prey.

God blew his breath on Bitter Lake,
And split the water flow.
Which opened up a passage dry,
For Israelites to go.

When Daniel, thrown in a lion's den,
For hungry lions to eat,
God came down and calmed the lions.
Who lay down at his feet.

When the Temple lamp was lit,
With oil for just one day,
It lasted for another seven,
God's marvels to display.

When students pass through college gates,
And never see the light,
They miss out on an inner peace,
That puts their fears to flight.

Surviving Hell

Stanley Herbert Weisberg

As I sit in my soft sofa chair
Watching the blizzard outside
I try to imagine
How anyone could have survived
Those German Death Camps.
I do know others
Who could answer
"How did you survive Hell
With your sanity intact?"

I cannot ask
I lack the courage
To invade the private
Memories of horror
The guilt of survival
That those who were there
That those who Were witnesses
Have been forced
To live with.
God Bless them all.

Jerusalem Blue

Pearl Adler Saban

The clear blue sky reminds me of the stretched-out sea.
Not a cloud in sight to mar the beauty of it all.
It is techelet,
the same shade of blue dye woven into the clothing of the ancient High Priest, and in the tapestries of the Mishkan – and now solely in the tzitzit worn by man.

How does one wake every day in this jewel of a city to stare at such a sky and not feel humbled by this wondrous creation?

Techelet against Jerusalem stone.
Blue on white.

Will You?

Suzanne Reisler Litwin

Will you be there when the storm hits the shores of my life?

Will you hold me when the waves of pain crash upon my heart?

Will you be my happy boat in the sea of misery?

Will you wrap me in your strong muscled arms of life preservers?

Will you rock me to sleep with lullabies of soothing breath calms?

Will you wake with me to greet the new day of all my now different days?

Will you be my forever peace and love of the love I've lost at sea?

Will you?

The Family Portrait

Ariela Cohen

There was no turning back now. Who would have ever thought I'd return to this place on my own free will? My adrenaline surged as we drove down the country road in the small farming village of Kolkow in Poland. My mind wandered as I watched the wheat fields whiz by like flowing strands of golden hair highlighted against the backdrop of lush green forests. As we got closer, I began to recognize my surroundings and suddenly the farm appeared in my sightline. My heart pounded so hard I felt the pulsating throughout my extremities. I clutched my 13-year-old grandson's hand, as our guide stopped the car on the dirt road in front of the farm's rusted iron gate.

Fixated on the barn beyond the fence, I was amazed it was unaffected by the 50 years that had passed since I last laid eyes on it. It was as though time stood still. There was a small clothesline stretched across its side with three pairs of white underwear held in place by old pegs. I heard dogs barking, and saw a few chickens pecking and scratching at the ground in front of the barn. I couldn't imagine what they were looking for, there was nothing but dirt and sand all around, no sign of growth within 100 feet of the barn. I thought how hungry those birds must be, just as I once was.

My thoughts were interrupted as a middle-aged man and woman came out of the farmhouse toward the gate with welcoming smiles on their faces. I looked at the man and realized this must be Kajik, the son who was only a child when I last saw him. He was lean, Slavic-looking, with a strong resemblance to his father. He worked quickly to open the gate and I could see his broken, brown teeth and weathered face from the car as he waved to me. Although we were strangers, our connection was strong. After all, I owe his family my life and that of my sisters and mother. Knowing their impoverished conditions, I had been sending him care packages and money every year as a gesture of gratitude. To be honest I was a little shocked he had not used the money to better his living conditions.

I wanted to step out of the car, but my legs felt so heavy and it seemed like the soles of my shoes were glued to the rubber floor mats. Jordan, my grandson, gently shook my shoulder and asked, "Are you OK Saba?"

I hoped Jordan could not feel my trembling, as I took his hand. I suddenly had an overwhelming impulse to protect him from the terrors this place held for me when I was just his age.

I looked into his bright, blue eyes and lied to him. "Yes Jordan, I'm all right. Let's get out of the car and I will show you where your Saba hid from the Nazis for 26 months."

I stood in silence for a minute as this man, Kajik Stronczyk, continued to unlock the gate. I took a deep breath to calm myself down, but couldn't help thinking this was the same air I breathed in 1942 when my mother, two sisters and I were hidden by the Stronczyks in this ominous, dilapidated barn that stood like a weary monument before me.

Surveying the familiar surroundings, flashes of memories began flooding my mind. I saw an old rusty pail lying near the rock pile at the side of the barn and for a moment wondered if it could possibly be the same pail we used to empty our feces and urine every night in the trees just beyond where it lay.

Stronczyk walked over to the car with a huge smile on his face. With his arms outstretched he called out, "David Gold". We embraced. I could feel my breathing quicken as I was filled with mixed emotions.

On the one hand, I would not be standing here today if it were not for this man's father hiding us, however I cannot forget this was a business deal. For an exorbitant monthly payment he would provide us with food and shelter. After seven months, the money ran out, and suddenly so did our food. By then, it was too late to turn us out, as the Stronczyks risked being shot as well. So we survived in that tiny crawl space under the hayloft, cold and starving until the end of the war.

Stronczyk and I made our introductions, and he welcomed me once again to their home. He was clearly the head of the family now. I put my arm around Jordan's shoulders and guided him slowly towards the barn that served as our tomb for over 2 years. "Come, mayn zees kind, my sweet child, and I will tell you the story of how Saba survived the war."

Prologue to a novel in progress.

His office, a late light burning of the new university.

Poured concrete, sealed windows.
"An afterthought of Albert Speer," he quipped.

Around his neck he wore an ancient

He praised the Greek islands, women, ouzo, but the eyes that scanned your soul were those of a Talmudist.

He welcomed me,
a neophyte with manuscript in trembling hand and read my poems aloud, making them credible to my ear.

"Don't question your talent.
Can't you see you're blessed

Once, after discussing poetry

we sat in silence watching it flame into nothing

"I'm going home"
And perhaps he is for anywhere he goes is home to him with vacant mind

They shuffle as they walk, and stir and wait for dining room to open, or children to come.
and the children come,
Middle aged, successful, ones,
dragging discontent teens and ever teaching them to tend the aging.
"Honour thy father and thy mother"
Honour all who live and wait to die.
By virtue of their years alone, they have...
seniority on earth,
we honour them
and on until the grave.
and even then, we must remember
"Son, you are my Kaddish,"

Herb, Abe, Sam, Leo names that rang in marketplaces or poolrooms four to seven decades ago now ring in halls at Baycrest.

Characters, colourful in youth
And even more so now,
in their ungainly senility.
Laugh not, unless you cannot see yourself there too,
with the "children" on visiting days.

Watch the crumpled, emaciated, senseless form as her niece wheels her down the hall.
She lived and loved, gave birth, sat shivah
All too often, yet someone remains to honour her,
to push her through the halls.
It matters not anymore
if it is a niece or a volunteer.

She has a human hand in hers and someone cares.
This is my people's creed,
Carried all the way by Moses on that mount.
And so we honour them,
and build a home to house them all.
We watch the others and our loved ones mean much more to us.
We dwell in other people's problems with a philosophy of "Ours could be worse!"
And still we pray and praise
He who bade us honour them these ways.

Spicy Kneidlach Anyone?

Rachel Ornoy

"I am so excited, Ema. I decided to do the Rosh Hashanah dinner at our house."

I was talking on the phone to my mother in Israel. She murmured something which I think was "my daughter is meshuge (crazy)."

Raising her voice, she asked, "You just moved in May from Johannesburg, you hardly settled down. Why do you take upon yourself so much work? Go be a guest at somebody else's house."

"I hardly know anyone here. These three couples I met when I picked up the boys from the summer camp are also from Johannesburg and arrived only three months before us. They each rented a small townhouse while we rented a bungalow in the Bathurst Manor. We have a large recreation room in the basement with an adjacent kitchen. The owner left us a ping- pong table there which Yuval and Yoav play on all the time. It's this table that gave me the idea that I can accommodate the three couples and their five children. Don't worry I will manage."

To ensure that I would manage and have everything ready in time, I went on with my preparations. I like to prepare ahead of time. A few times in the past when I was not so organized, I had all kind of things happening that caused me lots of anxiety and stress of last minute preparations.

Once when I made a cake, it was stuck and refused to come out of the baking sheet and it was too late to bake another one.

It did remind me of a bake sale for the Hadassah organization in Johannesburg the previous year. A woman baked a cheesecake that was too soft and it caved in. She baked it a short while before her friend came to pick it up and bring it to the venue. She quickly took out the inside of the cake, stuffed it with paper tissues and covered it with the pieces she took out from the middle. Nicely smoothed out and with shavings of chocolate it looked great.

She planned to come to the venue and buy the cake and no one would be the wiser. When she arrived there, the cake was gone. "Yes," said the lady behind the counter. "The president, Susan, bought it and even paid more because her family loves cheesecake."

This poor woman, Hannah, had to go to the president's house and apologize and suffered the humiliation of all the members in her chapter smiling and sneering, even if they did not say anything. I was not going to follow her example of course.

Another time, I left the chicken on the table in the dining room while I prepared the gravy in the kitchen. When I heard some strange noises I went to explore and found my dog Bonnie with her front paws on the table, enjoying a piece of chicken. I always admired how she ate so carefully and elegantly from the plate, without pulling it off the table. In previous cases, it was only a leftover sandwich or a potato, so I scolded her but I was also a bit amused.

But not this time. This time, I was furious. Guests were coming in an hour and I didn't have chicken to serve.

I called the "fire brigade" to put out the fire – meaning my husband, Jack, who rushed to the store to buy a barbecue chicken. He was also the one who had to rush to the store to buy a cake to replace the one that stuck in the pan.

He was unhappy and I was unhappy, so I decided from now on to do everything ahead of time.

A week before Rosh Hashanah, I prepared different types of vegetable pies and put them in the freezer. Three days before the dinner, I had the chicken soup ready and an apple crumble pie. The guests were bringing salads and a Moroccan carrot side dish, so less for me to do. I left only the kneidlach to prepare the day of the dinner. To be soft and fluffy they are best done the day of.

I had enough nice dishes and cutlery that I brought from Johannesburg, but I had to settle for a sheet, white with small red flowers, as even two tablecloths together did not cover the whole table. The boys thought it was funny that their Ping-Pong table was becoming a dining table, but they helped me set it. I accepted their suggestion to buy red paper napkins to match the red flowers on the sheet. It was agreed that large white candles would look more respectable than red ones.

At 3 p.m., I double-checked that everything was ready. The table looked lovely with the black and white dishes, crystal wine glasses, red napkins and tall white candles. Because the ping-pong table was wide, I even made two small flower arrangements with red and white carnations, on each side of the table.

In the kitchen, the soup was on the stove, smelling of garlic and pepper. The gefilte fish, which I made smaller than usual because of the children, looked like ping-pong balls, and we laughed at how appropriate they would look on the table. The chicken and the brisket were almost cooked and waiting in the fridge for before moving to the oven to finish cooking.

My oldest son, Yuval, who has been my helper in the kitchen from the age of four, promised me that now that he had more than six years experience he could do the kneidlach by himself. He showed me the two Manischewitz boxes and the large bowl he was going to use. He ladled some soup into a smaller pot which he was going to cook the kneidlach in. I showed him the parsley, garlic and olive oil mixture that he could insert into each kneidlach. I tried it once before and everybody agreed that it added a lot of flavour.

Golan Landscape

Barbara S Davidson

The hills of the Golan
Slumber in silence amidst the trees;
Folded in their arms
What sacred secrets lie?
The echoes of generations long gone
Whisper in the breeze,
Whilst the Kinneret below
Reflects the clear, blue sky.
No sound is heard by those who pass;
Only the chirping of birds
Or the rustle of grass.
Hiding themselves in a veil of mystery,
The hills will not reveal their history.
They have felt the crush of marching feet;
Have heard the battle cry of warriors from the past;
But the invaders' victories were bitter-sweet;
Their short-lived triumphs did not last.
And still the waters of Kinneret flow
Unruffled and calm;
Its shores have seen much suffering and pain;
But time has healed, like a soothing balm.
The hills are peaceful once again.

Spicy Kneidlach Anyone?

I went to lie down and was pleased when I came back to the kitchen to see the kneidlach lying on the plate ready to be cooked.

The guests arrived bringing salads, bottles of wine and boxes of chocolate. The kids brought lots of noise and laughter.

Our friend Sharon, who was a teacher at the Jewish school King David in Johannesburg, brought a booklet they used there, which had a few blessings and also songs in Hebrew and English. She brought copies for each of us and suggested to have a singing period after the main course.

It was such a wonderful beginning to the evening when we all sat down and raised our glasses to health and success in the new country. My husband, Jack, did the blessing on the challah and the apple and honey.

Rosie, the cute four-year-old, insisted on singing a new song she learned just before they left Johannesburg. She stood on the chair and sang with her sweet voice and received a standing ovation from all of us.

Yuval and Yoav, who were six years old at the time, were the assistant waiters and served the gefilte fish. They also brought bowls with soup croutons while I served the hot soup and the kneidlach.

"Do you know who made these fluffy kneidlach?" I asked. "Can you believe it – Yuval did it all by himself while I was resting." Yuval smiled happily while everyone made noises of appreciation.

"Eat the soup while it's hot," I encouraged everyone.

"What a tantalizing smell" said Sharon, who always used nice words.

"This is good soup" said Jonah while his mother blew on each spoonful before he put it in his mouth.

Now we were all seated and I looked around with satisfaction. This was such a nice way to celebrate our first Rosh Hashanah in Toronto.

And then it happened! What a commotion!

All I heard was shouting and a loud bang. Morris, who was last to receive his soup, jumped high enough to cause his chair to fall over. He spat out a big piece of kneidel and it rolled on the table with a large spray of soup. His face was red and he yelled, "What is this… what is this?"

Jonah who had just tried his first kneidel started crying and rubbing his tongue.

For a second there was silence. Only the screaming and the swearing could be heard. More chairs were screeching and I stood up to see what had happened

"What did you put in the kneidlach?" shouted Morris. "Did you put wasabi? Who puts wasabi in kneidlach? It's not sushi." He reached for the water carafe and started drinking one glass after the other.

I stood there frozen. "Wasabi? What is wasabi? I did not put anything in my kneidlach." Then it dawned on me and I turned to look at Yuval who was sitting quietly to my right. I touched his shoulder and said, "Come with me to the kitchen."

There he explained that after a bit of thinking he concluded that maybe it was the "green stuff" in the fridge that was so spicy.

"What green stuff?" I asked bewildered.

"There was not enough of the parsley mixture for all the kneidlach so I found this green stuff in the fridge which looked quite similar to the parsley so I stuffed it in the last two kneidlach."

I looked in the fridge and there was the half empty container of schug. It is extremely spicy "green stuff" that my Moroccan friend gave me. It should be added in tiny quantities.

I laughed until tears rolled down my cheeks. Yuval was confused but relieved that I was laughing.

He was a good sport and went back to the room and told his story. Morris glared at him and did not talk for the next hour, which gave his wife more time to participate in the conversation. Other people laughed and asked Yuval if there was any other food he prepared so they should watch out for it.

It was close to midnight when every one left.

"What an evening" said Yuval. His father hit him lightly on his shoulder. "And you contributed quite a lot to it." We all laughed.

We never made that mistake again. Yuval glued the symbol of poison on each jar of schug that was in our fridge from that day on.

Oseh Shalom

Jennifer (Jinks) Hoffmann

Oseh Shalom, bi-me-ro-mav hoo ya-aseh shalom aleynu…
May the One who grants peace in the Heavens,
grant peace to all of us.
This refrain, found many times, in the Hebrew liturgy of my people,
has been echoing,
in that still, small place within,
almost incessantly
in these troubled days.
I learn in my study of mysticism, how God sometimes prays the prayers in us.
My God, we pray for peace. We weep.
Are You praying and weeping too?

Pratt Park

Maurice Krystal

Tomorrow is my wedding day and my bride-to-be is advising me on what tie to wear.

"The dark brown," she says holding up two ties to the light streaming through our living room. "Goes well with the suit. But in the morning I think the yellow and beige one gives better contrast for the photos."

Tomorrow will be a busy day. There are photos in the early morning at Pratt Park, an afternoon wedding and banquet at the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue and a party at a friend's house in the evening. I keep telling myself I will make it through this weekend.

I tell her, after a kiss, that she is right about the ties.

"Don't just follow what I suggest. You have to want to do it. I want a husband who's an adult with a mind of his own. I don't need a shadow."

I smile.

Of all the places for a photo shoot she picks Pratt Park. I could have spoken up weeks ago saying I preferred a thousand other places, but then she would ask why and unwanted memories would come flooding back.

My friend Nathan lived a few streets away from Pratt Park and I often biked to his house. When the weather was decent we spent Sundays tossing a baseball or kicking a soccer ball back and forth. We purposely kept our distance from the artificial pond in the middle of the park where the ducks swam and ate the breadcrumbs passersby feed them. Sometimes the older boys would take our soccer ball and tease us into a game of Monkey in the Middle. When they got bored, they kicked the ball in the water. They would laugh and after a dozen times, we got used to it and didn't put up much resistance. It became part of the outing and the ball would eventually float to the area where the water drained. We had to use a tree branch to retrieve it. The worst part was cleaning the greenish scum off the ball.

One afternoon, as I was struggling at the water's edge, trying to get the ball back, I heard a girl say, "I think it's terrible what those boys just did."

I turned around and saw four girls our age, around 13, standing on the path near us. The girl who spoke was a slim redhead with a complexion that looked like my mother's fragile porcelain tea set. She smiled as she came closer and took some tissues from her pocket to wipe the ball. The other three held back. Our fingers lightly touched. She smiled and I was close enough to see the faint blue lines of veins at her temples. I knew my father was disappointed. Sometimes the rabbi would catch some of us playing street hockey after school and tried to recruit us for an evening minyan.

"I didn't have my bar yet!"

"Don't give me that Issie Fishman. You think I have lost my memory?"

We marched in line, leaving our hockey sticks at the door, so prayers could begin when 10 male adults were present.

We met again a week later and in the few minutes we had together. I learned what school she went to and about her love of Israeli dancing. I told her I would be back here next Sunday at the same time. We were reading Romeo and Juliet in English class. Families that didn't talk, maybe even hated each other. Somehow I identified.

"Why aren't you angry at them?" she softly asked.

All I could do was shrug my shoulders. I was mesmerized by her green eyes. I knew from her clothes that she was part of the ultra-Orthodox Jewish community. I think I grinned and she backed away to join her friends. She followed them away but soon turned and waved me a shy goodbye.

More chassidic and Lubavitch families were moving into the area every year, and on Sundays, they strolled along the paths that circled the lake. Some of the boys my age looked like half-grown men, dressed in black. Many of them seemed to be running or walking quickly somewhere. They had purpose and didn't waste time. They wore their hats and kippahs, and their fringes and forelocks always seemed to flutter in their wake.

The girls tended to walk in large groups, I assumed for protection of some sort. They wore long skirts that reached their ankles, and their arms and heads were always covered, even on the hottest of days. I felt sorry for them. They never made eye contact, even when we approached each other on the narrow paths. They reminded me of the horses that pulled the milk wagons with eyes that could only look ahead and not be distracted by life around them. They had goals, while Nathan and I aimlessly kicked a ball back and forth for hours. Part of me envied their commitment to their faith. Another part of me pitied their inability to relax and have fun.

We met at virtually the same spot two weeks later when, once again, Nathan and I were fishing out the soccer ball. Nathan tapped my shoulder and I turned to see her moving away from a half dozen other girls. I did not know if any were the same as last time.

"Hi Job. Still saving drowning soccer balls?"

Her voice sang like a bird. I was once again awestruck.

"My name is Maurice, not Job," I finally croaked.

"Ah, but you have the patience of Job."

One of her friends spoke to her in Yiddish. I heard her say Shaina. They seemed impatient to move on. She held up one finger towards them.

"Is your name Shaina?" I asked.

"You understand Yiddish? Are you Jewish?"

"Yes but not as devout as you."

She grinned.

"Don't put yourself down. Job was more righteous than almost anyone."

With that pronouncement, she skipped after her departing friends.

I'd had my bar mitzvah six months ago and stopped going to synagogue.

I didn't see her though I kept going to the park, even alone, when Nathan couldn't join me. Weeks went by. I doubted if I would see her again. Someone must have squealed on her. She probably wasn't allowed to talk to people like me. I wondered if I should start attending our synagogue again. I felt I wasn't worthy.

It was a rainy Sunday. Summer was over and I was back in school. The park was empty and yellow and orange leaves were falling from the trees. I walked, kicking wet leaves, looking for something. I wasn't sure what, but I felt empty. Was I in love with a girl I barely exchanged a dozen sentences with?

I was by the pond and the ducks came close expecting a handout. The sun peeked out from behind a cloud. A young duck boldly left the water and waddled towards me, quacking away. I wished I had something to offer. Then I saw someone approaching on the other side of the lake under a large black umbrella. The umbrella lowered and Shaina waved from the other side.

"Job, it's good to see you."

Somehow I was not surprised. We ran towards the north end of the lake. She jumped into my arms as we met.

"Good to see you Juliet."

"Oh, and you're Romeo I presume."

We were still holding each other. She was cold. Her thin body trembled under her coat.

"I have been waiting for you here for months," I whispered.

"I wish I could have come. My family is upset with me. I don't have your freedom."

We walked around the lake over and over, under her umbrella, holding hands and talking non-stop. I had found my voice. We parted with a kiss. It was gentle and timid, just as I imagined Romeo and Juliet must have kissed hundreds of years ago. And then I watched her get smaller as she ran up the path toward Van Horne.

In October my trek to Pratt Park was part of my Sunday pilgrimage. She did not reappear. I sometimes saw a gaggle of religious girls walking together. I couldn't tell if they were some of Shaina's friends. They looked so alike, like young nuns in identical habits. There was a wall and I couldn't approach them.

In late November, Nathan sat next to me in the lunchroom with surprising news.

"I thought you would be interested in something I heard about that red-headed religious girl we met at Pratt Park."

I almost dropped my sandwich.

"You mean Shaina?

"Yah, Shaina Rosenbloom. My cousin teaches in the school she was attending."

"Was attending? What happened?"

"Seems like the family sent her to New York. She's promised to someone there."

"Promised! You mean to get married?" My voice was loud and others at the long table looked at us. "She's only 14, how can she be married?"

"They will wait until she's 18, but in the meantime they are keeping her out of trouble."

"Am I the trouble? Is it because of me she was taken away?"

"I don't even think they knew about you. She was a rebel and her school had no experience dealing with such a free spirit. Her parents are quite elderly. She is the youngest of 12 children and the eldest sisters sort of raised her, especially after the father began showing signs of dementia a few years ago. This is how that community protects their own. They are a tight-knit but closed entity. Freedom of choice for such girls is never an option."

After a long period of silence, all I could say was I liked her.

"Yes I know," Nathan said. "I know you kept going to the park alone. I wanted to tell you that you were chasing something impossible, but I didn't want to hurt your feelings."

We stood next to the yellow lilies and orange snapdragons growing in clumps around the lake. At 7:30 on a sunny Sunday morning we had Pratt Park all to ourselves. The photographer kept giving orders on how to stand, how to tilt our heads, and what to look at. He grimaced and said something I couldn't catch.

"What did he say?" I asked my future bride.

She looked at me intently.

"He said you don't look happy. He says you should pretend and to try smiling."

After the Fire (to the forests of the Carmel)

Marina Mashaal

My body felt like a tree falling to its wings, and rising.
I became bark upon bark,
my limbs all wind-blown muscle,
each like a twig, a radius knot.
I found knots done.
I found some undone,
others as if made not to be undone
for the Angel climbing the ladder.
My fingers like leaves at points of Reckoning shimmered.
My belly spoke like a wheel.
My ears listened to this chatter with sun.
I felt my light catch the wind and touch Stillness
as I made of the earth a prism of seed with a prayer I can sing by.

Ha-Yarden (The Jordan River)

Marina Mashaal

I have learned from the star that only an inner explosion allows it to shine.

I have learned from the ocean that water must flow around the obstacles it encounters less resistance mean destruction.

I have learned from the skies to accept without complaint the clouds that hinder the way for the clouds are like stones on a path through the mountains.

I have learned from the river
no matter its storybook of ripples that the strongest sword in the world cannot scar its surface.

I have learned from the moon
just as I do from the river to never forget its one objective:
to move is to light one's way to the sea.

So fragile at its Source, moon, like water, like star,
and like cloud,
gradually gathers the strength of the others bursts of star river
it encounters,

and after a certain point,
its power, just like Love,
is absolute.

Remember Israel

Pearl Laufer

I ran to the sea when I first stepped off the plane
To feel the water surround my feet
And get caught up in the mood again.

The memories cannot be erased
The fairy tale is real
The joy and sadness that I felt
I will always feel.

I've just come back and so you see
It is now the third time for me
A little has changed, after all it's been a while
But I still remember fondly, sometimes with sadness, sometimes with a smile.

One thing though has not changed
And that's the way I feel
I loved it then, I love it now
And love it I always will.

It's secure being back in stable civilized Toronto
But I still have the Israeli Mediterranean Sea pounding somewhere in my heart.

To The Holocaust Survivors

Felicity Mat

When you were feeling that your life was hanging by a thread
Which was about to be cut at any moment
Depending on the will of the torturer the circumstances and destiny...
When you were witnessing the Nazis' cruelty and their unheard of methods of genocide
The injustice, the terrorism and the awful humiliation...
No room was left anymore for ignorance for joy and optimism
For objection, for anger for indignation and disobedience...
No place was ever left anywhere for dignity, nobility and success
Nor even for revenge, resistance escape or supremacy...
Room was left only for silence, tolerance, adjustment patience and persistence
With a soul in awe
in horror and hopelessness...
And when you started feeling that your moral strength was weakening,
Your courage was not deserting you, you clenched your teeth and your strength was returned...
Because you wanted to live and to manifest
That injustice must not be forgotten and that evil must be crushed down!
And though still the dreadful memories
mingle with your life,
Overwhelmed by a broken heart
And without illusions,
You are and always will be,
the Heroes of pain!
the Conquerors of time!
And all of us said together:
"NEVER AGAIN!"

The Ice Cream Stand

Rachel Piuti

It was the beginning of May. The last of the snow was gone for some time. Here and there bits of grass were poking out their green shoots from the hard, brown earth. Some thicker clumps of grass were growing in the street close to the walls of the houses and fences where the earth was less trodden upon.

Joseph and his family were assembling a wooden stand in front of a building that was part of our property. My father had allowed them to use it during the summer for a number of years. I watched as the sticks, boards and some iron bars assumed the shape of a structure with a table and shelves and a canvas roof that, Joseph explained, could be folded and unfolded against rain or too much sun.

Pessa, his wife, was very obese and I wondered how she could move around at all. They had two daughters, Sally and Pola. Sally wasn't there that day, but I met Pola. She was tall and heavy, not really obese but strongly built, like a tree. Her legs were heavy; they were very straight and looked like two logs. Pola was only 12 years old but she had to work. There was also a boy, the youngest child, named Pelte. He was skinny, his legs like sticks. His shoes had no laces, and seemed much too big for him; they kept sliding off his heels. His nose was constantly running and he kept wiping it with his sleeve. He had many duties around the stall: he took away the garbage and ran all sorts of errands.

A few days later the stall was ready for business. Some apples and pears were displayed on the table, but this was still last year's crop. The great attraction was the four large cans of ice cream surrounded by ice in the cooler: vanilla, chocolate, orange and lemon. Children stood in line after school, each holding five groshy in a tight fist. Their faces eager and tense at the same time: how to decide which flavour to chose. Each gave up his coin and stood watching with beating heart as his cone was filled by the fat, generous Pessa. Finally, a lick. What delight.

Workers coming out from the factories bought bottles of lemonades or orange drinks. They opened the wired bottle tops to the hissing sound of escaping gas. The drink overflowed on their hands. They raised the bottle fast to their lips. How good it was, how cool, how sweet. Summer would be here soon.

Joseph, Pessa, Pola and Pelte worked all summer from morning till night putting out the merchandise in the morning, serving customers all day, churning ice cream, taking everything in for the night. The stall was overflowing with delicious seasonal fruit; pears, plums, blueberries, strawberries. Baskets of carrots, lettuce, potatoes, radishes, green onions, yellow onions all stood on the ground. The stall gave the street a festive look by day. When night came and the family took everything in, the place looked sad and abandoned.

The family lived in two rooms on the second floor of a building across the road. All the merchandise that hadn't been sold during the day had to be stored for the night in their tiny apartment. Pessa, Pola and Sally prepared the evening meal from the potatoes, carrots and other vegetables that weren't fit to be sold the next day. The same with the fruit. They couldn't afford to eat produce that they could sell. For all their hard work their profit was very small and their earnings were only seasonal. Joseph was a sickly man unable to hold a steady job. Seventeen-year-old Sally was the only one in the family who had a steady job. She worked for a dressmaker and brought home her wage. Her mother allotted her some money for clothes and cosmetics because she needed to be presentable at work. Sally had brown wavy hair, soft black eyes set in an oval face with a silky ivory complexion. She was slim and had lovely legs. She was engaged to a very handsome young man who worked as a mechanic. They were hoping to accumulate some money and get married. It didn't look like it would happen soon. In the meantime they were going out together every evening, Sally wore a green fitted suit with a white blouse and black pumps. Her fiance wore a grey suit, a white shirt and black and white shoes. They always wore the same outfits. They simply didn't have anything else. When they came out into the street they looked like the most handsome and happiest couple.

On Saturdays and Sundays the stall stood empty and the family was transformed. The parents went to Shul on Saturday. They walked slowly and greeted neighbours with a smile. Joseph wore a dark suit, the same that he wore on his wedding day. Pessa waddled along beside him in a print dress with a blue silk shawl thrown over her shoulders. Pola and Pelte stayed behind and played in the street with other children. Pola looked neat in a navy skirt and a white blouse, Pelte wore shoes that fitted and his nose wasn't running.

What Is Chutzpah?

Masha Rutitsky

It is one simple question with many Jewish answers.

What is chutzpah?

It is when you survive in childhood beyond family's expectations, in the post World War II Soviet Union, amid destruction, hunger and hardships.

What is chutzpah?

It is when you grow up behind the Iron Curtain, being called "dirty Jew", but stubbornly dream about living in the sunny Jewish State called Israel.

What is chutzpah?

It is when, after the 1972 Munich massacre of the Israeli Olympic team, you come to work one morning and blurt out to your co-worker, a known wife of the KGB officer, that the athletes were murdered with the Soviet made Kalashnikovs. Then, you wait with fear what happens to you.

What is chutzpah?

It is when you apply for an emigration visa in the early '70s to go to Israel, and are invited to OVIR for questioning. You look the KGB officer straight in the eye (hiding your fears), and play naïve and stupid when answering his threatening questions. All you want from him is to let you go, to give you a ticket to freedom. And eventually he does!

What is chutzpah?

It is when you are new in Canada, divorced, penniless, raising young child, and go to the job interview for the position that you had never done before in your life. You believe you have no chance but you still ask the question: "What in this job is so complicated that I cannot learn and perform?"

And you get it right there, on the spot!

What is chutzpah?

It is when you meet (through friends) a man and are attracted to him, and think that you might be good for each other. So, during the conversation, you ask him a straight question if he would like to spend his life with you. And the answer is – yes, he would. And he still does.

What is chutzpah?

It is when your family friend is a cancer patient and the doctors give him less than a month to survive, and you decide to help him cheat the death and try to save his life.

How can you do it? How can you convince a person who is sick and exhausted of the hospital staying and is ready to die at home?

You trick him into believing that he is going into a rehabilitation centre for recovery treatments. And he agrees! Yes, out of desperation, you go to the top authorities to make arrangements for saving a human life. You place him into the hospital which is extremely hard to get into. And God is probably a partner in this joined venture.

After several blood transfusions and proper treatments the doctors at the hospital give him a gift of life-a second chance.

And it works! And he lives! Normal life for over a year now!

Is it not a chutzpah to defy the doctors' verdict and see the wonderful results?

What is chutzpah?

It is when you fall sick, and are not in the capacity to be as active and sociable as before, you still do not surrender.

You open the door to the world of poetry and imagination, dare to start writing your own and think that it is good!

What is chutzpah?

It is when you love life with all your heart and have guts to fight for all your goals and for all that is dear to you!

And it pays to do so!

Vashti - Banished...or Vanished?

Lorynne Schreiber

How dare he? Vashti thought. He knows I'm with the ladies. We're occupied. Why is that drunken fool calling for me?

"Come quickly and wear your crown."

Ha, it's not me he wants to parade around; it's my crown he wants to show off. He wants the whole kingdom to see how rich he is. He's not interested in me at all, just my money.

He's only king because he married me. And he only married me because I was forced into it. How could he think I love him? Love him? I loathe him. His father killed my father and then kidnapped me and forced me to marry this good for nothing, can't get a job on his own, never worked a day in his life, sot.

Everyone knows I'm the queen, I'm the royal one, the rightful ruler of Babylon. Without me, Hashi would still be a poor stable boy smelling like horse dung. Come to think of it, he's not poor anymore, but he still smells like horse dung. Nasty liquor breath. Drunk all the time. Party, party, party. That's all he does, all day, every day. I can't stand to have him near me. The sight of his red puffy face makes me want to retch, and the thought of those filthy hands touching me makes my skin crawl. Who knows where they've been!

He thinks I don't see those harlots sneaking out, but I do. Every night a different woman. Never enough for him. And here I am, lovely as can be. Everyone says so. That wretched Persian is a disgrace to everything Babylonian. Can't even think for himself. It's a joke. His eunuchs make all the decisions. He's too drunk to think straight.

Well, I've had enough, enough I say. No more of this "beck and call" crap. I won't have it. I just won't. He wants to see my crown, he'll just have to come here to see it. I'll show him my crown all right. I'm a lady, not some hooker who does the King's bidding. No one tells Vashti what to do! I'm staying right here at my party. I'm not leaving till I'm good and ready. And then I'm leaving for good and I'm taking my crown with me!

We wish all our customers a Happy & Healthy Passover!

The Boy Who Hated Potato Latkes

Mark Binder

It was Chanukah, and we were making latkes. They are so good! We were having latkes for dinner. That's all we had. We just had lots and lots of latkes. It was an oil fest. We went through three gallons that night. There were a lot of people.

Everybody was having latkes, except my son, Max.

Max doesn't like food that has flavour. He doesn't like to have sauce on his spaghetti. He doesn't like to have ketchup on his french fries. When I make pizza, and I make a really good pizza, I have to make a special one for him without any sauce or cheese. Some people call that bread.

He wasn't eating the latkes, and there was nothing else to eat except sour cream and applesauce, and those both have too much flavour.

But I'm the Dad, right? And you know how Dads can be. I took a small piece of a latke, about the size of a caterpillar, and I put it on his plate.

He looked at it and said, "What's that?"

"It's a latke," I answered.

"I know it's a latke," he said. "But what is it doing on my plate?"

I told him, "It's resting there on its way to your mouth."

He nudged it with his finger. "I'm not going to eat it."

"Yes you are," I said.

"No I'm not," he replied.

"Yes," I insisted, "you are."

"No," he crossed his arms, "I'm not."

Ever have this sort of conversation at home? It doesn't go well. We went back and forth for a while until he stomped his feet and said, "I'm not going to eat it and you can't make me."

"Max," I said, shaking my head, "I can make you eat it."

"Yeah?" His eyes were wide. "And I can call child services!"

I glared at my son. By now, everybody was watching. My mom and dad were watching me parenting my kid, and it wasn't going well. It's a script that every parent has gone through, but I didn't know that at the time.

"Max," I said, "you're going to eat that latke, or else!"

He stared me down. "Or else what?"

"Or else no dessert!"

His answer was inevitable. "What's for dessert?"

"Sufganiyot – jelly doughnuts, and chocolate gelt coins!"

"I don't care. I don't want dessert anyway."

Now what? I was stumped. And then I decided to make a stand.

"Max," I told him, "if you don't eat that latke, you're not going to have dessert for a really, really, really long time."

"How long?"

"Until you're 13 years old!"

"What?"

He was six. His bar mitzvah was seven years away.

"That's right," I told him, "no dessert until you're 13, unless you eat that really little piece of latke."

He frowned at me. "You're mean."

I wanted to pull a huge demonic face and laugh, but I didn't dare. Instead I said, "No, listen, Max. You like french fries, you like fried foods, you like potatoes, you like salt and you like grease! That's all it is."

The Boy Who Hated Potato Latkes

He started whimpering. "I don't care. I'm not going to eat it and you can't make me – so there."

By now, everyone else was clearing the dishes.

"Fine," I said, "no jelly doughnuts. No chocolate gelt. No chocolate cake. No ice cream. No chocolate chip cookies. No Christmas cookies, no Kwanzaa cookies, no hot chocolate. No fruit roll ups!"

He informed me that, "Fruit roll ups aren't dessert!"

"Read the label, kid. You're not getting anything with sugar unti you're 13 years old."

He looked so sad. He looked like he was going to cry.

We sat there for a long time.

He finally said, "Dad?"

"What?" I grunted.

"I've got an idea."

"What?"

He said in a quiet voice, "What if I lost TV?"

I stared at him. "You want to lose TV and dessert? You're going to be the smartest and healthiest kid in your school."

"No no no!" he said. "What if instead of losing dessert, I lost TV?"

"You'll eat it?" I asked.

"Yeah." He nodded.

"Okay," I said. I'd been wondering how this was going to turn out, and I figured that this was a way both of us could win. Sort of.

"Max, if you don't eat that latke, you're going to lose all TV and video games until you're 13!"

He gasped. "What about dessert?"

"You can have dessert," I said.

[Trevor Miller Illustration]

"Okay," he said.

He picked it up with his fingers. I was not going to make a big deal about him not using a fork at this point. He put it in his mouth.

"Dad," he said through clenched teeth, "can I go to the bathroom, please?"

"No, Max." I shook my head. "Chew it up."

"Awww," he moaned.

He started to chew and his face began to contort. It twisted and bent. It frowned and grimaced. I saw flickers of revulsion, distaste and nausea.

He groaned and moaned and gagged. His eyes fluttered closed and then opened up, rolling back in his head as if he was about to have a seizure. His chewing was tiny and tentative and prolonged the entire agonizing experience.

"No faces, Max," I said.

He froze for a moment, and then, like a queasy squirrel began gnawing at the speck of latke left in his mouth.

At last he swallowed, shuddered, gasped, feigned vomiting, wiped his tongue on his napkin, reached for a glass of water, chugged it down, and slammed it on the table.

"Now can I have dessert?"

"Wait a second," I said. "How was it?"

"Not bad," he said. Then he shouted, "I DON'T WANT ANY MORE."

I laughed and said, "OK. Fine."

So he had his jelly doughnuts and his chocolate gelt.

And to this day, he refuses to have latkes.

Happy Passover

Matzah and Breadfruit

Anna Gersman

The tiny advertisement consists of a Star of David and underneath it a sentence: "Anyone wanting to attend a Passover seder call Bernie, 46-3940."

We are living the free spirit life on our sailboat in the Caribbean. My husband points to the ad buried at the back of The Liming Times, the weekly paper that announced upcoming events. It took us awhile to figure out liming is West Indian for "hanging out."

"I'm going to call him," Syd says.

"Really? Are you sure?" I feel a quiver of fear. I wasn't Jewish. I knew nothing of Jewish life. I was outside the circle of knowledge, ignorant of the customs and traditions. I could feel the barriers, the wall, the exclusion from the inner circle.

"Yeah sure, it'll be fun," he says.

I grit my teeth.

So here I am balancing a cake in one hand and helping my two-year- old out of our old Toyota Tercel. We're parked in a line of cars on a road high above Cane Garden Bay in the British Virgin Islands. A thick tangle of tropical jungle falls away obscuring the hairpin bends that zigzag up the mountain side. We can hear car engines screaming below us.

"Is it a party, daddy?" our daughter Ariel asks.

"It's better than a party, it's a seder," he tells her with a smile.

"What's that?" She asks.

"It's an old story. You'll see," he says. "It's fun."

I decide to relax and take my cue from her. She is excited and all set to make new friends. After all, most of us are strangers new to the island. We have been living here for the last year since our arrival from South Africa. We follow a stream of people along the road to the front door carrying bowls, trays and Tupperware containers. The house is a stone bungalow set into the mountain side. A vibrant purple bougainvillea grows up over the entrance. Inside the foyer it's cool and everyone is drawn across the large main room to the view. The sun is setting over distant islands that are deep indigo. Slivers of white sandy beaches glow against a sapphire sea.

I leave Syd and Ariel and head for the kitchen with the cake I brought. The kitchen is crowded with women reaching into cupboards, rummaging through drawers, stirring pots on the stove, and ladling food onto platters. I shrink back against the wall as a woman flies past with a huge stack of soup bowls.

"Hi, I'm Stephanie," she smiles at me. I stick out my hand and she juggles the dishes to give it a little squeeze.

"I brought a cake, where should I put it?"

"Oh just stick it on the counter if you can find a spot. Wow how did you find matzah meal?" she asks over her shoulder as she heads out into the main room.

Oh no, I think. Is this the wrong kind of cake? Syd told me Bernie asked for a sponge cake so I made one. Now I panic. I want to hide it, or ask someone quickly about what kind of cake this should be. I better admit my guilt, but before I can open my mouth, someone grabs it. I watch my sponge cake whip away into the chaotic frenzy of the kitchen. I feel sick. I don't understand Passover rules – kosher or not.

A white-haired woman in a full apron stands in the middle of the kitchen answering the endless stream of questions from the women crowding in to help. "Where are the pots and the cutlery? Have you got a big knife?"

This must be our hostess, Mrs. Nusinowitz. Her husband died recently and when she saw Bernie's ad, she offered her beautiful mountaintop home as the venue.

"Have you got paper plates?" someone asks her.

"I won't use paper," she yells out in a strong eastern European accent.

"Oh God," a woman beside me moans quietly. "We'll be here all night washing dishes." She rolls her eyes dramatically and opens a cupboard to find more china plates. A bearded man comes into the kitchen.

"Oh my God," he says. Is that chicken soup?"

"Yes, Bernie," says Mrs. Nusinowitz. "That's my contribution."

"Are those matzah balls?" he asks giving her a big hug.

"You bet, just like your grandmother used to make. Thanks for organizing this Bernie," she says.

"Thank you for hosting." He kisses her.

I'm touched by kind, generous Mrs. Nusinowitz sharing her home and by the crowd of strangers helping in the kitchen, laughing and joking. It feels like a real family.

"Thanks to everyone for coming and bringing something and helping," Bernie announces to the room. "The only thing I was worried about," he tells us, "was the matzot. But they finally got here Thursday on the boat from Miami."

"Can I help with something?" I ask. I want to lose this awkward outsider feeling, and maybe ask someone quietly about my sponge cake.

"Sure, grab some glasses from the cupboard and help me with the table," Stephanie says.

I follow her flowing red dress out into the dining room. Her jewelled sandals tap on the tile floor. She's from California and teaches yoga at Prospect Reef Resort.

"How many people are coming?" I ask her.

"Over 50 and counting! Can you believe it? Who would have thought there were so many Jews living on this small island?" She is folding napkins and tucking them under the cutlery. People are opening folding chairs and placing them alongside a string of tables covered in white tablecloths. I wave at Syd and Ariel seated at the far end of tables. Ariel is wearing a white and gold kippah that was Syd's father's. She has a big smile on her face. Around the room men are wearing kippot and flip-flops. I wonder if like Syd they keep their Jewish treasures tucked in a red velvet bag at the bottom of a drawer, waiting for a special night to take them out. I wave at our friend Bennett. He has come from his boat in Trellis Bay. Giving me a hug he whispers, "I hope they don't ask me to do anything, I'm the Jew that had a Christmas tree."

Finally, Bernie and Mrs. Nusinowitz start ushering the crowd to the table. I recognize faces I have seen here and there around the island. There is the red-haired Australian woman who owns the kooky hot pink boutique on Main Street.

She is here with her partner, a local man, and their son. A warm tropical breeze wafts up from the sea and a hush falls over the crowded room. Mrs. Nusinowitz and a few women stand at a side table and light candles. They cover their eyes and circle their hands above the flames chanting a blessing. Syd puts his arms around Ariel and I and draws us close.

A man stands up. "I'm Murray. I'm new to the island. I teach at the college. My father was a cantor in Ireland. Mrs. Nusinowitz asked me to lead the seder. I hope I can do a good job for all of you." There is a burst of applause and cheers. "Bernie has done a count. It seems we have representation from over 14 countries here tonight." There are more whistles and clapping. "It's all thanks to Mrs. Nusinowitz and Bernie; he's not just a diver. He's an event planner."

Murray smiles holds up a glass of wine and begins to chant a Hebrew blessing. I don't understand the words, but feel the connection between our mountaintop celebration and Jews all over the world. As the story unfolds, there is a rumbling of collective memories, laughter and voices singing along to familiar tunes. Syd's face beams with memories of other seder tables full of family. I get a glimpse of how important this is to him. We have been married for 10 years, but Judaism has been buried deep inside him.

Ariel is the youngest and they ask her to do the four questions. She can't read, but a teenage boy Josh comes and sits beside her and they chant together.

"Why on this night do we lean on pillows?" they ask.

"To enjoy the wonderful view from this mountain," someone yells out.

Murray talks of bondage and suffering. Matzah, the bread of affliction, is explained and blessed, as are the bitter herbs and the charoset. Then Moses the great prophet leads the people out of Egypt. God's outstretched hand splits the sea, and everyone sings Dayeinu.

In a few months we will celebrate Carnival here on the island, the annual party commemorating the abolition of slavery on Aug. 1, 1834. What a powerful way to remind ourselves year after year of the deep universal yearning for freedom. The Hebrew words are mysterious and the dramatic story goes straight into my soul. What does it all mean? Long ago the people were freed, they must never forget, never take freedom for granted. I want to be free too. Free to explore my spirituality in a personal way. I feel an awakening to the beauty of religious experience. I am tired of living in the black hole of atheism in which I was raised.

"Do the short version," someone calls out to Murray.

"Yeah skip to the good part, let's eat."

"No take your time," someone else yells.

Finally the Passover meal is served. First, there is chicken soup and matzah balls. Then come the gefilte fish and liver. People are moving back and forth from the kitchen to the tables with platters piled high with food. Serving spoons are stuck into casseroles of West Indian fish curry, and eggplant salad. There is brisket, and chicken with ginger, bowls of pumpkin, yarrow breadfruit and yams. We introduce ourselves to each other. There are slaps on the back, and lots of hugs and kisses. Strangers before, now we are friends.

The dream of becoming Jewish took root inside me there on that mountaintop as we ate, and prayed and shared the great gift of being Jewish.

Just when I am lulled into a blissful reverie, out comes dessert. There are fruit salads and ice cream – mango, guava, banana, papaya and ginger. Then my cake is marched in with other cakes. My heart stops with fear. I want to hide, run down the mountain.

"This is the lightest Passover cake I've ever had," someone says stuffing a big piece in his mouth. I just smile. The four glasses of wine have gone straight to my head. Syd winks at me. He shrugs and laughs.

"No one cares," he whispers.

Later, Syd and I tuck Ariel into the car for the ride down the mountain. I smell the heavy scent of frangipani and hear the distant rumble of sea shells in the surf. I smile. During that crazy Passover seder in paradise I was witness to the miracle of Judaism. It truly was a night different from all other nights, and one in which I was forever changed.

My Uncle's Secret

Alvin Abram

I was asleep when the telephone rang in the middle of the night, so I groped for the telephone with my eyes shut.

"Are you Marilyn Epstein?"

"Yes," I mumbled.

"Do you have an uncle named Louis Epstein?"

My eyes opened wide and I quickly swung my legs over the side of the bed. "Yes. Has something happened to him?"

"My name is Detective Garshowitz. Your uncle apparently died several days ago in his apartment and his body was only discovered late this evening."

I hesitated a moment before asking, "May I ask what was the cause of death?"

"The medical examiner has listed your uncle's death as being the result of personal neglect."

My first reaction was to blame myself. He was my father's younger brother, a bachelor and a loner. He was known to talk to an invisible person. Before my father died he asked me to look after him. I agreed but I never did make the time.

I arranged to have a graveside service at Pardes Shalom the next day, placing a small announcement in the newspaper as a courtesy, but didn't expect anyone to show up. When I arrived at the burial site, I was stunned to find hundreds of people had come to my uncle's funeral and, surprisingly, many of them were in tears. When the service ended, I watched in wonder as many came up to the grave and gently tossed a small circular object into the opening. I didn't understand what they were doing. When almost everyone had dispersed, a young, black man in a well-tailored suit solemnly remained near the grave. I approached him.

"Did you know my Uncle Lou?" I asked.

He turned to me with tears on his cheeks. "No," he said. "My mother did. She's dead so I came in her place." Then he abruptly walked away.

I paid for the funeral because I had no idea whether my uncle had money or not. Somehow I doubted it. He lived in a small bachelor apartment on Wilson Avenue near Bathurst Street. He often appeared unwashed, his clothes were always dishevelled and he could easily be mistaken for a street person. When I asked my father how his brother made a living, he told me, "He's been taken care of."

After the funeral, I went to his apartment and uncovered a treasure of junk. The messy apartment was full of books – wall-to-wall books, on the floor, on the furniture and in the bathtub; books on philosophy, on religion and on the occult. The walls were bare, with not one photograph anywhere. There was a sense of loneliness in the air. I realized that my uncle lived in an apartment that had no memories. Over the next few days, I gave all his belongings away to several charities.

Although I had many questions, I soon went back to my own life. I'm 26, a police officer and I love what I do. My beat is the Danforth, a section of the city known for its many Greek restaurants but is really heavily multicultural with Greeks, Chinese, Muslims, Jews and Italians living in harmony.

Toronto is a world within itself where everyone has a story. Take Emma Spokes, for example. She is a young black woman from Haiti, a single parent with an 18-month-old child. She came to Canada with her father who became ill and died. She got pregnant and became a statistic. She never finished high school and is on welfare, living in a low-income housing project in a one-bedroom apartment off the Danforth. I see her often when walking my beat. Whenever I talk to her, I can tell she has a natural curiosity about everything and likes to read.

I have my own story. My parents separated early into their marriage. My mother didn't want a child, so my father, a security officer for a construction company raised me. He had always wanted to be a policeman but his weak heart put an end to his dream and he encouraged me to become one. He was so proud of me when I did.

A week after the funeral, I received a letter from a lawyer representing my uncle's estate. I was surprised to hear my uncle had an estate. I arranged to see him the next day and was ushered into the office of an elderly man who looked to be in his 80s. He introduced himself as Samuel Bernstein.

I sat down.

"I am long retired but I am here today not only to represent your uncle but to repay a personal debt."

"A debt?"

The smile slowly left Samuel's face. "When my son became aware of Louis Epstein's death, he notified everyone on his list. They too, had a debt to repay." He reached across the desk and slid two envelopes towards me. "Inside this envelope," he said, pointing to the one on the left "is a cheque for $150,000. It is a gift to you from your uncle."

"What…?" I began.

"You can leave now and take the cheque with you or you can read the contents in the other envelope, promising never to reveal what you learn in this office. If you do reveal what you have learned, you forfeit the money."

"What is this all about, Mr. Bernstein?"

"I can only tell you that before you were born, your uncle had a promising future as a tool-and die designer. Unfortunately, a tragedy took away the person he loved." He paused. "The night he and his fiancée were celebrating their engagement, he had a few drinks too many, lost control of his car and crossed the centre line, hitting a mother and her child on the sidewalk before striking a hydro pole. His fiancée and the child were killed and your uncle suffered a head injury. He was charged and went to jail."

"I didn't know any of this," I said.

"This information is a matter of public record. I want you to take both envelopes home and decide what you want to do. If you open the second envelope and agree to the terms of the contract inside, then return the signed contract to this office and my son will explain everything. This is my son's office."

"I don't understand."

"I know, Ms. Epstein. This is all that can be revealed until you sign the contract." He put his hand into his jacket pocket and removed a small circular object.

"What is that?"

Samuel Bernstein looked solemnly at the object. "That… is a reminder that I almost lost everything I hold dear."

"Can I have one?"

My Uncle's Secret

Bernstein shook his head. "You don't ever want to possess one of these."

I sat at my kitchen table, the $150,000 cheque in front of me, but it was the other envelope that held my focus. I don't know why but I suspected my father was a part of what was happening. Slowly, I opened the envelope. There were two sheets of paper inside. I read the contents several times, trying to decide if I could really do what was being asked of me.

The next day, after a restless night of soul searching, I returned to Ralph Bernstein's office. "I've signed the contract," I told him as I handed the middle-aged man who was Samuel Bernstein's son the envelope.

"Are you sure?"

"Yes. I spent the night struggling with my thoughts. Then I had a long conversation with my father and knew I had to agree."

He looked at me with surprise. "I'm sorry, but I believe your father died several years ago."

"He did. But I had to talk to someone. There was too much at stake. Everything is very clear now. I understand why my father wanted me to be a cop. I was being groomed for this moment."

Ralph Bernstein nodded.

I cleared my throat. "Since I signed the contract, will you tell me why your father was given the keepsake?"

"I see no reason why I can't. My father and I were law partners. One day, your uncle came into our office and asked to see my father. I asked him what he wanted. Your uncle casually told me that he knew my father had borrowed money from several of his clients' trust accounts to pay his gambling debts and he was unable to put the money back. I was furious and ordered him to leave. But he sat down and told me to tell my father what he had just told me. Then he added, 'If your father says so, I will go.'

"As I was going into my father's office, I heard your uncle having a conversation with an invisible person. He sounded very pleased with himself. I thought he was mad. I told my father what your uncle had said, and I knew by the way he looked at me that your uncle had told the truth. He told me let him in. I don't know how he found out about what my father had done but, by the time he left the office, he had given my father the money to replace what he had stolen and swore him to a lifelong commitment to help others also in need. Your uncle gave him a keepsake and told him it was to be returned upon your uncle's death, at which time my father's debt would be paid in full.

"We became Lou Epstein's lawyers and confidants. And we took care of his needs. For 30 years, your uncle helped all kinds of people. Colour or religion never entered into the equation. He paid rent, paid for university educations and paid personal debts. The list of what he did is endless. Some were battered and in need of professional help – he paid for everything. People came here and signed contracts and cried when told their problems would be taken care of. But they had to promise never to tell anyone what had been done for them. Your uncle was never here for the signing. That was my father's job; then it became mine. Each person was given a keepsake as a reminder of their debt and to promise to help others."

"It's called doing tzedakah, a good deed," I said.

"Yes, but with your uncle, what he was doing was performing tzedakah without personal reward." Ralph opened the centre drawer of his desk, brought out the keepsake his father had shown me yesterday and placed it before me. "I'm returning this to you. This releases my father. He was unable to come to the funeral."

The keepsake had an image of a woman engraved on it. "Who is this?" I asked.

"His fiancée."

Everything now made sense. "So my function is to find people in need," I said.

"Yes, but more importantly, you must find people who are willing to help others in need too, and no one must ever know that you were responsible for the help they receive. Your name can never come up. When you find such a person, let me know and I'll do the rest."

"I understand Mr. Bernstein." I pushed a piece of paper across the desk to him.

"What's this?" he asked.

"It's my first assignment. She's a single mother from Haiti. I believe if you can convince her to go back to school, she will be an investment that will pay my uncle great returns. All she needs is financial support."

We shook hands and I left the building.

I stood on the street and looked at the world that was suddenly very different. "Well, Dad, I think now I know who Uncle Lou was always talking to and I hope the two of them are finally together again." I began walking to the subway. "My shift starts in half an hour, Dad, and I have a promise I want to keep."

Super Seders and Passover Prestige

Frank White

Among the major Jewish holiday feasts and family assemblies, the Passover seder is, for many of us, the most memorable. We often recall, with growing satisfaction, many seders from our past. With its unique blend of history and mitzvot, family and friends, food and wine, the seder is clearly a favourite ritual, and rightfully so.

There is, however, one feature of this event, entirely of our own making, which is not to be encouraged. For lack of a better name, it could be called "seder one-upmanship" or the "mine is better than yours" syndrome. It seems that as soon as the topic of the latest seder comes up, participants inevitably try to outdo each other in extolling the virtues of their own experiences.

Contrary to the current trend in technology where smaller, simpler, faster and leaner are desirable goals, the Passover seder is following that grand old American tradition of bigger is better. Did we borrow this from our ancient foes, the Egyptians? Let me illustrate this trend more specifically.

It is the third or fourth day of Passover and you are with a small group of friends. Casually mention that the dozen or so at your seder managed to fit around one table. Immediately someone will disdainfully inform you that the 32 at his seder needed three tables and four highchairs. But he, in turn, will quickly be trumped by someone else who boasts that the 56 at their seder were seated on three different floors, all co-ordinated by a professional sound system, and we're not even talking about rented ballrooms and auditoriums yet.

Probably the next area of comparison will be the variety and quantity of food served (weight watching and healthy eating are exempted on Jewish holidays). Three meat dishes are a bare minimum. Refills of fish, soup, salads and desserts often match the required cups of wine. Just mention that you really enjoyed the kugel at your seder, whereupon a friend will say that she couldn't pick a favourite from among the matzah kugel, the vegetable kugel, the fruit kugel or the sweet kugel served at their seder.

Merit also seems to be awarded for exotic foods or "new recipes," edible or not. "We had Bolivian turnips stuffed with lamb kidneys in caramel sauce covered with shredded coconut."

By thinking quickly, you can counter this with something like, "Well, since the ancient Sumerians made leavened biscuits from dried turnip flour, we would never serve that on Passover."

Of course, all this excess supply of calories requires lengthy preparation and also room for competition. If one hostess says she starts seder preparations right after Purim, another will tell of filling the two Passover freezers from Chanukah onward. Note: no points are awarded for catered dishes. On the other hand, after-seder cleanup must be very rapid to show how well-organized one's kitchen is.

Besides actual numbers, the type and variety of seder guests are very important. Generally, the more exotic the better. A partial ranking guide of guests, from lowest to highest, may look like this:

10. out of town relative (farther is better);
9. local non-Jewish friend or neighbour;
8. two or more rabbis;
7. one rabbi;
6. Israeli minister;
5. member of another race and religion;
4. spiritual leader of another religion;
3. cannibal shaman from Bora Bora;
2. member of the Taliban;
1. in-laws you haven't spoken to in 30 years.

The sages in the Haggadah tell us that it is praiseworthy to discuss the events of the Exodus from Egypt. Most of us would agree. Yet, there must be a reasonable duration for the seder and all its rituals. Has length of time spent become confused with the quality of the evening? Among one's peers, going home after midnight (later than some of us do at New Year's Eve) gets no points at all. Many children stay up later. Walking home at 2:30 a.m. is merely average. Dragging yourself in the door at daylight gets an honourable mention.

What is it about seders that brings on the urge to outdo? Merely mention that your seder concluded with five songs and someone will say they did 10. If one of your singers had a good voice, they had clones of Pavarotti or Kusevitsky. Your afikoman cost you $10, they paid 20, and so on. And don't even get started on the child prodigies who asked the Four Questions in three languages, at two years of age.

The pre-Passover home preparations are also grounds for comparisons. Did you merely char a few token breadcrumbs over a lit paper in the fireplace?

Well, my neighbour burns all his chametz in a huge bonfire in the backyard. Upping the ante, is it true that some are renting commercial incinerators to atomize their leavened leftovers at 2,000 degrees?

Certainly, house cleaning and related rituals are very important, but surely there are limits. Your traditional thorough spring cleaning pales in comparison with others who repaint, re-floor or totally renovate just before Passover. Then there is the whole issue of kashering procedures that seem to expand every year. We finally know what we are supposed to do with the dishwasher and microwave. But what if I carry my iPad in the same bag as my lunch sandwich; can I still use it on Passover?

On the other hand, as Tevye the dairy mogul would say, there may be room to expand or modernize the Passover topics that we are supposed to discuss at the seder. Perhaps these suggestions may cause other ideas to ferment (oops—wrong word).

1. Is Allah involved in the current uprising in Egypt?
2. Was "bad press" the reason Hillel never got due credit for inventing the sandwich, long before that lazy Earl?
3. With our aging population, why not have a set of questions for the eldest present to ask?

By the way, the old issue of why we need a second seder has been solved: you go to the in-laws for seder No. 2.

In conclusion, remember to take the above with a few grains of kosher salt. Enjoy your seders, family, friends and Passover. As for the best health food on this holiday, our sages tell us that a long life is granted to those who eat many, many afikomans.

The Wandering Jew

Sharon Miller

From our ancient homeland we were expelled
To roam the earth for lands to dwell
Our host nations not often kind
To return to Zion we did pine
The twelve tribes scattered like the dust
But in our God we kept our trust
Keeping truth to our faith, customs and traditions
The promised land we did always envision
Without our own country for two thousand years
We wept and shed bitter tears
"You cannot live amongst us as Jews
You cannot live amongst us
You cannot live"
Strangers in strange lands
The Yellow Star became a brand
In the ovens of Auschwitz we were burned
With blood, sweat and tears we have returned
From the ashes of history we did rise
The nation of Israel is still alive!

Matzah — The Bread of Affliction

Saul Friedman

I was a 6 year old kid living on The Main back in the '40s. One day in spring, mom put a hard,dry rectangular wafer on my bread plate and told me,"This is bread for Pesach"

Days before my taste of matzah, I was witness to a bizarre ritual. Mom replaced the two sets of dishes and cutlery by another . I recall Beefeaters and Royal regalia decorated one set.

I didn't understand why 2 sets of dishes all year but on Pesach another 2 sets ?

Before Pesach, mom "made an order" at Tennenbaum's grocery and all the food in the ice box and pantry was put away somewhere. Mom cleaned up for days. The day that Pesach arrived, I saw a clean house with boxes and cans of food never seen during the rest of the year. The boxes and cans of food arrived, brought up to the second floor of a flat on Clark Street by a hulking young man from Tennenbaum's Grocery.

One day,in place of moist and delicious Weston's sliced bread,I bit into my first slice of matzo. It crumbled all over the table,a tasteless,dry experience.I knew then,as a 6-year-old-child, the reason why matzah is called the bread of affliction!

The Exodus Has Come

Jonathan Balofsky

The time of exodus has come
And we have been raised up by heaven

Taken out of bondage then
And now we remember those trials

We shall sing the songs of the ages
And retell the stories of old again

The wine we drink shall bring us peace
And bring us closer above

Only the food of the exodus shall be consumed
To once again be brought forth from our bondage

We were slaves to mere mortals then
Until the Almighty brought us forth to Him.

And now we wait to be redeemed once more
And sing Leshana Haba B'Yerushalayim

Honey Cake and Flowers

Oritte Rudski

Every year, when the days
Begin to shorten
And summer camp ends
Lilac coloured flowers
Bloom in my garden.
The King in His glory
Comes down to the field.
I am sure He has come
To enjoy my flowers
And comfort me as I
Struggle to bid summer goodbye.

"Your majesty, please wait a moment.
I'll come out to greet you,
Perhaps invite you for a cup of tea
And a freshly baked muffin" I beg.
The King smiles as I explain
"I just have to change the baby's diaper, sweep the kitchen floor
And wipe Yankee's nose.
Then I can don my new peach silk suit and long Shabbos sheitel, to receive you
In a manner befitting your majesty."

The King is holding a pad and pencil.
He is sweating in the heat
Of the Indian summer.
He removes his crown
And casts aside his purple cloak,
Hiding them behind the bushes.
I see him writing something
And humming softly as he writes.
I try to take a peek at His notes
But the pad disappears into
The pocket of his vest.

The phone rings.
Malka's mom is in the hospital.
Could I please watch Mendy and Esty
while she brings her a hot kosher lunch?
I hesitate long enough to realize
That my date with the King will have to wait.

Honey cake and flowers

In my stained gray housecoat
I prepare macaroni and cheese.
"Maybe tomorrow, Your Majesty"
I mumble with a sigh
I wonder what He's written
About me in His pad.

Next day I'm so busy
Buying school supplies
That I nearly forget the King.
Paper is on sale at Canadian Tire
At 29 cents a pack.
They also have 2-inch blue binders
But Miri's teacher demands one
That is three inches wide
So off we go to Bureau en Gross.
Brochy needs coloured pencils,
Berry needs markers, and Ricky
Must have a package of 24 crayons.
Tomorrow is the first full day of school.
Yippee! I hope the King will wait.

My new mixer is missing a beater.
Oh, there it is, under the instruction manual.
Just in time to bake a honey chiffon cake.
Oh, no! There is no honey left in my pantry.
I dress the baby and run to strap him into the car seat.
The car is gone. I forgot that today is Thursday.
Gershon always drives to work on Thursdays
so he can be on time after hearing the Torah reading.
I grab my Peg Perego and start pushing uphill.
I run home, sweating in the late summer heat.
The King is waiting in my garden,
Scribbling in His little book.

Tomorrow I'll surely invite Him in and serve Him some fresh honey cake.
I'll apologize and explain how busy I've been.
I'll ask for His forgiveness for ignoring Him so long.
Perhaps if I sing his praises
He'll reward me
With a smile,
a golden coin,
or a royal blessing.

The King waits patiently in my garden.
The flowers begin to wilt.
Every day is filled to the brim.
Somehow there is no time
For me to welcome Him.

One day He takes His crown out
From behind the bushes.
He puts His pad and pencil into His pocket and dons His Royal cloak.

After a brief conversation
On his BlackBerry phone
A coach pulls up.
I run to my car and follow Him.
"Please, please, come back."
The tall gate opens
And the coach disappears.
I pound on the door and beg to be admitted.
"Please let me apologize to the King.
Please show me what's written in His little book"

A messenger returns.
The King is on His throne.
He cannot come back.
Within 10 days He will send you an email.

I wipe my brow and get back into my stuffy Toyota.
I drive home and pray for the King's forgiveness.

Ten days pass. Long days.
My clicking finger trembles.
That's strange. The King's letter
Is entitled "Thank you "
The King is busy.
His email is short.
"Thank you my daughter
for helping me take care of my world.
You're doing a great job.
You need not serve Me honey cake.
Each time you take care of your family
you are serving Me.
You are inscribed for a sweet new year.
As sweet as your honey cake."

I cut the remaining flowers
And bring them in from my garden
It is time to say goodbye to summer,
And greet the new year.

Why?

Joseph Peretz

I wonder, little man, in this world of madness
Why, for what reason, for whom
Must we suffer this heavy penitence
Which like a horrible and immense flail
Beat down on us, in our innocence
And tore us from our calm and peaceful life
Inflicting on us a painful separation
From our beloved, be it wife or fiancée
Be it mother, father or child
Did I commit so much tort to my fellow man
To have merited this castigation
To see happiness suddenly collapse
To be evicted from my home
Why does it reign, this horrible hatred
This most vile of feelings

The other day, a beautiful spring day, I spoke
To my enemy of whom I am the prisoner
I am defeated, he is the conqueror
And yet, in our chest, beats the same heart
He is also tormented in order to find
How to re-conquer his own freedom
For he too has become a victim
Without being able to grasp the real why?
This gigantic battle, massacres without end
Where nobody tallies the losses nor the gains
Is it to serve the fatherland with his blood
For the glory of an idolized omnipotent megalomaniac leader
Is it to establish a better life?
Is it not the means, not for me nor for him
And when the day will come, this long awaited tomorrow
When freedom will be finally restored
To return home, to regain our domicile
What will I find at my return
Of what I left so long ago
The house, if at least, will still be there
Will be empty and again I ask why?
All those beloved beings
To whom I was attached
All the furnishings that once filled the house
Removed, stolen, what ignoble harvest
The ruin will be mine and my tormented heart
Will not cease to ask
As long as I shall live and my heart will beat
WHY? WHY? WHY?

Three Mothers

Esther A. Dagan

Inspired by, "God's Warriors" Documentary, by C. Amanpour

In search of the truth

A virtue of the highest absurdity

For the first time, three devout mothers met.

They met online, in one of the many rising sun, jihadi forums.

Unhappy with the endless "Revenge!" "Killing!" and "Destruction!"

The three opened a chat room of their own. Joking, laughing and having fun…

Sharing their pride in the achievement of their sons. Until…Oy! Oy! Oy!

Until they spelled their names and the names of their sons.

My son Isaac, said Sarah: is the son of my beloved husband Abraham.

My son Ishmael, said Hagar: is the son of my lover, your husband Abraham.

My son Jesus, said Maria: though millennia later, is too the descendant of Abraham.

Lightning, storm and winds overwhelmed the screen.

You are The infidels! The enemy! yelled Hagar: You must be eradicated from the face of this earth!

Calm down Hagar! pleaded Sarah: We are relatives, we should look forward, talk!

Sarah is right! chimed Maria: We should learn from my son Jesus to forgive.

Dark clouds and heavy hail crossed the screen.

To forgive? Raged Hagar: You, Sarah, threw me into the wilderness with my son! Remember?

A millennia-old story and you're still angry? wondered Sarah: It is the 21st century now.

Things have changed indeed, stated Maria: Why don't we examine the numbers?

They three Googled: "What are the numbers of our descendants?" Click…on screen:

The descendants of Jesus, the Christians, number about 2.1 billion people around the globe.

The descendants of Ishmael and Mohammed, the Muslims, about 1.5 billion people around the globe.

The descendants of Abraham, the Jews, number about 15 million people around the globe.

The argument between the three devout mothers heated up.

I know why only 15 million Jews survived, said Hagar: Punished for your endless sins.

Enough! suggested Maria: Only an intermediary like our Pope could help us.

The Pope? Over my dead body, interrupted Hagar: We need our highest Imam.

Hagar and Maria continued their debate until Sarah joined in, saying:

Neither your Pope nor your Imam would be fair to us. We should turn to our Rabbis.

What a joke! Said Hagar: A mere minority, soon to disappear. To consult your Rabbis? Ha! Ha! Ha!

If as a minority, we are insignificant, said Sarah: How come our ten commandments adopted by all?

An Angel on the screen, baby face, piercing eyes and long, split beard hanging on his open wings.

Shame on you Mothers! Shame! Shame!

What should we do? Cried the three.

Turn to The President! Suggested the Angel.

Clouds and silent pose.

Which one? The three asked. And The Angel answered:

The one who respects people, religious or not, of all faiths and beliefs.

The one who honours all minorities and people of all colors.

Clouds and silent pose.

Is he real? Or is he a vision? Asked the three mothers. And the Angel answered:

He is the only one capable of realizing Isaiah's prophecy.

What prophecy? Asked the three.

On screen, behind the Angel, the sun rises when he answers:

"And the wolf shall dwell with the lamb."

He sounds like the right one, Yes! The three mothers agreed and typed:

Dear President! Would you please help us achieve The Peace?

Another year, another Pesach in captivity

Israeli president Shimon Peres met on Sunday with Noam and Aviva Schalit, the parents of captured Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit, in a support tent calling for Gilad's release outside of the prime minister's residence in Jerusalem. The number 1758 refers to the number of days Gilad has been held captive by Hamas. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu met with the Schalits earlier in the day in the prime minister's residence to update them on the status of negotiations and on the appointment of a new negotiator for their son's release. Census call goes out to community

Frances Kraft and David Lazarus
Staff Reporters

Jewish leaders who relied on the old long form census to do community planning are urging Jews to fill out its replacement – the new voluntary National Household Survey (NHS) – which demographers say will only be reliable at response rates of 80 per cent or more.

The NHS – to be sent to one-third of Canadian households – replaced the mandatory long-form of the national census, which had more than 50 questions, after the latter was scrapped last year in a controversial move by the federal government. The mandatory short census form, comprising fewer than 10 questions, will remain the same.

'Critical' to complete optional long form

In Montreal, demographer Charles Shahar, Federation CJA's chief researcher for national census analysis, said a "massive census promotion campaign" for the 2011 census is taking place May 2 to 9.

During that time, a census package will be mailed to Canadian households, and people who fill out the short census form online can complete the NHS online, too, if they've been selected to receive it.

A paper version of the NHS will be sent out in June, and the deadline for completing it is Aug. 15.

Shahar said it's "critical" for people who receive the NHS long form to complete it and also to identify themselves as Jewish, either by ethnicity or religion.

"Preferably, both," he said.

"The Jewish community usually comes through for such things, but we're not going to take any chances," Shahar said. "We're a stronger community when people fill out the census, because our numbers tell the tale.

"In order for us to continue to have a certain political clout, in order for the government to take us seriously, we need to have a certain critical mass of people, so we need to be counted. It's as simple as that."

Walnut Warning

OTTAWA — The Canadian Food Inspection Agency widened its public warning and recall last week regarding MK-hechshered walnuts distributed between Jan. 1 and April 4 by Montreal-based Amira Enterprises Inc. that may be contaminated with E. coli bacteria. Food contaminated with E. coli may not look or smell spoiled, but can cause serious illness. Symptoms include severe stomach pain and bloody diarrhea. The raw, shelled walnuts – branded Amira, Tia and Merit Selection – hail from the United States and were originally said to have been distributed in Atlantic Canada, Quebec and Ontario, but later showed up in Alberta as well. Retailers may also have sold the walnuts unlabelled in bulk bins, so consumers are advised to contact retailers about the source of walnuts they've purchased. Walnuts are a mainstay of charoset and other Passover dishes.

Mag Owner Dies

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Sidney Harman, a Jewish entrepreneur who bought Newsweek magazine last year, died April 12 in Washington, D.C., at age 92, one month after being diagnosed with leukemia. Harman also founded Harman Kardon Inc., a pioneering stereo equipment maker that he left in 2007.

Repeal Sought

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Bills urging the United Nations to rescind the Goldstone report are circulating in both houses of the U.S. Congress. A Senate resolution, tabled April 8 by Kirsten Gillibrand (D-N.Y.) and James Risch (R-Idaho), calls on the UN Human Rights Council to "reflect the author's repudiation of the Goldstone report's central findings, rescind the report, and reconsider further council actions with respect to the report's findings." In an April 2 Washington Post opinion piece, retired South African judge Richard Goldstone said the 2009 report he helped author on the Gaza war erred in concluding Israel purposely targeted civilians. But Goldstone, who is Jewish, didn't rescind demands for probes into the report's findings that individual soldiers may have committed war crimes, and says he won't work to retract the report. In the House of Representatives, Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (R-Fla.), chair of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, is also seeking support for a UN accountability act that would to include demands to revoke the report.

CJC Seeks Hate Charges Against Website

TORONTO — Criminal hate charges are being sought by Canadian Jewish Congress against a Toronto-based Muslim website that posted a video address by former U.S. Ku Klux Klan Grand Wizard David Duke.

David Duke

The video was scrubbed from the COSMO.ca site April 13, but Congress is pursuing charges under Canada's hate crimes laws. In its letter to police, Congress calls for a probe of COSMO.ca, which describes itself as the "national platform of Shia Muslims in Canada."

Congress noted that the 12-minute video, in which Duke espoused conspiracy theories about "Zionist running dogs," remained on the site for two days after the National Post exposed it. In fact, for a brief period on April 13, a second Duke video was posted to the site.

"The decision to remove the video two days late doesn't hold much water," Congress CEO Bernie Farber told the Post. "In fact, they put up a second video and I can only assume they were getting some inside pressure, not the least of which was a police complaint."

On the site, the Muslim group says it "supports multiculturalism" and "interfaith dialogue."

QuAIA quits Pride Parade

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

The controversial group Queers Against Israeli Apartheid (QuAIA) said late last week that it's pulling out of the 2011 Pride Parade to deny Toronto Mayor Rob Ford a "pretext" to refuse city funding for the event.

Justine Apple

The group accused Ford of having a "homophobic, right-wing agenda," which it said would be exposed by its decision to leave the parade.

The news came as a pleasant surprise to Jewish community leaders, who had just finished denouncing a Toronto city manager's report released earlier in the week that said the term "Israeli apartheid" is not hate speech. The ruling that the term, therefore, does not contravene city anti-discrimination guidelines left the door open for the city to continue funding the parade, despite QuAIA's annual participation.

Justine Apple, executive director of Kulanu Toronto, the city's main Jewish gay and lesbian advocacy group, said she's looking forward to the parade "getting back to what it once was... safe, welcoming, inclusive, and open to everyone who wants to march with pride and with gay-positive messaging."

Apple said she hopes the community will now come out in force to the July 3 parade to celebrate with her organization.

In a statement, Canadian Jewish Congress CEO Bernie Farber called QuAIA's withdrawal a "positive step."

"The Pride Parade should be about openness and inclusivity and not about divisive, inflammatory messaging, which serves only to create a hostile and toxic environment," Farber said.

Ever since the mayoral campaign, Ford has consistently pledged not to provide city funding to Pride as long as QuAIA is allowed to participate. Calls to the mayor's office asking if he would now support funding the parade weren't returned by The CJN's deadline.

Pride Toronto received a $123,807 grant from the city last year, plus $245,000 worth of services for the parade, such as garbage cleanup and police security details.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto spokesperson Howard English said his organization was "really pleased" by QuAIA's announcement, because "hatred won't be part of the [Pride parade] this year."

In an April 15 Toronto Star report, Ward 10 Councillor James Pasternak called QuAIA's announcement a "great relief for Toronto" and said he would support funding the parade as long as the group doesn't change its mind.

As of last week, Pride was not yet accepting applications for this year's parade, leaving open the possibility that QuAIA might still decide to apply.

Citing concerns of a possible last-minute about-face by the group, Ward 7 Councillor George Mammoliti asked last week that Pride put in writing a guarantee that it would exclude QuAIA from this year's parade in order for the city to fund the event.

Pride refused, saying its new dispute resolution process – by which complaints about last year's participants or 2011 prospective participants are to be heard – is the only way of achieving such an outcome.

In a statement on its website, QuAIA said it plans to organize an independent Pride Week event in which it will urge the gay and lesbian community to promote boycott, divestment and sanctions against Israel.

A tale of two armies

The essay by Leslie Susser on the Perspectives page is extremely important. I emphasize it in this space in order to draw attention to it. I urge our readers to read it, take note of its substance and understand its deeper significance.

Susser writes about the changes that the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) has introduced into its battle doctrine as a result of the army's experiences fighting in Gaza against Hamas in 2009, when it fought an enemy that waged war from among bystanders, hid among and behind their own civilians, and considered Israel's civilians to be appropriate military targets.

The terrorists' preferred theatre of battle is not an open field or other uninhabited space where uniformed armies clash against each other. Rather, it is the crowded alleyway, preferably in a densely populated neighbourhood. The command centre is often in the basement of a hospital. Ammunition storage depots are frequently in mosques or schools.

How does one defend one's own citizens while engaging a heavily armed urban terrorist enemy without also killing civilians caught innocently in the crossfire who, as often as not, were placed there deliberately by the operational preferences of the terrorists?

It is a conundrum requiring safety to bend perilously toward risk. How far does Israel endanger the lives of its soldiers – indeed the lives of its own people – for the sake of minimizing casualties among the civilians of the other side?

The IDF has been obsessed with this question since the very first uniform bearing the acronym of the IDF (Tzahal) was worn by a soldier of Israel. The obsession found iteration and reiteration in the IDF's legendary doctrine of tohar haneshek (purity of arms) that imbued the defence of the Jewish state with uncompromisable moral underpinnings.

It is the overarching paramountcy of moral values in all military confrontations that has caused the IDF to adopt these new policies. There is one reason alone for these new rules: to ensure, as far as possible, that innocent civilian lives are not lost when the IDF must fight the enemy.

Susser cites some examples of the new rules. "The new doctrine requires that after efforts have been made to warn the civilian population to leave, the incoming troops first fire warning shots and give the remaining civilians a chance to leave safely."

He adds: "Another step the IDF has taken to help minimize civilian casualties and humanitarian distress on the other side is to attach humanitarian liaison officers to troops in the field... Their task in the event of hostilities is to help co-ordinate humanitarian needs on the Palestinian side and to point out locations of sensitive facilities like hospitals, schools and UN aid centres."

These self-imposed rules of engagement are likely unprecedented among armies in the western world. And it must be stated and restated again and again that the singular justification of these quite onerous regulations is the saving of innocent life.

In his infamous recanting of the aspersions against Israel in the report that has become known by his name, Judge Richard Goldstone admitted, finally, that the IDF did not deliberately target civilians.

Of course, he did not recant his conclusions regarding Hamas. "That the crimes allegedly committed by Hamas were intentional," Goldstone wrote last month, "goes without saying – its rockets were purposefully and indiscriminately aimed at civilian targets."

Two years after the Gaza war, nothing has changed about the principles underlying the rules of warfare that guide the parties: Israel tries ever harder to save civilian lives. Hamas tries ever harder to take civilian lives.

Last week, Israel's President Shimon Peres denounced Hamas for targeting Israeli civilians, saying that Hamas was "a terror group devoid of all humanity." He was referring, of course, to the missile attack by Hamas thugs on an Israeli school bus in the south of the country. According to Peres, the strike was "another proof of [Hamas'] cruelty and clear intentions to murder Israeli children, women, and infants in cold blood." (See According to Reports.)

Can there be more persuasive, more eloquent proof of the differences between the methods and purposes of Hamas and those of Israel?

Sadly, the truth about Hamas seems not to bother the consciences of its defenders. The Gaza flotilla sponsors, including the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, are indifferent to Hamas' genocidal policies toward Israel and its citizens. The Gaza flotilla participants are willing accomplices in the ugly, contemptible campaign to dismantle and destroy the only Jewish state on earth.

Thankfully, the Jewish state has an army. It is as unique in the world as it is excellent in the field and in the sky. And it operates according to values whose aim is the saving of lives. Those values of course are antithetical to the values of Hamas. We have here an illuminating tale of two armies. – MBD

B'nai Brith audit reports increase in antisemitism

'Public appears to be getting desensitized to incidents'

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

"Antisemitism continues to gain traction" in Canada, spurred by "global influences" and disseminated by new technologies, says a report released last week by B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights.

The 2010 Audit of Antisemitic Incidents, the 29th iteration of the report, also finds that the impact of these incidents are lessening over time. "With several notable exceptions, the general public appears to be getting desensitized to everyday expressions of antisemitism, while members of the Jewish community appear to have internalized this message, becoming increasingly hesitant to report anti-Jewish incidents," the report states.

Despite that concern, the report noted that 1,306 incidents were reported to the League in 2010, an increase of 3.3 per cent over the year before. The vast majority of cases were categorized as "harassment" (74 per cent), while 24 per cent were considered vandalism and only two per cent – 24 incidents in all – were marked by violence.

Frank Dimant

"Despite attempts currently in vogue to dismiss harassment as mere harmless name calling, it should be noted that the language used in the cases classified as harassment in this audit included 80 cases of explicit threats of violence, including threats or genocide or imminent harm," the report stated.

Of the 1,306 incidents, 564 (43 per cent) were reports "of web-based hate activity with a Canadian connection." These included statements on blogs, online videos and social networking sites such as Facebook.

The audit's findings indicate reports of antisemitism have been increasing substantially since 2001, when less than 300 incidents were reported. The next year, the number jumped to around 450 and incidents have been increasing every year since with the exception of 2005, when a small decrease was recorded.

The audit's numbers far exceed police findings. In 2006, for example, the League reported more than 900 antisemitic events, while police from across Canada reported 137 incidents involving Jews. Police, however, limit their findings to violations of the Criminal Code, while the audit includes many other incidents that aren't criminal in nature.

Frank Dimant, B'nai Brith's chief executive officer, said the audit's findings demonstrate "a continuing trend of growth. The demonization of Israel, the delegitimization of the Jewish homeland, leads people to make the quantum jump that Israel is the personification of the Jews. So politically correct people cannot be antisemitic, per se, so it's under the guise of the demonization of Israel."

While criticism of Israel can be legitimate if the same standards applied to it are applied to other states, Canada is not called an apartheid state in connection to its treatment of aboriginal people, he said.

Incidents involving Jews always spike when tensions are high in the Middle East, he continued. "You see a coalition of players who don't get together except to attack Israel." These include churches, radical leftist groups, academics, neo-Nazis, Islamic organizations and trade unionists "who have little in common other than hatred of Israel and the Jewish people."

The audit found the greatest number of incidents took place in March and June.

"As noted in the 2009 audit, an increase in antisemitic incidents is often seen around the time of Israeli Apartheid Week in March... The year 2010 was no different. The inflammatory anti-Zionist rhetoric customarily used spilled over into anti-Jewish expression of various kinds: intimidation, harassment, vandalism and even assault," the audit stated. "The spike in June appears to have been spurred by a renewed focus on the Israel-Palestinian conflict, with the Gaza flotilla being a major media storyline. This increased attention focused public attention not just on events half-way around the world, but on the Jewish community here in Canada."

Dimant said with the development of new technologies such as Twitter and Facebook, "cyberbullying is becoming more and more insidious" as well as easier. No longer do hatemongers have to print and distribute flyers attacking Jews. "Now they can bring hate directly to a person's smartphone."

Election delays Yom Hashoah ceremony

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

The National Holocaust Remembrance Day ceremony in Ottawa won't be held on Yom Hashoah this year, because the latter falls on the same day as the federal election.

The Canadian Society for Yad Vashem said this year's ceremony has been bumped to June 14 because of the May 2 vote.

Moving the ceremony back nearly six weeks after Yom Hashoah was the only way for organizers to ensure they get the participants they want at the event, society representatives said.

"Since the raison d'etre of the national ceremony is to have our nation's leaders and parliamentarians honour the victims and Canadian survivors of the Holocaust, and this is clearly not possible given the understandable reality of election day, [we] decided that the date for the... ceremony be moved to the earliest date possible after May 2, 2011," Fran Sonshine and Yaron Ashkenazi – the organization's national chair and executive director, respectively – said in an e-mail to The CJN.

Fran Sonshine

"Furthermore, we believed that a date change for the ceremony was necessary so as not to interfere with the civic duty of the hundreds of guests coming from across the country who would be casting their vote on election day."

Sonshine and Ashkenazi said they chose June 14 as the date in order to issue invitations to newly elected MPs and give them and other dignitaries enough time to reply and confirm their attendance.

The date change also allows enough time to "arrange to have an official program prepared which would acknowledge their participation," they wrote.

Canada passed its Holocaust Memorial Day Act in 2003. It stipulates that Yom Hashoah, as determined in each year by the Jewish lunar calendar, will annually be proclaimed as the country's Holocaust Memorial Day. This year, Yom Hashoah falls on May 2.

Asked whether their organization had considered rescheduling the ceremony to May 1, Sonshine and Ashkenazi said that date would have conflicted with Toronto's annual community Holocaust commemoration ceremony in Earl Bales Park that the society is co-hosting with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre.

That event is expected to draw more than 2,000 people, they said.

Additionally, they said MPs, senators and supreme court judges are usually not available to attend weekend ceremonies.

PA's real game: duplicity

The Palestinian Authority (PA) leaders are unequalled as prevaricators and double-talkers. If there were any doubt to the contrary one need merely listen to the patently dishonest statement by the PA's spokesman at the United Nations last week on the subject of negotiations with Israel.

Riyad Mansour, the Palestinian UN observer, was reported in Ha'aretz to have told the Associated Press that "the Palestinian leadership have indicated a willingness to go back to negotiations" with Israel if the Quartet — made up of the U.S., United Nations, European Union and Russia — agreed on the outlines of a final peace proposal by Britain, France and Germany.

According to the AP report, Mansour added: "We want them to adopt parameters as a contribution to removing obstacle (sic) from the path of going back to direct negotiations, and we hope that the Quartet would succeed in doing so as soon as possible." (Our emphasis)

No one should be fooled. Mansour's remarks are public relations pap, larded with indigestible deceit and devoid of sincerity or substance.

When he made the statement last Thursday, he already knew that the United States, one of the quartet's key members had rejected the European proposal as being counter-productive to restarting peace talks. Coming from this American administration, which has not been reluctant to publicly upbraid or pressure Israel, one can only imagine that the Europeans' new "parameters," to use Mansour's words, were really a suggested pre-determining of an outcome.

Moreover and more to the point of unwrapping the truth from Mansour's tissue of lies, it is the PA - not Israel - that has placed obstacles on the "path of going back to direct negotiations."

Countless times in the past two years, publicly and privately, Israel has essentially pleaded with the PA to return to the negotiating table. But PA leaders have refused, cleverly, slyly hanging their refusal on the pretext of Israel's construction in the West Bank and Jerusalem. It does not matter that new construction in the West Bank has effectively come to a halt over the past weeks. Nor does it matter that the same PA leadership had never refused to negotiate under similar circumstances before the election two years ago of Barack Obama and Benjamin Netanyahu.

The real strategy of the PA is clear: pretend to want to negotiate with Israel, but avoid it at all costs. Instead, mobilize a majority of countries in the UN General Assembly in September to recognize an independent state of Palestine.

The PA's real game is duplicity. But we will no longer be duped. We have learned from Yasser Arafat's ruse in signing the Oslo accords and from the unrestrained violence that greeted the unilateral withdrawal from Gaza. Neither should the rest of the world be duped. Without negotiations with Israel, there cannot be peace.

Men's club fails grade on democracy

I am appalled to learn that the Beth Tzedec Men's Club decided to follow the ruling from Canadian Broadcasting Consortium to exclude the Green Party of Canada from their candidates debate ("Bennett looking to hold St. Paul's for Liberals," April 7). I must clarify that I am not a Green party member or partisan and that I will not vote for the Green party, but I find it hypocritical that, on one hand, we stand up to defend Israel as the only true democracy in the Middle East and defend the democratic rights of oppressed people in other countries, but we fail the grade in our own backyard.

The club seem to have forgotten the rabbinic tradition of respecting an opposing point of view, and the value of discussing and bringing new ideas and different interpretations to the fore. The Green party is a national party. It fields candidates in most ridings across our country and has close to 10 per cent of popular support. In Saint Paul's riding in Toronto, where Beth Tzedec Congregation is located, the Green party came in fourth in the last federal election. Too bad the club did not reconsider its decision, recognizing that another point of view – from Green party candidate Jim McGarva – would highlight issues not known to the residents of Saint Paul's and that the ideas would enrich the democratic process.

Pride Toronto sponsorship

Why did we demonstrate at the TD Bank? ("Pride Toronto policy changes a sham: activist," April 14). TD Bank has decided to remain the main sponsor of Pride Toronto whether or not Pride organizers allow Queers Against Israeli Apartheid (QuAIA) to participate in the Pride Parade. Other corporations, and hopefully the City of Toronto, have agreed to support Pride, but with the proviso that the group is not included as an official participant. QuAIA spreads hatred directed toward Israel. Given that Israel is the only Jewish state in the world, this hate will inevitably spread antisemitism.

Where does one see evidence of apartheid in Israel? Arabs and Jews work together, play together and are treated together in Israeli hospitals. Arabs attend Israel's universities in direct proportion to their population size, too. Israel was the first country in the world to enact legislation that is gay friendly. All we're asking TD Bank to do is to agree to sponsor Pride only if Pride organizers do not permit QuAIA to participate.

Give genocides equal treatment

Misrepresenting where the Ukrainian Canadian Civil Liberties Association (UCCLA) stands with respect to the taxpayer-funded Canadian Museum for Human Rights (CMHR) is impious ("Postcard suggests Jews as pigs, critics say," April 14). UCCLA wants all 12 CMHR galleries to be thematic, comparative and inclusive. We have never opposed the inclusion of the Shoah in a gallery recalling the many incidents of genocide and crimes against humanity that have befouled history. We are against any group's suffering being elevated above all others in this national museum. UCCLA has not asked for a Holodomor gallery. And we have never equated the Holocaust with the Holodomor, the genocidal Great Famine of 1932-1933 in Soviet Ukraine, or any other genocide. We reject having any "hierarchy of suffering" implied or advocated in this museum's galleries and exhibits.

Our postcard does not "paint Jews as pigs." Introducing the offensive remarks of Islamic extremists and, implying we share their views is dishonest. The orchestrated outcry about the Animal Farm postcard reflects the desperation of those who, having failed to counter UCCLA's legitimate concerns over the proposed contents and ongoing governance of this national institution, are now resorting to bully-boy tactics and name-calling to obfuscate the truth – which is that most Canadians (60.3 per cent) want this publicly funded museum to focus on Canadian stories and human rights, not human wrongs.

Genuine dialogue can still reconcile this controversy. We're ready to engage. We're not trying to reopen old wounds or promote the species of distemper that the writer's misleading commentary did. Israel Asper had a genuinely decent vision of what this museum could become, for Canada and the world. We believe his dream can still be achieved. But it won't be if all we do is fall upon each other. The distinguished Holocaust scholar, Prof. Michael Marrus, has said recently that the CMHR "needs a rethink." Exactly right. We've been saying so all along.

Israeli army embraces new 'smart' warfare

Leslie Susser
JTA

Despite Israel's rejection of the Goldstone report on the war in Gaza 1-1/2 years ago, the international criticism it engendered has led the Israel Defence Forces to make a number of significant changes in policy and doctrine.

And the changes will remain, even though former judge Richard Goldstone has recanted one of the most significant findings of his committee's report – that Israel intentionally targeted civilians and may have perpetrated war crimes and crimes against humanity in Gaza.

Among the changes made by the IDF were modifying the way soldiers fight in urban areas, teaching relatively low-level combat officers nuances of the laws of war, attaching humanitarian liaison officers to active forces and making media relations a priority.

Last May, eight months after the Goldstone report was released, the IDF issued a new document defining the rules of engagement in urban warfare. Although the ideas elaborated had long been standard practice, putting them down in writing was tantamount to introducing a new doctrine for fighting in built-up areas.

The document noted that during the Gaza operation, even after every effort had been made to induce civilians to evacuate areas where combat was expected – for example, by dropping fliers and making direct telephone calls to area residents – more often than not some non-combatants stayed behind.

The new doctrine requires that after efforts have been made to warn the civilian population to leave, the incoming troops first fire warning shots and give the remaining civilians a chance to leave safely. Then, to minimize casualties among civilians who nevertheless choose to stay, IDF fighters and commanders must use the most accurate weapons at their disposal and choose munitions of relatively low impact.

The IDF also has taken significant legal steps.

Officer training courses at company, battalion and brigade levels now include detailed study of international law, with special reference to the rules of war. The Military Advocate General's Headquarters and the Foreign Ministry consult regularly with foreign governments and international organizations to ensure that all IDF operations conform to accepted legal norms.

During the month-long war in Gaza in the winter of 2008-09, legal advisers from the Military Advocate General's Headquarters served with combat forces, advising commanders in real time of what might constitute a breach of law. In January 2010, then-chief of staff Lt.-Gen. Gabi Ashkenazi standardized this practice, instructing commanders to consult with legal advisers, not only in the planning stages of military operations, but also during the actual fighting.

To prevent possible loss of military focus, however, Ashkenazi ordered that the legal advisers be sent to divisional headquarters rather than battalions or brigades, as is common in some other western armies.

Another step the IDF has taken to help minimize civilian casualties and humanitarian distress on the other side is to attach humanitarian liaison officers to troops in the field. The officers come from a pool set up by the Coordinator of Government Activities in the Territories and are in regular contact with the Palestinian Authority in the West Bank and international aid organizations in Gaza.

Their task in the event of hostilities is to help co-ordinate humanitarian needs on the Palestinian side and to point out locations of sensitive facilities like hospitals, schools and UN aid centres to ensure that they are not mistakenly targeted. Such officers were assigned during the Gaza war on an ad hoc basis and, according to the IDF, proved very effective.

As a result, Ashkenazi decided in February 2010 to refine and institutionalize the system.

The most radical change in IDF thinking since Goldstone has been in the realm of media relations. Now there is a firm consensus in the army that the way military actions are perceived is at least as important as their physical impact.

Israeli paratroopers fought against Hamas in Gaza in January 2009. Their experiences in Gaza have led to changes in the army's methods of urban warfare.
(Israel Sun photos)

Brig.-Gen. Avi Benayahu, the Israeli army's outgoing spokesman, is fond of quoting the U.S. joint chiefs of staff chairman Adm. Mike Mullen's dictum that whereas public relations once was supplemental to battle, now battle is supplemental to PR.

More than ever, IDF generals agree, all operations must now be planned with media, legal and international legitimacy aspects in mind. To instil more media savvy, the IDF spokesperson's office routinely sends its mobile communications school unit from one combat unit to the next teaching officers to get their messages across in 20-second sound bites. More important, trained media officers are now attached to combat units.

This means that in future combat situations, commanders will have legal, humanitarian and media advice on tap.

Not everyone is happy with the changes. Some say it will make it difficult for the Israeli army to operate in combat situations and won't prevent the next Goldstone report because, they say, war is always ugly, brutal and destructive.

Nevertheless, it seems that in the post-Goldstone era, with Israel under severe international scrutiny, the IDF is determined to do all it can to uphold the strictest standards of international law.

Moreover, the IDF is collaborating with some of the human rights organizations critical of its actions to make sure cases of alleged IDF misconduct are handled appropriately. Last July, the military advocate general, Avichai Mendelblit, singled out B'Tselem, which monitors Israeli actions against Palestinians, for thanks.

"Between the military and various human rights organizations, there is constant dialogue," IDF spokesperson Capt. Barak Raz told the Forward newspaper last year.

Another inkling of the IDF's heightened legal sensitivity came earlier this month, when the Israeli army notified the Supreme Court that any Palestinian civilian deaths in the West Bank caused by the IDF in non-combat situations will now automatically spark a criminal investigation.

Under the old policy, the army first conducted a fact-finding field inquiry to decide whether or not to open a criminal file, laying itself open to charges that the "fact-finding" often was simply a ruse to block criminal proceedings. Now such criminal investigations will be mandatory.

In what American military strategist Edward Luttwak has dubbed "the post-heroic era," the IDF finds itself hampered by two major constraints: care not to conduct operations that might incur international censure or operations that could lead to heavy Israeli military casualties.

Sometimes the two principles are at odds, as when Israeli ground forces used heavy fire in the Gaza war to avoid casualties, and in so doing, put Palestinian civilian lives at risk. But often they are complementary, as in the IDF's reluctance to commit ground troops unless absolutely necessary.

Part of the solution to the post-Goldstone dilemma lies in technology. For example, using super-accurate munitions that can pinpoint terrorist targets, pilotless planes that can identify and attack would-be rocket launchers, and active defence systems like the Iron Dome – anti-missile batteries that last week downed several Grad rockets launched from Gaza. The system simultaneously located their launch points, enabling immediate attacks on the militiamen firing them.

These capabilities enabled Israel to cool the latest Gaza flare-up without incurring international opprobrium or risking soldiers' lives.

In other words, the Goldstone report and its international ramifications have pushed the IDF into a process of self-examination resulting in a new doctrine of "fighting smart" from operational, legal, humanitarian and media points of view.

IAW gives real leaders a chance to lead

The annual week that anti-Zionists devoted to perpetuating the lie linking Israel and the discredited South African apartheid regime – we should call it "Anti-Israel Week" – was a bust, worldwide. In Canada, it triggered remarkable pro-Israel blowback. The organizers' own website couldn't even back up their claim of 55 cities participating – anyone who clicked on some of the cities mentioned saw no actual events listed. In Canada, the excesses of Israel's critics unwittingly induced powerful testimonials supporting Israel and denouncing this intellectual abomination.

Gill Troy

in Montreal

For Canada's leading political figures, condemning this week has become as Canadian as maple syrup. Prime Minister Stephen Harper continued to show bold global leadership on this issue, refusing to join the international pile-on against Israel. "At one time, friends, we could've expected threatening behaviour toward Jewish students to be rejected in any form at institutions of higher learning," Harper said in condemning the new antisemitism. "Unfortunately, it is now often the behaviour of the anti-Israeli mob that is allowed to prevail."

Opposition leader Michael Ignatieff was just as eloquent and definitive. "Israeli Apartheid Week is an attack on the mutual respect that holds our society together. It is a dangerous cocktail of ignorance and intolerance, both of which stand in the way of peace."

Both these statements go far beyond boilerplate condemnations to score political points. They reflect an understanding of how ugly the situation can get, and how harmful it is to core Canadian values.

Academic leaders defended those values and the fundamental academic values under assault when a big lie is given so much play by radical professors, extremist students and outside agitators.

Lloyd Axworthy, a former foreign minister who now heads the University of Winnipeg, reminded academics that universities should provide forums for learning and dialogue rather than serve as factories for sloganeering and lies. "It is the responsibility of a university to ensure that an issue [the Israeli-Palestinian conflict] that's as important as this be given a full and fair hearing as opposed to a one-sided hearing," Axworthy said. "We felt the most effective way to respond to Israeli Apartheid Week was to organize a series of opportunities in March for Arab-Jewish dialogue" that were "respectful, more open and fair."

Similarly, McGill University principal Heather Munroe-Blum showed leadership when a student tweeted hateful anti-Zionist messages during anti-Israel week, but not at a formal event connected to the week. "As an institution of highest learning, McGill University stands steadfastly for tolerance, understanding, diversity and community engagement, and resolutely against any promotion of hatred, racism or intolerance," Munroe-Blum proclaimed as she celebrated the "civilizing influence of knowledge."

Just a few weeks later, when the McGill Daily condemned the university's fruitful collaboration with Hebrew University, McGill's principled principal responded: "The suggestion that McGill cease to engage with another bona fide university – any bona fide university – because of political controversy in that university's geo-political environment goes against everything McGill stands for. It suggests a cowardice that I, as principal of this great university, categorically reject."

Most Canadian students voted with their feet and didn't attend the few anti-Israel activities that activists mounted. But at Queen's University, when the student rector claimed to represent students in denouncing Israel along with condemning Ignatieff for condemning IAW, more than 2,700 students voted to impeach the intolerant and presumptuous rector.

Less than 10 years ago, when Jean Chrétien was prime minister, the Canadian government – and much of the leadership class – rarely defended Israel or these values. There are still many hacks and haters, especially on campuses, who single out Israel for disproportionate, delegitimizing demonization. The attack on Israel has done great damage, reducing defining academic and political ideals into billyclubs misused by intellectual hooligans while feeding a blindness toward abuses in the Arab world that only now people are noticing because of the internal populist revolts in Libya, Egypt, and elsewhere.

Reading the various statements made by Harper, Ignatieff, Axworthy, and Munroe-Blum, we can see that we need to make a case for consistency in human rights talk, not because it's good for Israel but because it is good for Canada. And we should thank these heroes, not because they were nice to Israel or good to the Jews, but because they did their jobs, stood their ground and defended democracy.

The lost principle of kvod harav

I've just returned from the annual conference of Reform rabbis. More than 400 rabbis participated this year – young and old, male and female, congregational rabbis and organizational rabbis, from small towns and from large cities all over North America. While we may differ in our politics, personalities and predilections, we have this in common: an intense desire to serve the Jewish people, model a committed Jewish life, help people mark Jewish time, and open a pathway to God for everyone we meet. It's refreshing beyond imagination to spend a few days with others who "get it" and get you.

There were, of course, many workshops that were professionally helpful and many moments of worship together that were personally meaningful. But there was one small instance, unplanned and unprogrammed, that was the most powerful of all for me.

During the Thursday morning service, when the Torah was being read, different rabbis were called to the bimah for aliyot. The last aliyah went to rabbis who have served in the rabbinate for 50 years. A hush fell over us as four men walked forward proudly: one held onto the arm of a younger colleague, one had a walker, and two walked on their own.

As they approached the bimah, the entire room rose to its feet. Hundreds of rabbis, most much younger than me, who may never have heard these four rabbis speak or known their names before, spontaneously rose in honour, respect and deference. Not because these four had "survived" the rabbinate for 50 years. Not because they were old. Rather, because they represented a lifetime of commitment to an ideal, and they hadn't let themselves become jaded or "burned-out." They didn't flee the rabbinate when it was frustrating, and they didn't feel despair over the personal sacrifices many of them made to remain in the rabbinate for so long.

We all rose, I think, because for us, these four rabbis deserve the old-fashioned and increasingly unpopular "kvod harav" – respect for the title, learning, and position of the rabbi in a community— that few of us receive today. Yes, it's more common in the modern Orthodox and haredi communities for people to rise when a rabbi or their rebbe enters the room. But even in those communities there's still plenty of "rabbi-shopping" to find the rav who answers your questions in the way you want, and plenty of quitting the shul if you don't "like" the rabbi, as well as plenty of rabbis disrespecting other rabbis in public.

I remember one of my rabbinic mentors once telling me, "When I die I don't care if people say I was a loved rabbi. I care if they say I was a respected rabbi." Today, rabbis are expected to be popular, liked, accessible, warm, friendly, people-pleasers. We have to be equally great with little kids, teens, young parents, boomers, zoomers, empty-nesters and seniors. We have to preach well, teach well, console well, celebrate well, officiate well, eulogize well, listen well, organize well, plan well, be financially responsible, understand budgets, report to boards, find donors and inspire people we don't see very often.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

in Toronto

We're often treated like employees or managers, like commodities or a checklist item. (Flowers? Check. Caterer? Check. Rabbi? Oops, forgot. Let's call around and find one available for the date we've already chosen.) We're asked to be very modern and very traditional at the same time, to represent history but to live in the present. We have big name rabbis, best-selling rabbis, rabbis on TV and rabbis to the stars that we can emulate.

But there are also rent-a-rabbis who will do anything you ask – with a Jewish flavour, for a fee. There are rabbis who offer counselling without credentials, rabbis who say yes because that's what the "customer" wants (and for some odd reason, female rabbis are expected to say yes to things their male counterparts are never even asked to do). And there are, to my utter dismay, rabbis who sully the title with scandals.

For those of us who entered the rabbinate with fear and trembling, who believed the title would be something to earn every day of our career, who hoped that the community would respect us even more than love us, who believed that the rabbinate was a sacred calling, those four men may be a dying breed. We rose in hope that they're not.

Israel's nuclear opacity

Iran's burgeoning nuclear program has reawakened primal fears in Israel that its very existence is at stake. Israel, however, is still the only country in the Middle East that possesses nuclear weapons, even if Israel officially declines to acknowledge that fact. Israel's long-standing policy of nuclear opacity, known in Hebrew as amimut, has allowed Israel to build a nuclear arsenal while minimizing tensions with its Arab neighbours and the United States, its superpower ally.

Amimut, says Avner Cohen in The Worst-Kept Secret: Israel's Bargain with the Bomb (Columbia University Press), has been strategically and politically useful, having been clear enough to deter enemies yet opaque enough to be tolerated.

Cohen, a specialist on the subject and the author of Israel and the Bomb, published in 1998, believes that while amimut has greatly contributed to Israel's defence, it has outlived its usefulness. In his view, this "helpful fiction" has become "increasingly incompatible with contemporary democratic values at home and with the growth of international norms of transparency." It is thus time, he argues, for Israel to reconsider its policy of nuclear ambiguity.

In this thoughtful and impressive work, Cohen – a senior fellow at the Monterey Institute of International Studies – revisits the origins of Israel's nuclear program and explains Israel's unwritten understanding with the United States concerning such weapons before launching into a discussion of why the concept of amimut has become outmoded. By analyzing these important and timely topics, Cohen leaves us with a deeper appreciation of vital security issues in the Mideast.

David Ben-Gurion, Israel's first prime minister, was the guiding force behind its momentous decision to acquire a nuclear arsenal. In 1955, shortly after coming to power for the second time, he decided that Israel's future as a Jewish state could only be assured with the acquisition of such a formidable capability.

Ben-Gurion settled on the bomb as Israel's "ultimate guarantee for survival in a hostile environment," Cohen writes, citing his "never again" philosophy in the wake of the Holocaust. "Today, almost universally, Israelis believe that this fateful decision was the perhaps the wisest he ever made."

According to Cohen, Ben-Gurion's rationale for building a bomb was rooted in his pessimism about Israel's long-term conventional capabilities vis-a-vis the Arabs and his optimism regarding its technological prowess. Cohen claims that Ben-Gurion launched Israel's nuclear project virtually alone and in utmost secrecy.

Working in league with France,

then its closest ally, Israel began construction of the Dimona reactor in 1958.

On Dec. 21, 1960, Ben-Gurion delivered what would be his only public statement about Dimona, deceptively describing it as a strictly civilian nuclear research centre. He assured the United States that Dimona was exclusively designed for "peaceful purposes." But Washington knew better.

For U.S. diplomacy, Dimona was a vexing challenge. On the one hand, Israel was a small and pro-American nation surrounded by enemies that had vowed to destroy it. On the other hand, the notion of a nuclear-armed Israel was seen as antithetical to U.S. global and regional interests.

"President John F. Kennedy was fearful that without decisive international action to curb nuclear proliferation, the number of nuclear-weapon states would inevitably rise," Cohen writes.

Kennedy also feared that Israeli nuclearization would touch off another Arab-Israeli war. On the basis of these concerns, he demanded annual access to Dimona to verify the nature of Israel's nuclear program. Kennedy, in toughly worded letters to Israel's prime minister, Levi Eshkol, warned that Washington's commitment to Israel's security "would be seriously jeopardized" if his inspection demands were spurned.

With his back to the wall, Eshkol acceded to U.S. pressure in August 1963. American visits to Dimona were, Cohen says, "ineffectual." Kennedy's successor, Lyndon Johnson, was "less adamant" on nuclear non-proliferation in general and on Israel's nuclear program in particular, Cohen observes.

Perhaps, as Cohen suggests, Israel mollified the Johnson administration by privately and publicly pledging "not to be the first to introduce nuclear weapons to the Middle East." By the mid-1960s, he says, Israel had completed the necessary research and development to build an atomic weapon. The director of the Israel Atomic Energy Commission at that time was Israel Dostrovsky, who died last autumn.

During Richard Nixon's presidency, the United States urged Israel to sign the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, but Israel resisted.

Urging caution, Henry Kissinger, Nixon's national security adviser, wrote a memo proposing toleration of "Israeli activity" if Israel did not assemble "a completed nuclear device." Kissinger added that no Israeli prime minister could "give up completely an advantage deemed vital and achieved at considerable cost." Nor, he noted, could the United States force Israel to destroy "any nuclear devices or components it may now have."

Cutting to the core of the issue, Kissinger wrote, "Our interest is in preventing Israel's possession of nuclear weapons. But since we cannot – and may not want to try – to control... Israel's nuclear program and since Israel may already have nuclear weapons, the objective we might achieve is to persuade them to keep what they have secret."

In short, Kissinger's memo laid the groundwork for the United States' historic agreement with Israel on nuclear weapons.

At a White House meeting in September 1969, Golda Meir, then Israel's prime minister, told Nixon that Israel had a nuclear arsenal and promised to keep it untested and undeclared. In return, the United States agreed to end its visits to Dimona and apparently agreed not to pressure Israel to sign the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.

Richard Nixon

Golda Meir

These oral understandings, Cohen says, were formalized in a secret exchange of letters between Kissinger and Meir's successor, Yitzhak Rabin.

In 1998, Bill Clinton, the U.S. president, promised Benjamin Netanyahu, the Israeli prime minister, that the United States remained committed to Israel's preservation of its "strategic deterrent capabilities." A decade later, Clinton's successor, George W. Bush, reaffirmed the Nixon-Meir accord.

In Cohen's opinion, amimut no longer benefits Israel. As he puts it, "The bottom line is that amimut is costly for the democratic spirit, not only because it constitutes reluctance by governments to take public responsibility for its actions, but also because it sends the wrong signal about how [Israel] ought to conduct its most existential affairs."

Amimut, he adds, implies that Israel's case for possessing the bomb is weaker than those of declared nuclear states. "This exceptionalism is unfair to Israel's own interests today."

Nor has amimut deterred Iran or Syria from trying to acquire the bomb, he points out.

Yet Cohen acknowledges that amimut has permitted Israel to flourish in a bad neighbourhood and lowered the intensity of the Arab-Israeli conflict.

After 31 years working at the TTC I retired in 1988 on pension and investment income.

My brother Stanley got me into Romspen 10 years ago. Today my Romspen investment has tripled in size. Combined with my TTC pension, I earn much more today than when I was working. Truth is, I would not be able to enjoy my independent lifestyle otherwise. Every night I say a prayer for the boys at Romspen to continue to be healthy and successful. Young adults get involved in social action

Over 250 learn about volunteer opportunities

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

More than 250 people recently attended The Projects launch party to learn about volunteer opportunities and get involved in Jewish social action.

Held on April 10 at 6 Degrees nightclub, the event encouraged guests to donate time instead of money to make a change in the community. More than 2,000 volunteer hours were raised for 15 different Jewish social service agencies.

The Projects is a collaboration of seven major Jewish organizations in Toronto: The House, Annex Shul, Impact Toronto, Birthright Alumni Community, UJA's Community Connect, Jewish Urban Meeting Place and Hillel Toronto.

"This collaboration was a result of all the agencies wanting to create a robust social-action portfolio, offering young adults the opportunities to volunteer as much as possible," said Alana Kayfetz, manager of volunteer initiatives at Community Connect.

"The Projects allows all of the organizations to work together in equal partnership. Helping those in need is incredibly important for us as young Jewish adults and is at the heart of Jewish values and belief. By working together, we will strengthen this community and allow for it to prosper in a way that is truly meaningful."

Kayfetz said she hopes The Projects "will become the central address for young Jewish Torontonians to get involved and know that they will make a difference for the betterment of the local community and society."

The Projects also featured some of Toronto's best and brightest young Jewish volunteers, who were nominated for the Top 20 Under 40 for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's agencies.

"This was an opportunity to give honour and to celebrate those who have been dedicated to giving back their time and have set great examples of how to live generously," Kayfetz said.

Justin Lebofsky, who volunteers for Jewish Addiction Counselling Services Toronto, and Yoelit Lipinsky, who volunteers for Mount Sinai Hospital, were both presented with awards at the party.

"Volunteering feels great. Those who are dedicated leaders are modest and do not really have an opportunity to be recognized by their friends. This was an opportunity to give them a chance to shine, give them the honour they deserve and allow them to act as role models for the young Jewish community at large," Kayfetz said.

Jessica Taylor, who was nominated for her volunteer work with the Birthright Alumni Community, said she was "truly honoured to be included amongst a group of people who do such great work in the community. I know most of us volunteer because we have causes we care about, and we're not looking for praise or recognition, but it's great to see that the community appreciates the work being done."

This year, Taylor is one of the chairs for BAC2FASHION, a charity fashion show that raise money for vulnerable seniors. She is also a mentor in the Birthright leadership training program and will be chaperoning the Young Adult March of the Living.

"I think The Projects launch party is such an important event as there are so many great volunteer opportunities in the community, but people don't necessarily know that they exist or how to get involved," Taylor said.

"Recognizing the top volunteers also helps show the community that the volunteer work being done is valuable, needed and appreciated."

Aside from being a time-raiser, the party also had a dessert and candy buffet, live art by Jessica Gorlicky, a performance by the band Little Black Dress and raffle prizes.

Young professionals help raise $37,000 for ICRF

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

More than 200 young professionals recently networked and socialized with industry leaders at ICRF Next Generation's Revolving Tables.

The April 7 event, held at the Toronto Board of Trade, raised $37,000 for the Israeli Cancer Research Fund (ICRF).

The evening was structured around a three-course meal, at which each participant was assigned to a table hosted by a top Toronto executive. As moderators and mentors, the executives answered questions and told inspiring stories. After each course, guests switched tables for a new networking opportunity.

Participants were asked to prioritize their areas of interest so they could be placed at tables with the appropriate mentors. The categories included law, entertainment, consulting, real estate, sports, media and authors.

Some of the executives involved in the event were Warren Kimel, general manager and vice-president of Fabricland; Cherry Tabb, CEO and co-founder of Herzig Eye Institute; Ken Aber, co-founder and owner of Blueprint Business Architecture; Ellen Schwartz, founder of Project Give Back and Jacob's Ladder; Warren Bongard, vice-president and co-founder of ZSA Legal Recruitment.

"The executives were chosen because their personal and professional experience is such that the attendees could learn from their successes and be inspired by their journey," said Joy Wagner, ICRF executive director.

"Their combined experience and prominence in their industry is admirable, and the opportunity for guests to hear their stories and learn from their expertise was a selling feature of the event."

Kyle Lichtman, event co-chair along with Lianne Vineberg, said the event was "an overwhelming success." The mentors enjoyed communicating with the young professionals, and the participants appreciated the opportunity to get up close and personal with the business leaders.

Elyte Barzilay, an MBA candidate at the University of Toronto, said she decided to take part in Revolving Tables "not only because it was in support of a great cause but because it presented the opportunity to network with other young professionals in a sophisticated setting."

Barzilay said the event allowed her to converse with interesting people of diverse backgrounds. "I most enjoyed the time I spent speaking with the CEOs. It is rare to be granted access to such accomplished individuals who want to share their knowledge and successes with you."

The executives are not only leaders in the business world but also in the Jewish community, said Lichtman. "It is inspirational for the next generation to see how important it is to give back and to be involved."

Many of the executives are supporters of ICRF, said Wagner. "To be able to utilize their passion for philanthropy... correlates very much to ICRF's modus operandi of recognizing potential and fostering it in leaders."

Philanthropy is fundamental to the Jewish community, Wagner said. "This event not only raises money for charity, but is a real-life manifestation of our shared values. Each executive is not only a professional mentor or adviser but rather, they physically prove that involvement in community and ongoing investment in the next generation is just good practice."

Progressive Judaism growing in Israel, says rabbi

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Many people who visit Israel have noticed a strange phenomenon. A good number of Israelis, although they live in the land of the Bible, aren't particularly knowledgeable about Judaism or Jewish traditions.

Ask them why their familiarity with Judaism is lacking or why they rarely attend synagogue and you might find they bring up the haredim.

To put it delicately, they don't really see themselves as having much in common with the Orthodox, who have a monopoly on state-sanctioned religious life in Israel.

But, according to Rabbi Gilad Kariv, "the dichotomy between the Orthodox and the secular" is changing. "The Israeli Reform movement, together with other partners, is changing this paradigm."

Rabbi Kariv, executive director of the Israeli Movement for Progressive Judaism, believes Israeli society is beginning to embrace alternative ways to living a Jewish life. Secular Jews are turning to Judaism and more and indicators of Jewish life, such as attending synagogue and giving their children a Jewish education, are increasing.

Rabbi Kariv was in Toronto earlier this month as a guest of ARZA Canada. While here, he addressed Reform congregations and attended a weekend kallah, a gathering in which participants discussed political, social, cultural and religious developments in Israel.

Israelis' skittishness at anything religious is fading as more and more of them search for meaningful ways of expressing their spirituality, he said.

It's part of a global trend toward faith and spirituality, and in Israel, which has succeeded in achieving many of Zionism's goals of building the country, it's part of a search for a new collective identity.

The Canadian Reform movement is playing a key role in the religious renaissance embracing Israel, Rabbi Kariv said. Not only are local congregations twinned with Israeli counterparts – leading to visits and various exchanges – they help finance the "ganim," preschools that they hope will draw more and more families to the Reform orbit.

Currently, the data show Israelis are taking to Progressive Judaism, albeit in modest numbers. There are 25 Reform congregations in Israel, but in the last two years, 10 new ones have been added.

Some 10,000 families are "affiliated with us," said Rabbi Kariv, and another 50,000 come in contact with Reform through schools, cultural centres, seminars or in other ways.

The movement operates 60 preschools,

Rabbi Gilad Kariv

along with eight elementary and high schools. It also supports a youth movement, pre- and post-army programs and various cultural offerings.

Reform rabbis officiate at hundreds of weddings each year, but the couples fly abroad for the foreign wedding certificates that are recognized at home.

Hundreds of people – many from the former Soviet Union – are converted by Reform rabbis, although these, too, are not recognized as legitimate by the establishment rabbanut, he said.

Rabbi Kariv believes the prognosis for the future growth of Reform is encouraging. A survey taken three years ago showed about half the Israeli population "experienced more than once our spiritual or educational services."

Non-Orthodox Judaism is becoming more and more normalized in Israel, he continued. Many viewers of Israel's most popular television show, A Star is Born, a sort of American Idol program, watched a female cantor perform. In an exchange with the show's hosts, she told viewers she leads services in a liberal, egalitarian congregation in Tel Aviv. "The entire audience applauded," Rabbi Kariv noted.

Another example of normalized non-Orthodox Judaism occurred on a popular sitcom in which a family discussed plans for a boy's bar mitzvah. The family considered holding it in a Reform synagogue so the mother could sit with her son, Rabbi Kariv said.

Reform Judaism satisfies the needs of many Israelis seeking a spiritual outlet, he said. "Our congregations are established by young families who want to educate their children in a communal Jewish framework and attend services.

"We offer education, cultural, and intellectual experience, Jewish music and art, literature, social action – tikkun olam." Those are the aspects of Judaism that engage people and ensure they remain committed to their Jewish identity, he said.

'Renewal' rabbi brings message to Toronto

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Google "Reb Zalman," and you'll find about 250,000 hits for the founder of the Jewish Renewal movement, which combines elements of mysticism and Chassidism with newer concepts like feminism and eco-kashrut.

Rabbi Zalman Schachter-Shalomi, 86, says he has "mostly retired from leadership," and doesn't travel much any more.

In an interview last week at the Toronto home of his son Rabbi Shalom Schachter, the Colorado-based Reb Zalman (as he is commonly known) said his participation this Shabbat morning, April 23, at Darchei Noam is "a very exceptional thing."

Rabbi Schachter-Shalomi – who hyphenated his name following the signing of the 1978 Camp David accords, with the idea that he would drop the "Schachter" once there was peace – will lead Torah study from 9 to 10 a.m. He will also take part in services and share insights with the congregation. His son, whom he ordained in 2005, will be involved in the service as well.

Earlier this month, father and son were in Calgary, Alta. where Shalom's brother lives, for an intergenerational Shabbat weekend at two congregations.

Rabbi Schachter-Shalomi, who taught at the University of Manitoba from the mid-1950s to the mid-1970s, now spends much of his time writing – completing what he calls his "December work" because of his age and the approach of life's end. He is retired from Naropa University, where he taught contemplative Judaism and ecumenical spirituality.

Aside from Renewal – in which the late Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach also played a key role – Rabbi Schachter-Shalomi's other focus in recent years has been "Spiritual Eldering." Its philosophy is reflected in the title of his 1995 book From Age-ing to Sage-ing: A Profound New Vision of Growing Older.

Born in Poland and raised mostly in Austria before his family made its way to New York in 1941, the future rabbi was educated in both a "leftist" Zionist high school and an Orthodox yeshiva. His father was a Belzer Chassid with liberal tendencies, according to the rabbi's website (rzlp.org).

An online chronology of his life euphemistically refers to his 1966 "graduation" from Lubavitch, following experimentation with LSD and subsequent writings about the psychedelic drug.

He educated himself about other paths as well, among them Sufism and Buddhism.

As a result, he now believes that Judaism is "organismic.

"To start saying that one religion has it all is like saying that the whole body could be made of kidney."

He says Jewish Renewal offers what Jewish seekers may look for or have found elsewhere – including meditation, singing, and repetition of mantras.

Personally, he said, he found Chassidism "very satisfying," and considered himself a "card-carrying" Lubavitcher. In the late 1940s, the Lubavitcher Rebbe, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, directed him and Rabbi Carlebach to reach out to college students.

However, with time, he found there were things about Chassidism that "didn't belong to the new paradigm," like the separation of men and women, and the necessity for "a great deal of observance."

Given his exploration of other paths and the resulting censure he faced from Chassidim, what led him toward Renewal rather than disenchantment with Chassidism, or even with Judaism altogether?

"Let me ask this inside," he said, closing his eyes for a moment to ponder the answer.

Religions are disappointing, he said, "but God is not... while I may have given up on a form of Judaism, I didn't give up on God. To me, the issue of living a godly life is the important thing."

The rabbi has no objection to people calling Jewish Renewal a denomination – "Let them do it, gesunterheit!" he says – but he sees it more as "a method" than a fifth denomination.

There is only one congregation in Canada listed on the website of Aleph: Alliance for Jewish Renewal, although others have a Renewal approach, and elements of Renewal can be found in synagogues of other denominations including Darchei Noam, which is Reconstructionist.

Worldwide, Renewal communities can be found in nine countries.

Although the rabbi said he didn't know yet what he would be focusing on when he speaks at Darchei Noam, he would like to help people with what he calls "davenology."

Explaining the term, Rabbi Schachter-Shalomi said that to become closer to God, people need to open their hearts and minds and learn to use the siddur "as a road map for an inner journey."

Reciting a prayer is not going to help them get closer to God, he added.

His message for the Jewish community? "Every Jew is a Jew by choice. Make sure you live your choice, and love your fellow Jew regardless of his affiliation."

Correction

In the article "Clergy to lead faith groups on mission to Israel" (April 14), the Israel Government Tourism Office was incorrectly listed as a trip organizer. The interfaith trip is being organized solely by Aufgang Travel, Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, Judy Csillag and a committee of faith-based community leaders.

Israeli singer to make Toronto debut

Yosef Tastassa
Special to The CJN

The popular Israeli singer Einat Sarouf makes her Toronto debut next month.

She promises the audience "a big Israeli party" at Kachol-Lavan school's annual fundraiser on May 15.

"Coming to Toronto makes me feel good," Sarouf told The CJN. "Performing outside Israel is always very exciting. The Israeli crowd is wonderful. People open their hearts during the show. They are filled with enthusiasm and accept me with open arms.

"I come from a Zionist home and performing abroad is a shlichut for me. I bring a cultural message to the crowd. The words, music and atmosphere remind the Israelis so much of the country they really miss and love."

Sarouf invited the local Israeli and the Jewish community to the show. "Everyone from the ages of zero to 120 and over are invited. The repertoire will include classic Israeli songs, modern songs, and I will sing both in Hebrew and in English," she said.

She said that the presence of Kachol-Lavan: The School For Hebrew And Israeli Studies, which has two locations in Toronto, means that the Israeli children here are "educated in the Israeli way.

"In our modern world, adults find themselves living in many places around the world for many reasons. No matter where people live, the education their children are given is very important… That gives them language, culture, values and of course identity, which is so important for the future.

Einat Sarouf

"I am honoured to perform in Toronto for that cause," she added.

The Kachol-Lavan fundraising evening is being organized by Avi Bogler and Lani Gozlan. The Consul General of Israel in Toronto and Western Canada, Amir Gissin, and the president and CEO of the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Ted Sokolsky, will be the evening's honoured guests.

Kachol-Lavan school was founded more than five years ago and is now a solid part of Toronto's Israeli community. The school operates on Sundays at two Jewish school campuses. A third campus is scheduled to open in Thornhill Woods next year, to meet the demand of many young Israeli families living in the area.

The fundraiser take place at the Canadian National Institute for the Blind, 929 Bayview Ave. at 7:30 p.m. For more information about the school and/or the event, contact 905-482-1818, ext. 208, or info@kachol-lavan.com.

People with Alzheimer's 'celebrate life'

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

People with Alzheimer's are viewed through a lens that highlights their capacity to engage in activities, relate to others and express emotion, in Celebrating Life, the photography exhibit now on at Baycrest.

Sponsored by Alzheimer's Disease International, the exhibit, by photographer and sociologist Cathy Greenblat, combines uplifting photographs of people around the world with text by international care partners, researchers, medical experts, care providers, activists and people with dementia themselves. It will be on display at Baycrest until May 25.

"Cultural and arts activities offer a vehicle for expression for not only the person with Alzheimer's, but also their caregivers, and so both the act of photographing and the activities photographed are evidence of what is possible, even with a devastating illness," said Aviva Babins, creative projects and museum co-ordinator at Baycrest.

Ashwani and Didi

Mrs. Morimoto singing

Greenblat has been engaged in the cross-cultural project on aging, dementia and end-of-life care since 2001. Through her images, she aims to help viewers find ways to make loving care and laughter more frequent, and to reduce the fear and stigma that surround dementia.

"The images in the exhibit demonstrate how the arts can contribute toward enhancing quality of life. The countries in focus are global – Japan, France, India and the U.S.A. – but the message is the same," Babins said.

"At Baycrest we recognize the importance of enlivening our environment with meaningful cultural and arts displays for the benefit of our residents, families and staff," she added.

"We were approached by Alzheimer's Disease International to display Cathy Greenblat's work to coincide with their conference [late last month]. Cathy's imagery is both powerful and compassionate and speaks to the continued need for social connection, creativity and life engagement despite the Alzheimer diagnosis."

Babins said the exhibit reinforces Baycrest's message of health and wellness promotion.

Greenblat's photography shows that while the losses created by degenerative brain disease are real, people with Alzheimer's can continue to engage meaningfully with others in their lives, wherever they live.

One of the images shows a Japanese woman, Mrs. Morimoto, singing in her group home in Kyoto. The text beside it reads: "Though she could no longer speak clear sentences, she loved singing. Whenever old songs from her childhood were sung, she clearly articulated all the words."

Another image shows an Indian woman, Mandakini, chanting with her granddaughter, Srushti. The text reads: "Mandakini could no longer live alone as she became more confused. Her third son, Satish, and his wife brought her into their home, where they take care of her with the assistance of a professional caregiver. Their two-year-old shows no fear, and eight-year-old Srushti has found that her grandmother enjoys the religious chants that have been important to her throughout her life."

Jeanette

The Baycrest community has responded positively to the colourful images, Babins said. "Both the photos on display and the accompanying text serve as springboards for conversation. Residents have commented on what has resonated for them in this exhibit."

One resident, while looking at the photo of people with Alzheimer's visiting the Louvre museum in Paris, commented on the last time he visited France with his late wife. Another spoke of the positive message of hope that the photographs depict.

"Baycrest staff have reflected on the message of looking for the person behind the disease label. Family members have recognized positive attributes of their own loved ones as they viewed the display. Every image seems to form a new meaning for each viewer," Babins said.

Celebrating Life can been seen at Baycrest in the Water Cooler, open Sunday to Thursday, 9 a.m. to 4 p.m.

LOVING ISRAEL IN COMPLICATED TIMES

MONDAY, MAY 16, 2011 7:30 PM
CONGREGATION HABONIM, 5 GLEN PARK AVE. (BATHURST & GLENCAIRN)

No one has a monopoly on what it means to be "Pro-Israel."

Jews outside of Israel who love Israel should be able to express support in a way that reflects their values. Too many are walking away because they refuse to accept that their relationship with Israel can only be defined as "Israel right or wrong" or as "Israel always wrong." There is an alternative: to love, support and engage with the real Israel: precious, imperfect and passionately worth fighting for.

Sokatch, a dynamic speaker, has also served as Executive Director of the San Francisco Federation and has been named to the Forward newspaper's list of notable leaders on four separate occasions.

We need to accept each other

Rabbi Eleanor Steinman

Do you remember being a teenager? No matter how far back we go in our memory, in addition to the fun memories, we may recall some hurtful, scarring moments when we were reminded that, in some way, we were not the same as everyone else.

As adults, we know that peer pressure and the desire to fit in are a part of the growing up process, as hard as it can be. There are times, though, when this teasing or harassment is taken to an extreme. This we call bullying.

This doesn't mean those instances when someone may have once felt left out unintentionally. Bullying is humiliating, shaming, threatening or intimidating someone into acting or thinking a certain way. Too many of us are bullied because the way we live as Jews doesn't meet or match someone else's expectations. It feels like some sort of contest with unwritten rules that leaves some on the inside and far too many on the outside.

Instead of seeing our fellows for the things that they do, the actions they take, the tzedakah they donate, the foods they eat, the festivals they mark, far too much time is spent telling people they don't do enough. Their prayers aren't valid, their rabbis aren't "real," their conversions aren't kosher, their prayers go unheard. Those among us who claim to have God on speed dial or a hidden measure of quantity versus quality use their knowledge to shame others.

The bullying must cease.

Our tradition teaches that all Jews have the potential to be holy. It is for this reason that God addresses the Israelites in the second person plural. It is clear that for Jews to be holy, they need a community around them. This was true for Noah and Abraham and it is true for us. Holiness is heightened when we can stand together as a community.

We challenge the desire for holiness when, instead of welcoming another Jew with open arms, we pass judgment. It is imperative that we all respect one another enough to tolerate our differences. The Israel Movement for Progressive Judaism said it correctly in its ad campaign: "There's more than one way to be Jewish."

Rabbi Edythe Menscher recounts this story: "A rabbi was accosted by a group of pro-Nazi thugs. One of the teens held a bird cupped in his hand and said, 'Tell me, rabbi, since you Jews are supposed to be so wise and holy – is the bird I am holding alive or dead? I will show my friends how stupid you Jews really are!'

"The rabbi thought carefully before he responded. He knew that if he said, 'The bird is dead,' the bully would release it and affirm for his followers that Jews are fools, inciting more aggression; and if he said, 'The bird is alive,' the bully would squeeze it to death. The rabbi said softly, 'The answer, my son, is in your hands.'"

The bullying must end. We need one another in order to maintain a thriving Jewish community.

Rabbi Eleanor Steinman serves Temple Sinai Congregation of Toronto.

The tension within Pesach

The holiday of Pesach is known to be the time of our redemption. It ushers in spring, so it's also the time of rebirth. In ancient Israel, it was one of the three pilgrimage festivals that united the whole country. We celebrate with seders, family meals, ritual and symbolism.

Within all the celebrations of Pesach lies a keen awareness of the two realities that create a tension within the holiday. While we're gaining redemption and rebirth, thousands of Egyptians are experiencing suffering and death. These two opposites are recognized by Pesach, and it's worth reminding ourselves of their tension.

Midrashic Moments

Rachel Turkienicz

It begins with the plagues in Egypt. Each plague is viewed from both sides of the event: by the Israelites and by the Egyptians. For example, the first plague, turning the Nile into blood, sends different messages to the different peoples. On the one hand, the Nile was viewed by the Egyptians as a source of life, keeping the land fertile during famine. Turning it into blood sends the message that God is the master of life, not the Nile. Only the master of life can turn it into blood, the symbol of death, in an instant.

But to the Israelites, this first plague sends a different message. Pharaoh had decreed that all baby boys were to be thrown into the Nile. What cloaked itself as religious sacrifice – giving the baby to the Nile god – was indeed murder. From the view of the Israelites, the Nile was already filled with blood, the blood of their baby boys. God turning the Nile into blood was just stating the obvious and forcing the Egyptians to see what they'd done.

This two-sided perspective is maintained all the way through the plagues, culminating at the Red Sea. While fleeing the Egyptians, the Israelites are backed into a corner at the Red Sea. Moses facilitates the parting of the water so that the Israelites can pass safely in the middle. Once they're safe, the Egyptians chase them into the parted water, at which point it returns to its proper place, drowning the Egyptians. The double statement is not subtle. The event that is the threshold for our rebirth, a threshold for life, is simultaneously the threshold for death to the Egyptians.

When we recite the plagues at the seder, we reduce the amount of wine in our cups as a symbol of reducing our joy. We're aware of the cost in human suffering that was involved with our freedom. It's a beautiful moment of Jewish philosophy.

Even at the utmost moment of our despair, we're not allowed to ignore the suffering of others. When celebrating our moment, we also mourn for our enemies, who could not change their behaviours and save themselves.

There's a powerful midrash that teaches us this important lesson. When the Israelites arrive safely on the other side of the Red Sea, they begin to sing a song of praise to God. It's a beautiful song describing how we were saved and the enemy was vanquished. The midrash states that at that moment, the angels also joined in with the song of praise. God immediately turns to the angels and commands them to stop singing. God's words in this midrash are: "My children are drowning in the sea and you sing me praises?"

Pesach is not just about our celebration. It's also about celebrating our sensitivities.

Rachael Turkienicz is director of rachaelscentre.org.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Our Aegean connection

The Aegean Sea is a place of great beauty, which Homer immortalized in two epic tales, the Iliad and the Odyssey.

Today tourists crisscross it on modern cruise ships and marvel at its scenic splendours. It is also a region that has come into contact with ancient Israel on a number of occasions

Archeology has revealed evidence of an early Aegean presence in Canaan by the second millennium BCE. Amazingly, at Tel Kabri, four miles east of the Mediterranean, a Minoan-style palace has been found with the miraculous remnants of Minoan frescoes still visible.

The Minoan civilization was centred on the island of Crete and flourished in the first half of the second millennium BCE. Its largest site, Knossos, was excavated in the first decades of the 20th century by the legendary English archeologist Sir Arthur Evans. Evans found an amazing culture built around large, airy, spacious and monumental palaces. Evans called the culture "Minoan" after the legendary king of Crete, Minos. He also found a number of scripts, but the one associated with the Minoans, which he called Linear A, has yet to be deciphered.

The most famous Minoan discovery of modern times has been the town of Akrotiri on the island of Santorini, or ancient Thera. Today, Santorini is a major stop on the Mediterranean cruise itinerary. It is a scenic wonder whose enchanting beauty has been used in numerous films. More importantly for archeologists, Santorini has proven to be a modern Minoan Pompeii, with the remains of buildings three storeys high still standing. Beautiful frescoes have been found on its inside walls, giving us a rare glimpse of life in the Aegean world more than 3,500 years ago.

Past Forward

Alex Gropper

It was probably artisans from this culture who designed the palace at Tel Kabri during the middle part of the Middle Bronze Age (circa 2000-1500 BCE). This was a high point in the history of ancient Canaan, when its culture held sway from the Nile to the Euphrates rivers. It is even thought that a group of Canaanites, whom the Egyptians called the Hyksos, ruled part of the land of the Nile.

Magnificent remains from this period have been found throughout Israel. One that particularly stands out is a monumental gate found at Tel Dan in northern Israel that dates from the Middle Bronze Age. Archeologists digging at Tel Dan also found a spectacular tomb full of Mycenean pottery.

The Myceneans came from the Greek mainland getting their name from the mighty citadel of Mycenae in northern Peloponessus. It was the Myceneans who took over the Minoan culture on Crete after 1500 BCE. Their script, based on Minoan Linear A, was called Linear B and was deciphered as an archaic form of Greek in 1952 by an amateur English scholar, Michael Ventris, in one of the greatest feats of modern scholarship.

Despite the fact that our faith was forged in the crucible of Sinai, the Mediterranean and its various regions, such as the Aegean, have also left their mark on ancient Israel. It is such traces that tantalize the archeologist with their possibilities.

Jewish wedding music

Traditionally, weddings are not held during Passover. Who could take the additional stress over food? And though there are differing customs, fewer weddings are held between Passover and Shavuot, a period of semi-mourning. But after Shavuot, the Jewish wedding dam bursts. That means that right now, there are countless couples counting down the days as they plan special ceremony. And that means choosing perfect music. Here's some help.

As the chatan – and then his kallah – make their way to the chupah, the right music can help create a sublime atmosphere. Rabbi Andrea Frank has put together a marvellous page with full-length songs, including Erev Shel Shoshanim, Eshet Chayil, Zemer Atik and L'chi Lach by the late Debbie Friedman. As well, there is a lovely introduction to the importance of music in Jewish religious ceremonies from days of King David all the way to contemporary synagogues. [http://bit.ly/jwed01]

WedAlert also provides some great music samplings. These are not full renditions, but the first minute or so of classics such as Siman Tov, Bei Mir Bist Du Schoen and a large helping of Fiddler on the Roof. You've probably heard them all a million times before, but if you hadn't, they wouldn't be classics. [http://bit.ly/jwed02]

One of the highlights of a Jewish wedding ceremony is the singing of the Sheva Brachot, the blessings during which the chatan and kallah are wished "gila, rina, ditza v'chedva, ahava v'achva, v'shalom v'reut," rejoicing, jubilation, pleasure and delight, love and brotherhood, peace and friendship. If you are going to being honoured with reciting one of the blessings,

Jewish & Digital

here is a site where you can listen to a performance, and read the brachot in Hebrew, in English and in English transliteration. [http://bit.ly/jwed04]

Chazzanut.com provides sheet music for the Sheva Brachot. According to the site, the fifth blessing, Samayach Tesamach, is set to a tune from Mozart's Die Zauberflöte! [http://bit.ly/jwed14]

Is it me or it getting a bit noisy in here? I enjoyed this discussion about whether Jewish wedding music is getting too loud. One argument: "Music is meant to be listened to and enjoyed... not digested by every pore in the body." And a response: "lol... us young folk thrive on booming loud music... just don't stand too close to the speakers!" [http://bit.ly/jwed08]

If you'd like to try out some less familiar melodies on your special day, visit the Wedding section of the Zemerl website. You can listen to renditions of about a dozen Yiddish, Hebrew and Bukharian songs, and read the lyrics and translations of about 20 others. [http://bit.ly/jwed11]

Even if you're not planning a wedding – or yours was ages ago – you can still celebrate vicariously. Many couples have posted videos of the wonderful music that helped make their day special. [http://bit.ly/jwed12]

But let's leave the last word to Rabbi Eliezer Azikri, a well-known kabbalist from the 16th century. "One of the main expressions of fervent love is that the lover sings songs of love – so we should sing before God." [http://bit.ly/jwed13]

Toronto resident discovers lost Yiddish letters

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

North York resident Debbie Rose, who has been fervently researching her family tree for the past several years, has located a trove of old Yiddish letters of historic and family significance that she hopes to get translated into English.

The letters, some dating back to the end of the 19th century, belong to a relative in Albany, N.Y., who inherited them from his grandfather, Leon Malmed, who was Rose's great-great-uncle – the uncle of her grandmother.

Malmed was an Albany delicatessen owner and a close associate and lover to anarchist Emma Goldman. The letters were sent to him from his friends in various places.

"There may be a thousand letters in all, maybe more," Rose said. "They haven't been counted. There are just boxes and boxes of them."

Another 450 letters, postcards and telegrams from the same collection, most from Goldman to Malmed, were donated some years ago to the Schlesinger Library at Harvard. (An avid correspondent, Malmed didn't save copies of his own letters, most of which are presumably lost.)

Malmed's grandson sent Rose an assortment of 15 letters, which she had professionally translated. One was written by a soldier stationed in San Antonio, Texas, in 1898 during the Spanish-American War, just before he was to be shipped to Manila. Another came from a friend about to get married, who apologized that he would have to stop writing because his wife was kissing him and he had to kiss her back.

Debbie Rose with Yiddish letters

"Some of them are personal family letters," Rose said. "They're good for genealogy. From one letter I was able to reconstruct the entire branch of the family tree."

But she contends the letters have a universal appeal as well because they provide a privileged glimpse into the radical Jewish milieu of about 75 to 100 years ago.

A Russian-born Jew, Malmed came to the United States about 1895 and was variously a cigarmaker, delicatessen operator, and proprietor of a hosiery store in Albany. Despite his business activities, he was an anarchist at heart and became swept up in the radical movement.

Even though he had a wife and three kids at home, he went on the road with Goldman and had an affair with her that lasted years. He died in 1956.

"He was a very colourful character," Rose said. "He got up and left his wife and family to travel all over the United States [and Canada] with Emma Goldman. His poor wife, you can see the amount of stress she was under in the letters she wrote to him."

A corporate English as a second language trainer, Rose said that the Jewish Family History Foundation of Encino, Calif., has offered to provide a U.S. tax receipt to anyone willing to contribute funds towards translating the letters, and that the National Yiddish Book Centre of Amherst, Massachusetts has also been "very enthusiastic" about them.

She is seeking professional translators as well as one or more patrons willing to underwrite the translation project. She may be contacted via email at bdebrose@rogers.com.

Is she excited at the prospect of having these mysterious missives translated? "That's an understatement," she replied, smiling. "It's tremendously exciting because you don't know what you're going to find in them."

Christians seeking ketubahs

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

About two years ago, Michael Shapiro, founder and president of Ketubah.com, a provider of customized Jewish marriage contracts, noticed a new and surprising trend in his solidly Jewish customer base.

For the first time, Christians were ordering ketubot. The orders were coming from the United States.

"There is something about a fine art ketubah that is appealing to people of many different backgrounds," said Shapiro, who marks the 15th anniversary of his Toronto-based business this year.

Thanks to this intriguing trend, Christian couples currently account for roughly 10 per cent of his customers, the vast majority of whom are Americans.

In an attempt to explain this cross-religious phenomenon, Shapiro speculated that many of his Christian clients want ketubot after having attended a Jewish wedding.

Still others may want to personalize their union with a unique touch.

Judging by a recent story in the New York Times, a growing number of Christians wish to incorporate the ketubah into their wedding plans at a time when pluralism and cultural improvisation are on the increase.

This trend converges with three contemporary developments: the rise of Christian Zionism, particularly among evangelical and born-again Christians; the explosive growth of mixed Christian-Jewish marriages, and the New Age movement's search for spirituality in multiple-faith traditions.

As a result, the New York Times says, more and more Christians have adopted such Jewish practices as holding Passover seders, studying Kabbalah (think of Madonna) and buying kosher food.

Christians who buy a ketubah from Shapiro's online company usually order the text in English rather than Hebrew, he said.

Whether they are Christians or Jews, customers who log on to ketubah.com can choose from a selection of 800 user-friendly designs.

Each ketubah, aside from being hand-numbered and bearing the artist's signature, is printed in a limited edition, with high-quality archival paper and inks to last a lifetime.

Now 45, Shapiro started Ketubah.com out of a desire to be his own boss and do something that personally appealed to him. "The combination of Judaism and art fit the bill perfectly," he explained.

Born in Montreal, the son of Barry and Monica Shapiro, he grew up in Westmount, a leafy and affluent mid-town neighbourhood.

His parents gave him a sound Jewish education, sending him to the Jewish People's and Peretz Schools and Bialik High School. He also credits his parents with teaching him what he describes as "the ethic of innovation and creativity."

Shapiro studied history and Spanish at the University of Toronto, thinking he would be a lawyer, like his father. But after graduating, he worked for a mortgage company and then earned an MBA degree from the University of Michigan in Ann Arbor.

Later, he was a brand manager at Procter & Gamble, where he honed his skills in strategic business planning.

In 1994, on the recommendation of a friend, he went to Jerusalem to enrol at the Pardes Institute of Jewish Studies, an independent yeshiva that is not affiliated with any religious or political movement. He spent six months in Jerusalem immersing himself in classical Jewish texts, and now says he had "an exceptional experience."

Looking for a way to fuse his expertise in business with his desire to be close to Judaism, Shapiro began seeking out Jewish artists in Jerusalem. Convinced he could earn a living jazzing up and selling Jewish marriage contracts, he started Ketubah.com.

City manager's report upsets community

'Our responsibility in Toronto is to fight intolerance and demonization'

Despite the group's decision not to take part in this year's parade, Jewish and pro-Israel groups were still dismayed by city manager Joseph Pennachetti's report, which council commissioned last year to determine whether QuAIA contravened Toronto's anti-discrimination policy.

Pennachetti's report said city staff determined that the phrase "'Israeli apartheid' does not impede the provision of services and employment provided directly by Pride or the city to any group on any grounds provided for in the policy."

It continues: "To date, the phrase 'Israeli apartheid' has not been found to violate either the Criminal Code or the Human Rights Code (Ontario). However, a decision on the latter would have to be made by the Human Rights Tribunal of Ontario. The city also cannot, therefore, conclude that the use of the term on signs or banners to identify QuAIA constitutes the promotion of hatred or seeks to incite discrimination contrary to the code."

The report was slated to be considered by the city's executive committee on April 20, the second day of Passover. However, the mayor was reportedly considering referring it to a later date to avoid a conflict with the holiday.

Apple said she "strongly disagrees" with Pennachetti's report. Prior to QuAIA's announcement, Kulanu had planned to register a complaint about the group via Pride's new dispute resolution process instead of waiting to see if the city would adopt Pennachetti's report.

In statements last week, Congress, federation, the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center (FSWC) and Pasternak, among others, all denounced the document's conclusions.

Farber said he "respectfully" disagreed with it, adding that using the Criminal Code of Canada and the Ontario Human Rights Code as the basis for the decision "employs too narrow a standard."

"The very definition of discrimination is when you treat one group of people differently from another based on their ethnicity, religion or country of origin. QuAIA are attempting to do just that," Farber said.

English said the federation was also "very disappointed" about Pennachetti's report.

"In labelling Israel [as an apartheid state, QuAIA] brands supporters of Israel supporting crimes against humanity" and thus seeks to spread hatred against Jews, he said.

Pasternak said he was "shocked and dismayed" by the report.

"Our responsibility in Toronto is to fight intolerance and demonization. Therefore, QuAIA should never be allowed to participate in a civic funded event," he said. "This might also require a very serious look at how the city's anti-discrimination policy is drafted. If it cannot stop this kind of discrimination, then it needs to be tightened up."

FSWC president and CEO Avi Benlolo said his organization was "deeply disappointed" by the report.

Conservative Party targets Liberal stronghold

Ron Csillag
Special to The CJN

Mark Adler

Kurtis Baily

Ken Dryden

Rosemary Frei

York Centre, in the heart of Toronto, is said to be among the GTA ridings the Conservatives are targeting aggressively. It has been Liberal since 1962, and has seen its share of high-profile MPs: Robert Kaplan, Art Eggleton and now, former Montreal Canadiens star goalie Ken Dryden.

It was once considered a safe Liberal seat, but the Tories have significantly narrowed the gap. In the 2006 election, Dryden defeated his Conservative opponent, Michael Mostyn, by 10,000 votes. Two years later, his margin of victory over Rochelle Wilner, a former B'nai Brith Canada president, had shrunk to about 2,000 votes.

York Centre runs north-south from Highway 401 to Steeles Avenue West. Its approximate eastern boundary begins at Yonge Street in the north then cuts west north of Finch Avenue to Bathurst Street, where it continues to the west branch of the Don River.

The western boundary begins at Keele Street in the north, to Grandravine Drive, to Black Creek and down to Sheppard Avenue, where it cuts west and then south down Jane Street.

It has one of the country's highest proportions of Jewish residents, at 24 per cent. There's a strong concentration of Jewish voters hugging the traditional Bathurst Street corridor, many of them immigrants.

Looking to wrest the seat from Dryden is Mark Adler, a businessman and founder, president and CEO of the Economic Club of Canada.

Making his first stab at public office, Adler, 49, pulled no punches when he talked about an "election that none of us wanted and was forced upon us by the opposition coalition."

He said the "number 1 issue" in the riding is the economy mixed with fears of a shaky government by opposition parties.

"People are very concerned that we are into an unnecessary election that the coalition partners have forced [on] Canada. We have a very fragile economy and the Harper government has put in place a number of measures to bring us out of the recession, the deepest recession we've had since the Great Depression.

"We are on course, and now, we have to fight an election that was forced upon all of Canada."

Voters themselves are using the word coalition, Adler said, and they fear one. Asked whether voters are raising the contempt of Parliament charge levelled against the Conservatives, he said, "no."

Prime Minister Stephen Harper cannot be assailed for his record on Israel, said Adler, who is active in Beth Jacob V'Anshe Drildz and Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda synagogues in Bathurst Manor.

Jewish voters are "very impressed with the firm stand that Stephen Harper and the Conservative government have taken with respect to Israel. The support for Israel and the support for the Jewish community... have been unwavering and unequivocal."

Adler, who was born and raised in the riding and whose father was a Holocaust survivor, said Canada's support for Israel is worth it "even if it costs" the country snubs on the world stage. He agrees that an attack on Israel is an attack on Canada.

Despite several attempts by telephone and e-mail, The CJN was unable to reach NDP candidate Kurtis Baily by deadline. He's making his second attempt to win York Centre for the New Democrats. He received about 12 per cent of the vote in 2008.

Baily's Facebook page, which describes him as a student at York University, contains his views on a variety of matters, including the environment, poverty, Native issues and national sovereignty.

Dryden, 63, who visited Israel when he was minister of social development, said he's hearing "a lot" about the Middle East on the hustings, but also about "two great points of pride" among Jewish voters: one on matters of social justice and the "important" role Jews have played in such areas as poverty, affordable housing and health care, and the other on the Jewish tradition of discussion and debate.

"People have noticed Mr. Harper's style and [that] he isn't comfortable with differences of opinion and does not provide forums for public discussion and debate. I hear that a lot."

But has Harper's strong and clear support for Israel cost the Liberals a lot of Jewish votes they used to take for granted?

"I have absolutely heard that," conceded Dryden, who was first elected in York Centre in 2004. "What I also say is that the support from the Liberals for the Jewish community, going back to the time of the foundation of the State of Israel, has been very strong."

He argued that it was under former Liberal prime minister Paul Martin that Canada's votes on four key Arab-sponsored resolutions at the United Nations shifted to a more Israel-friendly stance, "the same or almost the same" position as under the Tories.

Harper's talk of a Liberal-NDP coalition is "really inappropriate," Dryden said.

"We have said clearly that that's not what we would do, expressly and explicitly. A very unfortunate result of last five years in the way Mr. Harper has governed is that he has given a bad name to the phrase 'working together.'

"Minority governments can work. And for all the qualities Mr. Harper may have, one of the qualities that isn't there is that instinct and attitude to work together. That is just not his way."

Running for the Green Party a second time is Rosemary Frei, a 47-year-old freelance medical writer. She polled 6.5 per cent of ballots cast in 2008, about the national average for Green candidates.

The economy is a major issue, Frei said, but so is radiation exposure, or "e-smog" from Wi-Fi and cellphone towers. "People are saying, 'We're not happy with cellphone towers being set up atop apartment buildings.'"

Frei estimates there are between 75 and 100 cellphone towers in the riding, while Wi-Fi is being installed in hospitals and nursing homes, where "some of our most vulnerable citizens are being assaulted with radiation."

She said evidence of harm from this kind of radiation is well-established at the biological level, and that Canada is lagging behind the European Union in establishing standards. The Green Party has called on industry minister Tony Clement to issue warnings.

Frei is a founding member of Ve'ahavta, the Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee, and has served on the board of Nishma, an Orthodox outreach group.

On the Tories' support for Israel, Frei noted that "the Talmud itself says you have to look after the needy in your area first, but that doesn't seem to penetrate. People turn a blind eye to Harper's increase of the deficit and debt.

"Israel is very important, but Jewish values also talk about the widow and the orphan. We're forgetting that, unfortunately."

THE WARSAW GHETTO AS SEEN THROUGH NAZI EYES

Before World War II Warsaw, Poland was the second largest urban concentration of Jews in the world. It was the centre of Jewish learning, Zionism and Jewish socialism, the Bund in Europe. Above all it was the target of Adolf Hitler and his minions. If you were to exterminate the Jewish people, their history, their culture and their religion, Warsaw was the Nazi primary focus.

Musicians who served in IDF perform for Yom Ha'atzmaut

Lauren Kramer
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Every Yom Ha'atzmaut, Vancouverites are treated to the music of a vibrant, young Israeli band, and this year is no exception.

The group Mozaica will be starring in this year's performance at the Centre in Vancouver for Performing Arts on May 9, and event co-chairperson Stephen Gaerber says the audience is in for a treat.

"Mozaica will perform traditional favourites that people will recognize, but they'll also include a number of more current songs as well – the type of music that young Israelis are listening to today. Their concert will be upbeat, joyous and a lot of fun," he says.

Eti Lam, Mozaica's manager, says the band's goal is "to bring the spirit of Israel's independence celebrations to the Jewish community in the same way it is celebrated in Israel. The energy and vivaciousness of young performers will capture and uplift your heart, and we welcome the opportunity to include our extended family as we celebrate our existence, our strength and our future."

The eight members of the group served in the army as singers and musicians. "They weren't a group in the IDF [Israel Defence Forces], but they have the same background, and all share [the] experience [of] being part of an army band," Lam says. All are in their early 20s, and have performed in Israel, Europe and the United States. On their upcoming trip to Canada, they will be stopping in Edmonton before returning to Israel.

"Vancouver Yom Ha'atzmaut audiences really enjoyed Dor Chadash and Kan Noladeti, two groups we've featured in the past that also came out of the IDF entertainment troupes," Gaerber says. "Since it's been a few years since we've had the chance to see true up-and-coming performers, 2011 seemed like the perfect time to feature Mozaica, a vibrant group of young Israeli performers, many of whom are already making names for themselves through their solo careers."

Supported by 59 local Jewish organizations, Yom Ha'atzmaut is one of the best attended and most popular Jewish events in Vancouver. "The vibe and energy of 1,500 people celebrating Israel together, singing along and dancing in the aisles, is absolutely incredible," Gaerber says. "It's a great opportunity to celebrate Israel and to feel part of the community."

He adds that thanks to contributions from individual and corporate sponsors, ticket prices are very affordable and those who cannot afford to purchase tickets are given them at no charge through the Tickets to Inclusion program, and distributed through Shalom BC and the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver.

Census data required to plan for services

The federation analyzes census data only from the long form – issued once a decade in years ending with the digit "1"– because only the long form asks questions on ethnicity and religion.

One-third of all Canadians will receive the voluntary NHS long form, compared to 20 per cent who used to get the mandatory one, but Shahar said that the apparent advantage of sending it to more households "is completely cancelled out by the voluntary nature of the survey."

He said there needs to be "at least" an 80 per cent response rate to the NHS for the data to be considered reliable.

Shahar said the federation in Montreal is especially targeting haredi Jews, Russian Jews and Israelis in the campaign to fill out the voluntary NHS, since they might be "less inclined… for various reasons."

Similarly, the campaign will also target those who might be "less responsive" to the voluntary NHS, such as the poor, the uneducated, renters and immigrants.

"It might be true that these groups are less inclined to answer" a voluntary form, Shahar said, but "those are exactly the groups we are targeting for services."

Linda Kislowicz, CEO of UIA Federations Canada, said the long census has been used as a Jewish community planning tool in areas related to education, seniors and poverty. "It could determine allocation of funding.

"If we don't get a large critical mass of people [completing the survey], it won't be useful."

UIAFC is working with local federations to reach people in their communities through synagogues, organizations and advertisements in order to encourage them to fill out the forms, Kislowicz said.

A meeting will be held May 5 in Toronto for executive directors and lay leaders of all Jewish communal organizations about the importance of the survey to the Jewish community and how they can mobilize their constituencies to take part.

'Neutral' reporting obscures murderous truth

"Violence Rises as Israel and Hamas Trade Blows," the headline to the April 9 New York Times story by Fares Akram and Ethan Bronner, was typical of the coverage of renewed violence around Israel's southern border. That is to say, the impression that what transpired was just more "tit-for-tat" fighting between Israel and Gaza dominated the reporting. "Israel said its attacks [killing three more militants" in Gaza on April 9] were in retaliation for a Hamas missile strike on an Israeli school bus on [April 7] that critically wounded a 16-year-old boy. Hamas said it fired at the bus because Israel had killed three militants last week."

The problem with this sort of neutral tallying or score-keeping is that news outlets thereby fail to convey a "deeper" but basic truth. "Tit-for-tat" is part of the story, but it's far from the whole story. It doesn't convey the crucial fact that Hamas and groups operating in Gaza adhere to a policy of firing rockets into southern Israel in order to kill Israeli civilians deliberately.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Conveying truth that requires providing essential background or context doesn't mean a reporter is taking sides.

Some media analysts have noted that in an age of relativism – when truth is often deemed to be relative to different sides in a conflict – it's unrealistic to expect a correspondent to decide what is "objectively" true. Others would say this is a cop-out and an approach not applied elsewhere in the Middle East.

Journalists, for example, had no problem reporting from Egypt in January about the truth concerning the clash between those protesting for freedom and forces supporting the repressive, corrupt regime of Hosni Mubarak. Many of the same journalists are now forced to struggle with the question of whether Egypt is moving toward democracy, despite the most recent crackdown by military authorities on protesters. This uncertainty should not impair their responsibility to seek the truth.

Returning to Akram and Bronner's account (told primarily from Gaza), their "neutrality" extended even further: "Sami Abu Zuhri, a Hamas spokesman, said that militant groups were restraining themselves and that their rocket attacks were 'restricted and controlled.'" No mention was made that such attacks, intentionally launched against civilians, are deemed to be war crimes. By allowing the term "restricted and controlled" to go unexplained and unchallenged (as though if it were true – which it's not – this would mitigate the crime), the Times left the impression, even unwittingly, that Hamas is somehow trying to act responsibly. If the inclusion of that sentence wasn't meant to convey irony, it's as risible as it is absurd.

Hamas terrorists fired a tank missile at this school bus last week in southern Israel. [Israel Sun photo]

But it's Akram and Bronner's attempt to strike "balance" between what Hamas and Israel said about the April 7 rocket attack on the school bus that's noteworthy: "A spokesman for the military wing of Hamas who calls himself Abu Obeida said the Israeli school bus hit on [April 7] was moving between military installations on a road usually used by the military and from which shells were often fired at Gaza. Col. Leibovich, the [Israeli] military spokeswoman, said both assertions were groundless. The bus had been dropping off children and using a normal civilian road, she said."

The Times' Isabel Kershner had reported the previous day that the "military wing" of Hamas had claimed responsibility for targeting the school bus. She noted that Hamas had issued a statement claiming that this attack was "an initial response to the occupation's crimes." (Still, Kershner also fell into the trap of tit-for-tatting when she spoke about the ebb and flow of violence along the border marked by "heavy rocket and mortar fire from Gaza" and "repeated Israeli air strikes in Gaza.")

To find the deeper, contextual truth about what really went on, one had to turn to an April 11 National Post editorial that referred bluntly to Hamas' "indiscriminate bloodlust" for Israeli civilians and Jews – of any age.

If only the truth – as opposed to unsubstantiated opinion – contained in this editorial were present in the Times news reports.

McGill U principal defends Israeli university ties

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — Heather Munroe-Blum, McGill's principal, has defended the university's ties with Hebrew University of Jerusalem, accusing opponents of cowardice.

In an April 4 letter, Munroe-Blum responded to an editorial in the university's main student newspaper, the McGill Daily, calling for the rescinding of the first formal partnership between the two universities, announced last fall.

"The suggestion that McGill cease to engage with another bona fide university – any bona fide university – because of political controversy in that university's geopolitical environment goes against everything McGill stands for," she wrote. "It suggests a cowardice that I, as principal of this great university, categorically reject."

McGill University and Hebrew U have agreed to collaborate in the areas of epigenetics, international business, food safety and water management, and human rights law.

In association with the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University, more than $1.5 million has been raised privately to realize these academic and student exchanges. Munroe-Blum was presented with Hebrew U's highest citation, the Mount Scopus Award, at a dinner in Montreal last November for her personal effort in solidifying the ties.

The Daily editorial especially objects to a joint program on human rights law. McGill's Centre for Human Rights and Pluralism and Hebrew U's Minerva Centre for Human Rights are set to inaugurate a credit-granting summer program. The focus will be on each country's experience in accommodating cultural diversity.

McGill students are being offered the opportunity to study this August at Hebrew U, and their Israeli counterparts are to study in Montreal in 2012, rotating between the two cities every year after.

The editorial board of the Tribune, an independent campus newspaper run by students, wrote that "through this program, McGill is effectively supporting the legal apparatus that has allowed the State of Israel to systematically discriminate against Palestinians in the occupied territories, as well as in Israel."

The Tribune also finds fault with Hebrew U itself, charging that it expanded into occupied land in east Jerusalem and that it has ties with the Israel Defence Forces.

The paper also carried a report that a group of McGill law students met with university administrators last month to express their opposition to the partnership.

Munroe-Blum said the contention that the partnership could contribute to or worsen the plight of Palestinians is "without foundation."

"Your inability to separate geopolitical issues from knowledge-based research projects conducted by respected scholars is evidence of a clouded vision…

"It is this view – that we should avoid engaging with any scholars on such important issues – that every member of the McGill community should find most troubling."

Young adults asked to help plan Ottawa's Jewish future

Diane Koven
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The face of the Jewish community is changing and its organizational structure will have to change dramatically to ensure future continuity.

That was the message of a one-day symposium held here April 3 Called "openOttawa." Organized by the Jewish Federation of Ottawa, the aim was to engage the community's young adults to help determine what direction the organized Jewish community will take, with the idea that what worked in the past won't necessarily work in the future

Co-chaired by Naomi Hirshberg, a federal public servant, and Howard Fremeth, who lectures in communications at the University of Ottawa, the event was attended by approximately 60 young adults and 10 community leaders.

"We recognize that there are many people… in Ottawa who are not connected with the organized institutions, and the idea was to reach out to them to figure out how to better make these connections between the lay-leaders and the organized Jewish community," Hirshberg said.

"The openOttawa symposium committee undertook a social mapping exercise. We identified nodes in the community – public service, health care, youth groups, new to Ottawa – to name a few, and then people we thought fit these nodes. The committee members contacted people and invited them to the symposium."

Guiding and facilitating the day were Josh Avedon and Shawn Landres, co-founders of Jumpstart, a Los-Angeles based organization that calls itself a "thinkubator for sustainable Jewish innovation." Other speakers were Scott McGrath, leadership chair of the Annex Shul in Toronto, and Eli Malinsky, director of programming at the Centre for Social Innovation in Toronto.

Participants took part in break-out groups and discussions on a variety of topics: "Community organizing – how to take an idea and move it to action"; "Engineering serendipity – how do you find something that you are passionate about?"; "Young adult engagement – how do you connect young Jewish adults?"; "Diversity and inclusion – how do we build that?"; "Spiritual and cultural communities – what that 'new Jewish' feeling is", and "Social action and activism."

Young Jewish adults engage in discussion at the recent openOttawa conference.

"Over time, it became clear to the organizing committee that openOttawa cannot be conceived as just a one-day symposium," Fremeth said.

"Instead, we begin to think of it as a process or conversation about transforming the way young adults are engaged. To keep the conversation going, we will have more, less-formal symposiums open to anyone. We are also meeting with participants to discuss the implementation of initiatives raised at the symposium," he added.

Hirshberg concurred. "Engaging the young Jewish generation is an issue in cities across Canada, and Ottawa initiated the conversation with the openOttawa symposium on this issue and to make improvements within our community now and for the future."

PJ Library marks first year in Vancouver

Lauren Kramer
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The PJ Library program in Vancouver is a year old now, and as children age out of the program, 60 new spots are opening up this spring and summer.

The program started five years ago in western Massachusetts as an initiative of Jewish philanthropist Harold Grinspoon. Today, there are some 60,000 kids across North America receiving books as part of the PJ Library – including children in Montreal, Calgary and Winnipeg.

Kids are eligible from birth to age five, and receive 11 books and one CD a year per subscription. All the subscriptions are free to the recipient, though their cost is $100 each. Of that $100, $60 comes from the Harold Grinspoon Foundation and $40 is provided by matching funds from regional Jewish agencies, synagogues and donor families. The Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver earmarked $150,000 last year, when the program began, to see it through to 2013.

"There's been no new money set aside since then," says Becky Solomon, director of marketing and communications at federation. "But we've been running a lot of outreach programs in outlying areas like White Rock and Burquest, taking services to the areas where people are living. These are families for whom it's not easy to connect to the Jewish community, so this is a really important opportunity for them."

At a recent Pesach program at the Jewish Community Centre, children heard a Passover story and made cushions for their seats at the seder table. At the Purim carnival a few weeks ago, there was a PJ Library story time as well. "It's important not just for the kids, because programs like this allow parents connect with each other, too," says Solomon.

The Levitt family is one of 360 local families receiving books as part of the program, and Stacey Levitt says her 22-month-old daughter, Aliya, always picks one of the PJ Library books first. "Passover!, by Roni Schotter, is her current favourite, Levitt says. "It's helping us introduce Passover traditions and stories to her in way that she can connect with. She can point to the Passover foods in the book, and she's even learning the Hebrew words for them, which is pretty cool. She'll be able to recognize them when we're at the seder."

Students get active

Calgary Hillel's vice-president of Israel affairs, Cara Lebenzon, waves an Israeli flag at an April 1 Israel Day tabling event at the University of Calgary. The international relations student said the event's information, videos and literature exposed students to Israel's cultural, technological and humanitarian accomplishments. The Israel Day table also promoted the Canadian Federation of Jewish Student's Size Doesn't Matter campaign – meant to present Israel in a positive light – and featured a free falafel and Israeli salad lunch.

From left, Jewish students Lauren Chad, Kortney Shapiro and Rebecca Silverhart raised awareness and funds last month at the University of Western Ontario for the One Family Fund, an Israeli organization that helps victims of terror with financial support, psychological counselling, therapeutic workshops and support groups. Inspired by the terror attack in Itamar last month in which five members of the Fogel family were murdered, Shapiro helped launch the student-led One for One campaign under the auspices of the One Family Fund. In just one day, the students raised more than $220 and hope to expand the campaign to campuses nation-wide.

Israeli ex-pats adjust to being Jewish in Canada

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

When starting a new life in a foreign country, it's normal to face challenges in adapting to a different culture, language, and climate.

But some Israelis who immigrated to Toronto years ago didn't realize how different the concept of belonging to a Jewish community would be here compared to the environment they left behind.

Ora Shulman, 51, said that when she and her husband decided to move to Toronto in the mid-1980s, she quickly learned that feeling Jewish in Toronto takes more of an effort than it does in Israel.

Shulman, vice-principal of Associated Hebrew Schools' Posluns campus on Neptune Drive, said that when she lived in Israel, she "could feel the presence of Shabbat when the Egged [public transportation] buses stopped their service, and the siren announced that Shabbat is beginning. While I was not so observant myself at this time, I was surrounded by the atmosphere around me, and when everything came to a standstill, I knew Shabbat was there."

Shulman said that when she came to Canada, she realized that "it is my responsibility to create rituals and symbolism to distinguish Shabbat from other days and to find new meaning in the concept of Shabbat, as the inherent practices in Israel are not present here."

Rabbi Israel Landa, who came to Toronto as an emissary of Chabad-Lubavitch in 1989, and is the director of the Chabad Israeli Community Centre, said that each Israeli who moves here goes through his or her own process of coming to terms with the differences between being a Jew in Israel and being a Jew in Canada.

"Israelis come from a 'default' Judaism. The traffic in the street reminds you if it's Shabbat or Yom Kippur, the language is the biblical language and everything is intertwined with the family," said Rabbi Landa, who leads an Israeli congregation at the Lubavitch shul at Chabad Gate in Thornhill.

"But people in Israel are making a mistake by thinking that you don't need more than that – that you don't need religion because they have Israel and the language."

He said that when they come here, they're faced with a new situation.

"All of a sudden, they don't know what it means to be a Jew. The traffic doesn't do it for me. The newspapers don't do it for me. I have to do it for me. So there is a search for meaning, a search for understanding and identity."

Israel Meidan, who immigrated to Toronto in 1986 when he was 35 years old with his wife and two children, said he was brought up in an observant home in Ramat Gan.

He said that about four years after they moved to Toronto, they realized that they weren't able to fulfil their Jewish needs on their own.

"We felt that, to quote my wife's words, that once in Canada, one needs to belong to a community to be able to keep our Jewish heritage and roots alive," Meidan said.

"The way life in Israel is arranged – and I'm talking about the relationship between the people and the shul – is different from what it is here. In Israel, one simply walks into a shul and he doesn't need to be member, because [shuls are supported by] the government."

Shulman said the concept of belonging to a synagogue is much more central to Jewish Canadians, because it serves as a centre for Jewish life.

"The celebration of holidays and life-cycle events are connected to the synagogue. When I was in Israel, this was not as much the case. Life here forces one to put their 'Jewishness' into practice," Shulman added.

Rabbi Landa, who estimated that there are about 50,000 former Israelis in the Greater Toronto Area, said that even if Israelis do go to shul, they most likely aren't members.

"That concept doesn't exist in Israel. In Israel, religion and state is one. The government builds the synagogues, pays the rabbis and buys prayer books every two years. So it's very foreign to them," he said.

Meidan said that since he and his wife decided to reach out to Rabbi Landa and the Chabad community, his family has become much more observant and connected to the Israeli community here.

"Now, I pray three times a day. I used to... only do it during Shabbat or holidays," he said.

Shulman and Meidan both said that they've become more observant since they moved to Toronto, because feeling like they're part of the Jewish community depends on their direct involvement.

But Anat Hoffman, executive director of Jerusalem's Israel Religious Action Center, a legal advocacy arm of the Reform movement in Israel, said that some of her experiences growing up in Jerusalem actually turned her off from being more observant.

"Talk to the Israelis in Toronto," she said. "They will tell you they started to warm up to Judaism at minus 20 [degrees] in Toronto, because of rabbis that actually could talk to them, teachers who didn't tell them what they're not, but told them what they could be."

She said when she was 10 years old, her grandmother sent her into an Orthodox synagogue to tell her grandfather to come home for lunch.

She was stopped by a man who said, "Girl, doesn't your mother teach you how to dress?" and kept her from giving him the message.

"That person that kicked me out thought he was protecting Judaism. What he did is stop me from going to shul until I came to [Los Angeles] 10 years later," Hoffman said.

Hoffman believes that attitudes like those is what makes Israeli immigrants the hardest Jews to attract to synagogues.

"They were exposed to a state religion that they rejected."

Rabbi Landa said that he sees that in some of the Israelis he serves in Toronto.

"They come with a negative feeling toward the establishment. They are not fans of the establishment system."

So when they are asked to become members of synagogues and become affiliated with Jewish organizations, they are wary of doing so.

One of the ways that Rabbi Landa reached out to the Israeli community in Toronto was by establishing a congregation where "they speak Hebrew, there is no one at the door collecting tickets, and no fees."

Manny Yehoshua, 63, who moved to Toronto in 1994, said that when he lived in Israel, he observed Shabbat and all the Jewish holidays, but like Hoffman, he has negative memories about the Orthodox community.

Yehoshua explained that when he and his family moved from Iraq to Israel in the 1950s, when he was just a toddler, they were part of the Ma'aborot, Jews who lived in refugee camps that were erected to accommodate Jewish European and Middle Eastern refugees.

Yehoshua said they lived in a tent for 2-1/2 years and later moved to a shack, where they resided for another six years, near the Orthodox town of Bnei Brak.

He said he recalled the way Orthodox European Jews would look down on his family.

"They never accepted us as Jewish. Even my father who would be on his way to the synagogue... they would call us 'goyim.' I really didn't like them. They rejected us. I felt really bad. I thought, 'My father, who was on his way, with a kippah, to the synagogue, they called him a goy?' I couldn't understand that," Yehoshua said.

Despite the discrimination his family faced from other religious Jews, he never distanced himself from the religion, which he credits to his parents who always set an example at home.

Still, he recalled that as a teenager, when he was a soldier with the Israel Defence Forces, he was skeptical about the Chabad representatives who visited his army base as part of their outreach initiative.

"To me, the Chabad people were like the neighbours who had called us goyim."

Yehoshua said that he didn't feel the need to go to shul regularly, and like most other Israelis, he would only go on the High Holidays.

However, that attitude changed once he moved to Toronto. He realized that he would have to lead his children by example in the same way that his father did.

After connecting with the Israeli Chabad community, Yehoshua said he is more observant here in Toronto than he was in Israel.

"There's no doubt about it. I go every Shabbat to shul, and I never used to do that," he said.

"I have a lot of respect for Chabad and what they're doing. I can't imagine myself without Chabad the last 14, 15 years. I'm quite sure we'd be at least 30 per cent less [observant] that what we are now. Whether or not you have a kippah on your head, you are equal. You can go and learn whatever you want."

Rabbi Landa, who has developed a reputation as an Orthodox rabbi who serves a secular community, said that his strategy to connect with the Israeli community is not to approach it like an Orthodox rabbi would.

"It's my title, but I'm not doing the work of a rabbi, preaching and teaching. My work is not rabbinical work," he said.

"It's about helping them with their Jewish needs."

From Twitter to Tura prison

Opinion

The Arab spring has turned into a gloomy autumn. The revolution in Egypt, which at first seemed to be a spontaneous uprising of the Facebook and Twitter generation, is gradually beginning to resemble the revolutions we are familiar with from other places. The overthrown ruler and his sons were taken this week from the place where they were under house arrest in Sharm el-Sheikh to full detention. There are no happy revolutions. The violence merely changes sides.

Hosni Mubarak was arrested and interrogated next to his hospital bed while his sons were taken to the Tura prison in Cairo, where the Israeli, Azzam Azzam, was once imprisoned. Gamal Mubarak, wearing a track suit and unshaven, seemed like a pale shadow of the heir apparent in a smart suit he was a few months ago. "He couldn't believe it was happening to him," a source in the Egyptian prisons service told the official organ Al-Ahram.

There is no protracted investigation in Egypt, no wavering over an indictment or a hearing for senior officials, as in Israel. First they arrested former ministers in the Egyptian government, and after they revealed what they needed to in the interrogation room, it was time for arrest warrants against the former leader and his sons. The demonstrators in the square demanded Mubarak's head, and the generals supplied them with the goods.

What happened to Mubarak explains the determination of the other tyrants in the Arab world to fight for their rule. That is why Syrian leader Bashar Assad is shooting those who demonstrate against him. Libyan leader Moammar Gadhafi is "fighting to the death," and the Yemeni president is refusing to step down even after the Americans have removed their patronage of him.

The Saudi royal house, which rules over the least democratic regime in the region, is carrying out its war of survival across its borders, in Yemen and Bahrain. That is where the struggle between Iran and the United States over hegemony in the region will be decided.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu met with then Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak earlier in the year. Over the years they had developed a strong mutual rapport. [Israel Sun photo]

Last week, Thomas Friedman wrote a melancholy article in the New York Times about how the Arab revolution had lost its naiveté and now resembles the breaking up of Yugoslavia rather than the "velvet" revolutions of eastern Europe. Friedman is still hoping that democracy will triumph in the Middle East as in eastern Europe, but it seems that he, too, has understood that Tahrir Square is not the Berkeley University of California campus of the 1960s.

Friedman's bewilderment reflects the helplessness felt by the governments in the West that want to be seen as supporting freedom and democracy, while at the same time preserving their strategic outposts and avoiding military entanglements. The result sounds like "The Uncertain Trumpet," the name given to his book by the American strategist of the 1960s, General Maxwell Taylor: fighting against Gadhafi in Libya, but only from afar and with a small force so as not to dirty one's hands and prevent losses that will look bad at home. Speaking in favour of freedom and against repression but shaking with fear lest the regime in Saudi Arabia collapse, and with it the oil economy on which the western way of life depends. Presenting the revolution as a popular uprising and understanding that the real battle is for hegemony over the Middle East, and is being conducted with the classic tools of struggles for power and control.

And just as the revolution has returned to familiar patterns, so, too, the attitude toward Israel. The euphoria of the early days, when the demonstrators concentrated on calls for democracy, ended last Friday with a demonstration by 2,000 people outside the Israeli embassy in Cairo. The candidates to replace Mubarak have become more extreme in their expressions against Israel, and the temporary regime is growing closer to Iran and wants to amend the natural gas contract with the Israel Electric Corporation. From their point of view, this is the ideal policy – the right-wing government in Jerusalem is isolated in the international community, and it is possible to attack it as much as they want without having to pay any price in Egypt's ties with America and Europe.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu will continue to miss Mubarak, knowing full well that he will have a much more difficult time with his replacement, especially at a time when Israel is fighting a rearguard battle against having to leave the territories under international pressure.

Netanyahu concerned

JERUSALEM — Three months into the Egyptian revolution, Israel is concerned that the new government's policy toward Israel could become hostile, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu told European Union ambassadors last week in Jerusalem.

"I am very concerned over some of the voices we've been hearing from Egypt recently," Netanyahu told the envoys. "I'm especially concerned over the current Egyptian foreign minster's statements."

Netanyahu's remarks echo the opinions of some senior Foreign Ministry officials following statements made by senior Egyptian officials and demonstrations of thousands of Egyptians outside the Israeli Embassy in Cairo and its consulate in Alexandria.

A senior Foreign Ministry official said a few senior Egyptian officials have uttered harsh statements in the past two weeks and even called Israel "the enemy." Egyptian Finance Minister Samir Radwan, for example, referring to the possibility of Israeli investments in Egypt, said Egypt did not need investments from "the enemy."

This statement angered Israel, especially in view of Egyptian requests in the past months for help with investments or in receiving more aid from the U.S. Congress.

A minister from the forum of seven – the government's top seven ministers – told Ha'aretz that in Israel, there are fears that as the September elections in Egypt draw closer, candidates will make harsh anti-Israel statements to win public favour.

Violence continues in Syria

JERUSALEM — A senior Syrian military officer was assassinated over his unwillingness to open fire at anti-government protesters, websites linked to Syrian opposition groups said on Monday.

According to the report, a Syrian colonel was killed along with two of his sons as part of what the opposition websites are calling a new policy by Bashar Assad's regime, geared at getting rid of officers who show sympathy toward protesters.

The report came as human rights groups claimed earlier Monday that Syrian forces killed 12 protesters overnight in the central city of Homs in clashes after the death of a tribal leader in custody.

"Homs is boiling. Security forces and the regime thugs have been provoking armed tribes for a month now. But civilians in large numbers also took to the streets in different areas of Homs last night and they were shot at in cold blood," the rights campaigner told Reuters.

The violence comes shortly after Syrian security forces killed three mourners on a highway outside the town of Talbiseh, slightly north of Homs, on Sunday, when they opened fire on a funeral that had turned into a demonstration, two witnesses said.

Hamas rejects Schalit deal

Citing an Israeli political source, the newspaper A-Sharq al-Awsat reported last week that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu had offered Hamas a deal in exchange for Gilad Schalit, the Israeli soldier who was abducted by Hamas in 2006. The deal was accepted by the movement's political branch but rejected by its military wing. The reported differences have led Netanyahu to give up on that proposal, the source supposedly said, adding that the offer had been better than the one offered by former prime minister Ehud Olmert. Hamas has been insistent in its demand that some 1,400 prisoners be released from Israeli jails in return for handing over Schalit. Israel has balked at a number of the names on Hamas' list – which includes some responsible for deadly terror attacks in Israel – agreeing to free around 980 prisoners. Negotiations have stalled numerous times.

PA asks for $5 billion

The Palestinian Authority is asking western countries for nearly $5 billion (all funds US) in order to develop a Palestinian state. PA Prime Minister Salam Fayyad announced his plans to representatives of western countries during a meeting last week in Brussels, Reuters reported. The plan calls for $1.467 billion in 2011, $1.754 billion in 2012 and $1.596 billion for 2013. It reportedly will be presented formally to donor countries at a pledging conference in June. "The journey has been long and arduous, but the end is now in sight. We are now in the home stretch to freedom," Fayyad wrote in the plan's introduction, according to Reuters.

U.S. blocks Quartet initiative

The United States reportedly blocked an initiative by other major powers to outline an Israeli-Palestinian peace settlement. The three other members of the Quartet guiding Middle East peace talks – the United Nations, the European Union and Russia – had pressed for publication of such an initiative as early as last week, the Associated Press reported. The United States, which usually leads the Quartet initiatives, nixed the idea, saying it was not the right time. Such an outline would include borders and solutions for the Palestinian refugees and for sharing Jerusalem. Talks have been stalled since September, when the Palestinian Authority walked out, ostensibly because Israel would not extend a partial freeze on settlement building.

Suspects arrested in Itamar murders

Mazal Mualem

JERUSALEM — Israel will not agree to have its citizens massacred, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said on Sunday, following the arrest of two suspects linked to the deadly Itamar terror attack.

He said the arrest of the two Palestinian teens proved that Israel would always reach and punish those who attempt to harm its citizens.

Netanyahu's comments came after a gag order lifted earlier Sunday revealed that Israeli security forces have arrested two teenage residents of the West Bank Arab village of Awarta for allegedly carrying out last month's murder of five family members in the settlement of Itamar.

Palestinian students Amjad Awad, 19, and Hakim Awad 18, both admitted to committing the murders.

Five members of the Fogel family were brutally stabbed to death in their home in the West Bank settlement of Itamar on the night of March 11. The murderers killed Ehud and Ruth Fogel, along with three of their young children, Yoav, 11, Elad, 4, and Hadas, 3 months old, before fleeing the scene.

The two suspects, who are unrelated to each other, were identified as members of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, along with several members of their families.

Speaking at a ceremony marking the replacement of Israel's Prison Service's chief, Netanyahu said Sunday that, while he did not expect the arrest would lift the Fogel family's spirits, it was nonetheless evidence that "we won't accept the massacre of our own people.

"We don't know if arresting the killers provides a complete answer, but without it, even a partial one is impossible," the prime minister said.

According to the lifted gag order, six additional Palestinian suspects were also arrested in connection to the crime, four of whom belong to the same family.

The six purportedly aided the two alleged perpetrators in hiding the murder weapon and in suppressing additional evidence.

One of the six is a member of the Popular Front organization, whom the suspects supposedly asked for a weapon to carry out a terror attack.

Another one of the six is a resident of Ramallah at whose home the murder weapon was hidden.

Shin Bet investigators have not said that the murder was carried out under the auspices of the Popular Front organization. According to what is currently known, the murders were carried out independently by the two suspects.

The investigation revealed that the two suspects decided that they would carry out the murder on Friday afternoon, hours before the murder was carried out. According to the investigation, the two left Awarta at nine p.m. carrying an umbrella, several knives and wire-cutting shears.

According to the investigation, it took the suspects about 10 minutes to cut the fence that separates the settlement of Itamar from the Palestinian village of Awarta. They climbed the security barrier at the settlement unnoticed and walked about 400 metres into the settlement. Once inside the settlement, they broke into an empty home and stole an M-16 rifle, a weapons cartridge, a vest and a helmet before proceeding to the Fogel family's home.

Before entering the house, the suspects noticed Yoav and Elad Fogel in the home's window. Yoav and Elad were the first to be stabbed after the suspects entered the home. The suspects then entered the parents' room. Ehud and Ruth tried to fight off the attackers, but were eventually overcome and stabbed to death. Ruth was also shot, but due to the weather at the time of the murder, the gunshots were not heard. The suspects fled the home, fearing that the gunshots had been heard. Outside the home, the suspects realized that their gunshots had gone unnoticed and they had not yet been discovered. Amjad Awad subsequently re-entered the home in order to steal an additional M-16 rifle that was there. Back inside the parents' room, Awad noticed three-month-old Hadas and stabbed her to death. While leaving the home once more, the suspect noticed that there were more children but apparently figured that he was running out of time. The lives of Roi , 8, and Yishai, 2, were spared.

The two suspects escaped the settlement at around 11 pm. An hour and a half later, 12-year-old Tamar returned home from a youth group meeting and discovered the murder scene.

During the time that lapsed before the murder was discovered, the suspects fled Itamar and arrived back at Awarta, at the home of Salah Awad, the uncle of Hakim. According to the investigation, the suspects told Salah what they had done. Salah helped them hide the knives that they used in the murder and the weapons that they stole, as well as helped burn their clothes, which were covered in blood.

According to a senior Shin Bet official, despite the suspects' young age, Hakim and Amjad "described what they did with self-control and did not express regret over their actions at any stage of the investigation."

The same official said that the two suspects went to Itamar with the clear intention of carrying out a terror attack and stealing weapons.

Boy hurt in Gaza rocket attack dies

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The teenager who was critically wounded after Gaza militants launched an anti-aircraft missile at a school bus in southern Israel earlier this month succumbed to his wounds Sunday.

Sixteen-year-old Daniel Viflic died in the Soroka Medical Center in Be'er Sheva after his condition seriously deteriorated last week.

The missile hit the bus travelling near Kibbutz Sa'ad just moments after it had dropped off the rest of the children, wounding Viflic and the bus driver, who was moderately wounded by shrapnel in his leg.

"Sadly, Daniel passed away this afternoon," said Shaul Sofer, the director of the intensive care unit at Soroka. "It wasn't a surprise for us. He arrived in critical condition, and shortly afterward, his brain stopped functioning. Due to the sensitive nature of the event, we continued treatments despite knowing that he had no chance of recovery."

Yitzhak Viflic, Daniel's father, thanked the doctors and those who supported his family. "Daniel fought but passed away calmly. I am positive he is in a good place now."

Viflic was a resident of Beit Shemesh and studied in a yeshiva there. When he was wounded, he was on his way to the western Negev to visit his grandmother.

Following the bus attack, cross-border fire between Gaza and Israel seriously escalated. Palestinian militants fired dozens of rockets into southern Israel and Israel Defence Forces launched numerous attacks on targets in the Gaza Strip.

Living conditions worry Japanese: IDF officer

Anshel Pfeffer

JERUSALEM — Dr. Ofir Cohen Marom, a gynecologist, a colonel in the Israel Defence Forces and deputy to the chief medical officer, returned last week from two weeks in Japan, where he headed the IDF medical team sent there after the March 11 earthquake and tsunami. Ha'aretz spoke with him upon his return.

Ha'aretz: You left Japan the day the radiation level at the Fukushima nuclear reactor (which was damaged by the tsunami) rose to seven, the highest category. Did you sense panic among the Japanese?
Marom: Not really. For the locals, radiation is the least of their worries. Their living conditions at the moment are so miserable they are now worrying about where they will get bread and water beyond the next few hours. We just spent two weeks there, and now the infrastructure is already better, and there is a steady flow of food and water to keep them going, but many things are still lacking. They don't even talk about the radiation.
Ha'aretz: Were you concerned?
Marom: Before we left Israel, we were informed that the plans for our mission specifically stated that if the radiation level rises above the predetermined level, we were to evacuate immediately. Every member of the delegation had two personal radiation devices, and we also had with us a doctor who is an internationally renowned expert on radiation. In addition, we had a state-of-the-art device the team used to measure radiation levels in the air, water and on our patients.
Ha'aretz: How far were you from the reactors in Fukushima?
Marom: We maintained a minimum distance of around 150 kilometres. The Americans defined 60- to 80-kilometres radius around the reactor beyond which there was a threat, and even that had extra margins for safety.
Ha'aretz: How was the location chosen for where you set up the clinic?
Marom: The Japanese did not want to accept assistance from any country, even though numerous countries offered their help. As part of the ancient tradition, they always manage with their own devices. Even the rescue dogs sent to them from New Zealand were first placed in 10-day quarantine. Luckily for us, the mayor of Kurihara volunteered in Israel years ago, and he is a good friend of our ambassador in Tokyo.

This mayor decided to look after the fishing village of Minamisanriku, an hour's ride from Kurihara. The village was completely destroyed by the tsunami that struck after the earthquake and nearly half of its 10,000 residents died. The rest were left without shelter, and the mayor, together with the ambassador, pressed for the Israeli delegation to go there.
Ha'aretz: Your work was defined as "setting up a branch health clinic." What did you actually do there?
Marom: We set up a medical service that basically became the anchor for all the services in that area. After our arrival was approved, we realized that there was no need for trauma medicine but for medical treatment for the hundreds of thousands of people roaming around without a roof over their heads.

They were brought to population centres, community centres and schools – several hundred to as many as 1,500 people at each venue, and there they were given food and water, but in the first weeks there were hardly any medical services. In some of the centres, there were no medical personnel at all; some had a single doctor with no equipment or medical support such as X-rays and other tools. They barely had a stethoscope. In our area, there were 9,000 survivors in dozens of centres.
Ha'aretz: How did you organize for the mission to Japan?
Marom: The requirement was that we should not be a burden to anyone there, because it was not possible to rely on the logistics. So we brought all of the food, water and gear with us. Other things we arranged to acquire from other parts of Japan. The main thing was to arrive without needing assistance from the Japanese authorities.

The delegation had 55 members, 30 medical personnel including 14 doctors, seven nurses, and nine medical logistics people, X-ray technicians and lab personnel. We brought a doctor from each relevant field – general surgery, ophthalmology, otolaryngology, internal medicine, gynecology, pediatrics and geriatrics – and we built a medical centre there that treated patients and also provided digital X-ray services and a state-of-the-art lab for doctors already there.

Ha'aretz: How did the work with the local medical services proceed?
Marom: Not all the Japanese liked the idea of our coming. The Japanese health system does not like people interfering, so we pretty much arrived against their will, and at first they limited what we could do. As the commander of the delegation, my job was to organize collaboration and persuade them that we came to help them, and not to replace them. Day by day, the collaboration grew and deepened. After four days, they agreed to have us send teams beyond the population centre where we were, to other centres, and even agreed to allow us to treat a few cases of people who could not leave their homes. We went to see pregnant women restricted to bed rest with a portable ultrasound to do examinations. Everything was done using vehicles we had organized and gasoline we purchased.
Ha'aretz: You returned to Israel after two weeks, but a lot of work remains to be done there.
Marom: We treated more than 200 patients there, but during our work there, we understood that beyond medical care, there is a need to rebuild infrastructure. The work there will not be finished in two months, and we went for a short time to provide basic needs in place of the local hospital, which was destroyed. Now they are better set up and over the last three days, we trained doctors to use all of the equipment we left and overlapped with them. Now the Japanese doctors are working there. Basically, we set up an anchor for the hospital until it is rebuilt.
Ha'aretz: What conclusions did you reach about dealing with future disasters here in Israel?
Marom: It's possible to learn a lot from Japan, primarily the need to do things according to plan. We have a tremendous capacity for flexibility – we do things from one day to the next on a level that advanced states are unable to do. But this is not an alternative to serious planning for potential disasters. A society that combines these two abilities will have the ultimate combination.

Exercise offers huge benefits after 60

FITNESS CORNER
By FELYCE ZOMPARELLI

Getting and staying fit in your 60s, 70s and 80s isn't hard, it just takes practice.

A recent study done by Dr. Paul Bhella of John Peter Smith Hospital, Fort Worth, Tex., found that individuals over age 65 who exercised four to five times a week regularly had a higher level of oxygen uptake than those under 34 who were sedentary – proving it is never too late to start.

Everyone, no matter how young or old, should be doing some kind of regular aerobic and strength training exercise. Only 32 per cent of adults 65 and older follow a regular exercise plan, and for those aged 45 to 64, the number is even lower – 30 per cent.

Aerobic exercise helps to improve the body's ability to use oxygen, which contributes to muscular endurance as well as muscular strength. Both are needed as we age if we want to continue to perform activities of daily living such as getting out of a chair or carrying groceries in from the car.

There are many benefits to a regular exercise program. Walking every day is the easiest way to improve balance. And as we age, regular exercise gives us the ability to move more freely in everyday activities such as walking or climbing stairs. Following a regular exercise program has also been proven to vastly improve the immune system in seniors.

After age 50, muscle mass declines by six per cent per decade, and after 70, by 11 per cent per decade. Creating a resistance exercise program helps to stop the loss of muscle strength and rebuild muscle mass.

Bhella also found that exercising twice a week can prevent age-related loss of cardiac mass, but exercising four to five times a week can rebuild cardiac mass.

Taking the time to do a proper warm up to help loosen the muscles before exercise is essential. And, particularly at 60 and over, stretching after exercise to reopen joints and muscles helps prevent injury. Stretching also helps to keep you more mobile in your daily activities.

Russell Willer's world was turned upside down last year when he was diagnosed with stage 3 Hodgkin's lymphoma.

Russel Willer

The 25-year-old was in film school in Vancouver when he went to the doctor to check out a pain in his chest.

"Within four days, I came home to Toronto and began eight months of chemotherapy and radiation."

Now, as he's about to finish his treatments, he feels "extremely lucky" that his family and friends have rallied around to support him during his ordeal.

Egypt reviewing natural gas contracts

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The move had long been expected and is indeed taking shape: Egypt will review the contracts under which it supplies natural gas to Israel and Jordan, Egyptian Prime Minister Essam Sharaf said last week.

The revision could boost Egypt's income from natural gas sales by $3 billion to $4 billion (all figures US), the prime minister said.

State news agency MENA reported that Sharaf will meet with Jordanian Energy Minister Khaled Toukan to discuss gas deals and broader energy cooperation.

Egypt supplies about 40 per cent of the natural gas used in Israel. The deal between Cairo and Jerusalem had been struck during the term of former President Hosni Mubarak and had been controversial throughout. Criticism of Egypt's supply of gas – both in principle and the terms – gained momentum after Mubarak's ouster. Some critics claimed the terms with Israel symbolized the corruption of Mubarak's regime.

Meanwhile, four Israeli gas exploration partnerships will be raising about half a billion shekels ($146 million) in the weeks after Passover to finance the next stages of their explorations.

Isramco announced that it will be tapping investors for 113 million shekels ($33 million). Ratio Oil Exploration is reportedly planning to raise around 200 million shekels ($59 million) to 300 million shekels ($88 million). Delek Group partnerships will be borrowing 70 million shekels ($20 million) from the parent company and may tap the markets for more as well. Last year, the oil and gas exploration partners raised about a billion shekels ($293 million) in offerings to the public.

Startup negotiating billion-dollar exit

JERUSALEM — Israeli startup Conduit is on the verge of negotiating a sale estimated at more than $1 billion (all figures US). Among the potential buyers being mentioned are such giants as Microsoft and Google.

Conduit, considered one of the most promising high-tech companies in Israel, was founded in 2005 and creates browser applications and toolbars and applications for smart phones. If the deal comes to fruition, it would be the biggest sale of an Internet firm in Israeli history.

Conduit's products allow anyone, including small firms, to create personalized toolbars. Clients range from small stores to the NBA and singer Rihanna.

The company raised $9.5 million in 2005 and 2008 from investors, and is considered profitable. It had revenues of about $100 million in 2009 and $300 million in 2010. Conduit has 250 employees in its centre in Nes Tziona, 100 of whom were hired in the last year.

Shaul Olmert, Conduit's chief marketing officer, refused to comment on a sale. "We have tried to build an Internet company on an international scale in Israel," he said. The company is committed to Israel and would continue to grow here, he added.

In the past, Conduit turned down a buyout offer of $100 million.

The company boasts 230 million users of its products – half the number of Facebook users, but more than LinkedIn and Twitter. Conduit is also more profitable than those firms, Olmert said.

The three founders, CEO and chairman Ronen Shilo, chief technology officer Dror Erez and chief operating officer Gaby Bilczyk, own 48 per cent of the company, and they will take home the biggest share of the money. The Yozma venture capital fund invested $1.5 million in the firm in 2005 and owns a 10 per cent share. Benchmark Capital holds 21 per cent after investing $8.5 million in 2008.

Mazda loses crown to Hyundai

Daniel Schmil

JERUSALEM — Israel's car-importing sector reported strong figures for the first quarter of 2011 – and now it can be said: Mazda has lost its crown. Israelis' favourite car is the Hyundai.

Another interesting item from the first quarter is that March 2011 was the best month ever for Israel's car importers, with more than 24,000 new cars delivered. And March was the month in which the rankings of the cars changed.

For more than 15 years, the most popular car among Israelis was the Mazda, which had supplanted Mitsubishi as the top seller, a position it held almost every quarter. Imported by Delek Automotive, Mazda made terrific profits for the company and its executives. But in the first quarter of 2011, its place was taken by Hyundai.

In March, Delek Automotive delivered 7,673 Mazdas, while Colmobil delivered 8,014 Hyundais.

In fact, Hyundai lost some of its market share in the first quarter. However, Mazda lost more.

Both lost ground to smaller brands, locally at least. Toyota sales rose 17 per cent against the same period in 2010, rising to third place, while Kia deliveries doubled year over year, lifting it to fourth place.

Kia did well by the shortage of Hyundai Accent cars and sold a great many Rio models to the Israel Defence Forces.

Total first-quarter sales came to 63,289 cars, importers report, an increase of 26 per cent compared with the same period of 2010.

A full sketch of J.D. Salinger

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

Kenneth Slawenski's J. D. Salinger: A Life (Random House), published just one year after its subject's death at age 91, is an impressive, balanced and masterful literary biography of one of America's most famous – and famously reclusive – authors.

Salinger's most famous character, Holden Caulfield of Catcher in The Rye fame, once refrained from divulging "all that David Copperfield kind of crap" (biographical details) about himself and his family for fear that his parents "would have about two hemorrhages apiece."

Diligently weaving together material from a wide variety of sources, Slawenski gives us a welcome full sketch of Salinger that might have caused its subject a similar sort of conniption had he still been alive. However, Slawenski – a longtime Salinger scholar who runs a website about the author called deadcaulfields.com – is respectful, critically astute and attuned to the big themes of Salinger's life.

Jerome David Salinger was born into a middle-class Jewish family in New York on New Year's Day, 1919. His parents, who called him "Sonny," gave him a comfortable childhood and, as they grew more affluent, a prep-school and military-school education. His mother was indulgent, doting and overprotective, his father more realistic and increasingly concerned with discipline.

His father disapproved of his plan to be a writer and, after his stint at military school, sent him to Europe to learn the family business of sausage-making. Besides seeing the insides of Polish sausage factories, Salinger witnessed Nazi thugs terrorizing Jews on the streets of Vienna in 1938. Back home, he took a writing course and brought his natural sardonic wit into play on the page. "Several stories seemed to come from his typewriter at once," his instructor Whit Burnett would recall.

For a while he dated Oona O'Neill, the beautiful daughter of playwright Eugene O'Neill. He was infatuated with her and her breakup with him and subsequent marriage to film star Charlie Chaplin comprised "the great romantic tragedy" of his life, Slawenski asserts.

Many of Salinger's early stories were rejected by magazines like Collier's Weekly, Saturday Evening Post and Story, but his persistence paid off. However, "the slicks" often took shocking liberties with his prose, changed titles, and placed his stories amidst garish advertisements that seemed to cheapen them. He was elated when the New Yorker finally accepted his story, Slight Rebellion off Madison (one of several pre-Catcher tales that he wrote about Holden Caulfield) in 1941, but felt dejected when they postponed publication until after the war.

An officer in the 12th Infantry Regiment during the war, Salinger survived horrific battles, saw his buddies blown to bits and helped liberate the concentration camps: through it all, he continued to write whenever the opportunity arose. "The war, its horrors, agonies and lessons, would brand itself upon every aspect of Salinger's personality and reverberate through his writings," Slawenski writes. A singular high point was his friendship with Ernest Hemingway, then living in France, who knew of Salinger through his magazine stories. After the war, Salinger remained in Europe until 1946. He helped to track down war criminals in the American zone and was briefly married to a French woman.

When Slight Rebellion off Madison appeared in the New Yorker in December 1946, Salinger experienced the fulfilment of "his fondest dream since he had begun to write seriously." When he presented the New Yorker with another story, The Bananafish in 1947, the editors insisted upon extensive revisions. Months later, the much-improved piece was published as A Perfect Day for Bananafish. Readers were "intrigued by its elusive meaning and powerful ending," as they would be by the author's subsequent Glass family stories.

Published in 1951, The Catcher in the Rye was an instant bestselling sensation, propelling Salinger to a literary stardom that he abhorred. "Holden's meandering thoughts, emotions and memories populate the most completely stream-of-consciousness experience offered by American literature," Slawenski asserts, calling Catcher a worthy "successor to David Copperfield and The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn."

Soon after Catcher's publication, Salinger, at 32, began dating 16-year-old Claire Douglas, who would later become his wife and mother of his two children. But their isolated rural home in Cornish, N.J., and his obsessive working habits made her miserable, and the marriage eventually fell apart. Meanwhile, Salinger spun out more of his Glass family stories and other exquisite pieces for the New Yorker, later publishing them in a series of books: Nine Stories (1953), Franny and Zooey (1961), Raise High the Roofbeam, Carpenters and Seymour: An Introduction (1963).

All of these books were bestsellers but sadly, Salinger's last New Yorker story, Hapworth 16, 1924, which appeared in 1965, was a meandering, introspective mess – a "disaster" that was met by bewildered silence from the critics. From then on, apparently, Salinger's muse went cold, and he stopped publishing, though he continued to struggle with his stories and a second novel that never came to be. He also withdrew even more from the public eye, becoming almost Howard Hughes-like in his mistrust of people and his obsessive need for privacy.

For Salinger fans, J. D. Salinger: A Life is an illuminating account that fills in a great many mysteries about a writer who had earned the worshipful reverence of legions of fans. The unvarnished truth seems to be that Salinger was often cynical, obsessive, controlling, and difficult to get along with. Despite his aura of high spirituality, the mighty author whom so many had come to idolize apparently only had feet of clay.

View from The Hilltops

Joseph Serge
Arts Editor

Toronto filmmaker Igal Hecht, known for his documentaries on Israel and Judaism, has always felt that the Israeli settlers have not been given fair treatment in most newscasts and films about them.

He wants his new film, The Hilltops, which is premièring at the Hot Docs and the Toronto Jewish film festivals in May, to change that.

"I wanted to find out what these settlers are all about and let them have their say," he says in a recent interview. "I didn't shy away from asking them the tough questions, but I gave them a fair shake." Hecht says that most filmmakers primarily "demonize" the settlers, blaming them for being the reason there's no peace in the area.

This film primarily focuses on three settlers. What's unique about them is that unlike the stereotypical settler with long beards, uzis and kippahs, these settlers are all women.

"The Hilltops is an insider's look into the lives of three prominent women settlers in Judea/Samaria – or the West Bank – and what they do to hold on to what they call 'their land.'"

There is no voice-over narrative or Michael Moore-like director interference in this 45-minute film. Instead Hecht hands over the story to the settlers and lets them tell the story.

"They view the lands of Judea as the heartland of Israel, more important than the rest of Israel, and that's the tragedy of it all – they feel disconnected to the rest of Israel and vice versa," Hecht says.

The film opens and closes with a scene shot on one of the disputed hilltops. A small group of people including several teenage girls, led by Daniella, are building what they call an outpost, a small wooden shack. Soon, the army comes along and after warning them, the soldiers begin to forcibly remove them one by one. Then, the outpost is torn down, but the same settlers return later and start to rebuild the outpost.

"It's a cat and mouse game," Hecht admits. "They are telling the army, the world, that they will not be stopped. Their point is, 'Look at what you had to do to remove us, a small group, it required 20 soldiers. Imagine if you had to clear a whole village.'

"I'm not saying whether it's right or wrong, but they're going to make it very hard to implement any resolution."

That scene is the only confrontational sequence in the documentary and Hecht admits they got lucky. "We had no idea that was going to happen," he says. "We were just following [Daniella] when the army arrived." The army told him to stop filming, but Hecht, who's been in Israel enough times to know his rights, continued to film.

Hecht and his director of photography, Lior Cohen, spent time getting to know the settler community and gaining their trust. "The settlers are great people. Politically, I have my differences with them, but they were very open to debate and to answer questions."

And the one thing this film shows is that the settlers cannot be pigeon-holed into one stereotype. "Some of them are extremists, and some of them are really lovely. There is a movement within the settler movement itself to start a relationship with the Palestinians. They understand that they are not going anywhere."

Filming in these areas is not without danger. Although it's not in the film, Hecht relates how he was almost attacked by one settler who thought he was with the leftist group Peace Now. "He was a huge-looking guy and he came close to me yelling, 'Are you one of those traitors?' and wanted to beat the crap out of me, but a woman stepped in telling him who I was."

The one thing that perhaps is missing in this film is the voice of the other side. Other than one Palestinian who takes part in a meeting with two settlers, there are no Palestinians in this film.

Hecht says he did that intentionally. "It wasn't that kind of film. That film's been done to death. One's probably being made right now. What makes The Hilltops unique is that this is the settlers' position. What they're about and what they stand for. That's the point of it. I think they have something very legitimate to say."

Whether the viewers agree with the settlers is up to them. But this film certainly makes their case clear and highlights the great divide between secular and the right-wing religious Jews.

"It should be illegal to prevent the right of Jews to build on our land," Daniella says in the film. "They [the government] don't understand anything about Jewish law."

Hecht, whose company Chutzpah Productions has produced many documentaries, including Y.I.D., Not In My Name and Banished, is thrilled to have this film screened at both festivals in the space of a week. "It's amazing to have it in Hot Docs [the largest documentary festival in North America] and as for the TJFF, I owe everything in terms of my career to them."

For screening dates, visit www.hotdocs.ca and www.tjff.ca. The Hilltops will also run on the CBC Documentary channel later this year.

Daniella, and two young settlers, construct an outpost on the hilltop just before soldiers tear it down.

Toronto filmmaker claims discovery of Jesus' nails

By Nir Hasson
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

If Toronto filmmaker Simcha Jacobovici is to be believed, the nails used to crucify Jesus were discovered in an ancient Jerusalem gravesite.

The burial cave was discovered during a dig in 1990, where a number of ossuaries were uncovered, one of which was hailed by many at the time as belonging to Caiaphas, the Jerusalem high priest who presided over the trial of Jesus.

Now, in his upcoming film, Nails of the Cross, Jacobovici is suggesting that the grave also contained two rusty and bent nails. But not just any nails. Jacobovici claims these nails are no less than the original nails hammered into the hands of Jesus Christ when he was crucified.

But many people, primarily in the archeological world, don't believe these claims, and even view Jacobovici as a charlatan.

Jacobovici, an observant Jew sporting a large kippah, was born in Israel, but has lived in Canada for many years, garnering recognition for several documentaries he has made, including a film on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and another on the trafficking of women. He has won two Emmys for his work.

He's also known for his documentary TV series The Naked Archaeologist and for his collaboration with James Cameron (director of Titanic and Avatar) to produce the movie The Lost Tomb of Christ.

That film presented the controversial claim that a burial cave discovered in the Jerusalem neighbourhood of Armon HaNatziv 30 years ago is in fact the original burial site of Jesus and his family.

Jacobovici disputed popular beliefs about Jesus again at a Jerusalem press conference last week, this time regarding the nails he claims were used during the crucifixion.

Simcha Jacobovici

Jacobovici's main claim is that the character of Caiaphas must be reconsidered. According to him, Caiaphas may have changed his mind about Jesus after the crucifixion, and his descendants thought it appropriate to bury him with the nails alongside other items meant to accompany him to the next world.

Jacobovici says that Caiaphas even became a member of the Judeo-Christians – those who maintained their Jewish identity while claiming Jesus was the Messiah (but not God). Jacobovici said that evidence of Caiaphas' shift can be found in multiple places, including the mysterious symbols that were engraved on the ossuary.

The name Caiaphas is rare for the Second Temple era, and Jacobovici is confident that the site is the burial place of the Jerusalem high priest.

Other archeologists don't rule out the possibility that Caiaphas was buried in the cave. They say it's reasonable to assume that it was the family's cave, although other members of the family may be buried there.

Dissenting archeologists maintain, however, that although the ossuary is elaborate in design, it's not in the style of a typical high priest burial site.

The excavation of the cave was done by two senior archeologists, Dr. Zvi Greenhut, today a leading official at the Israel Antiquities Authority, and Dr. Ronny Reich, now chairman of the Archeological Council, the highest archeological body in Israel.

Jacobovici has been cautiously critical of these two experts for ignoring what he perceives to be the most important finding in the cave: the nails. The other items discovered in the grave have been stored in the warehouses of the Israel Antiquities Authority, and the ossuaries can be viewed at the Israel Museum.

The nails, on the other hand, have been neglected – barely documented in the excavation's findings and disappearing shortly after the dig. Now, they are in the hands of Jacobovici.

La Rafle – a drama about the Holocaust in France

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

La Rafle, Rose Bosch's drama about the Holocaust in France, is a jolting reminder that the persecution and deportation of Jews was, to an alarming degree, a purely French project.

Although Nazi Germany pressured the Vichy government to marginalize and deport Jews, France was more than ready to comply with German demands to cleanse Europe of its Jewish inhabitants.

When the topic at hand was Jews, Henri Phillippe Petain's collaborationist regime could be more zealous than the Nazis themselves.

This much is clear in the movie La Rafle (The Roundup), which opens in an exclusive engagement at the Empress Walk Theatre on April 22.

The 115-minute film, which unfolds in the summer of 1942, is replete with ominous hints that the French authorities have no other intention than to strip Jews of their civil rights and leave them to the tender mercies of Nazi Germany.

Jews are forced to wear the dreaded yellow Star of David. A radio announcer blares that France has been "swamped" by Jews. Official decrees reveal that Jews have been dismissed from schools and the professions.

In a didactic touch, Bosch conjurs up an imaginary but plausible scene in which Petain (Roland Cope) and his prime minister, Pierre Laval (Jean-Michel Noirey), chat about the fate of Jews. Petain says that Jewish citizens should be immune from deportations. When Laval disagrees, Petain defers to his judgment.

The close working relationship between Vichy and Nazi Germany is detailed in a subsequent scene when Laval's deputy, Rene Bousquet (Frederic Moulin), discusses the so-called Jewish question with his German colleagues.

La Rafle revolves around a Parisian Jewish family, the Weismanns, who, like most Jews, have no idea what awaits them in the near future.

"They won't touch us," says Sura Weismann (Raphaelle Agogue) in a reference to the Germans and their French enablers.

When the axe finally falls, they are powerless. In ruthless fashion, French police round up Jews and dump them in a vast sports arena, the Velodrome D'Hiver, where conditions quickly turn squalid and unbearable. These moments of human cruelty and suffering are among the strongest in the film.

In an effort to convey a nuanced view of grassroots French attitudes to Jews, Bosch portrays the good and the bad. A sympathetic policeman warns a Jewish woman of an impending raid, but a baker's wife shouts out "good riddance" as Jews are marched off to the velodrome.

The policemen who coldly perform their jobs without a quiver of empathy for their Jewish victims represent the debasement of France. The humanistic face of France is represented by Annette Monod (Melanie Laurent), the gentle gentile nurse who helps Jews, works with a Jewish doctor (Jean Reno) in an internment camp and assists the Weismann's son after France's liberation.

La Rafle, which is occasionally moving, is distinguished by fine performances, especially from Laurent. But silly dramatized scenes of Adolf Hitler planning the destruction of Jews or engaged in leisure-time activity with his retinue of toadies are contrived and diminish the film.

Toronto-based, Juno-nominated jazz trombonist Darren Sigesmund and his septet, Strands II, are premiering new works and performing songs from his two CDs, Strands and Strands II.

The April 27 concert will feature New York-based jazz musicians, violinist Mark Feldman and pianist and accordionist Gary Versace, who perform with the original ensemble.

Sigesmund has taken his music around the globe since founding the group, which was then a quintet, in 2003. His current bandmates are Venezuelan-born vocalist Eliana Cuevas, Luis Deniz playing alto sax, guitarist Reg Schwager, Jim Vivian on bass, drummer Ethan Ardelli and percussionist Daniel Stone.

Strands II's sound has been influenced by diverse musical styles, including jazz, classical music, Argentine tango and Brazilian song forms, borrowing from fast-paced melodies of Balkan music and using similar instrumentation to that of Ashkenazi music.

"I am hoping to appeal to a larger audience beyond the typical jazz audience with this production," Sigesmund says. "Jazz is often seen as very esoteric or intellectual music. It used to be the pop music of the day back in the '40s. It's no longer pop music… but I think in many ways it can appeal to the general public."

Strands was released in 2008. The follow-up album, Strands II, released in 2009, was described as "brilliant" by Toronto Life. The Globe and Mail praised it for its "wonderfully intricate pieces that are both rhythmically knotty and blissfully melodic."

"Everything I do with my band starts with the music," said Sigesmund, who is currently on tour in Denmark. "I think about what I want to do musically. For example, I started the Strands project in 2003 as a standard jazz quintet with trombone, tenor sax and rhythm section. I expanded the group for the second recording, adding voice and percussion. I added voice because when I compose, I sing as I write, so it was a natural extension of what I do compositionally that will help fill out the ensemble."

Darren Sigesmund

Strands II received a Juno nomination in 2010 for best traditional jazz album and won The Galaxy Rising Star Award at the Montreal Jazz Festival for best composition in a competition, and the group has been touring Europe over the past couple of years.

Sigesmund says adding Versace and Feldman to the mix adds texture to the ensemble because violin, piano and accordion are not typically instruments found in jazz.

"I hope this concert piques people's interest in jazz and improvisation. The music is a little different, but I don't think it's out there at all – in fact quite the opposite, I think it is accessible," he says.

This is the first time he's worked with Feldman and Versace. Feldman, a classically-trained violinist was a leading player in Nashville and is now a fixture of New York's downtown jazz scene. He has appeared on over 150 recordings and is perhaps best known for his work with John Zorn, John Abercrombie and Dave Douglas.

Versace has appeared on over 50 albums, including two Grammy-winning projects by Maria Schneider.

Sigesmund's mentors have included Kenny Wheeler, Dave Holland, David Liebman, Don Thompson and Steve Coleman.

Darren Sigesmund and Strand II perform at the Al Green Theatre at the Miles Nadal JCC on April 27 at 8 p.m. For information, visit www.darrensigesmund.ca. For tickets call 416-924-6211, ext. 0, or visit www.algreentheatre.ca

Camps to host three-on-three hoops tourney

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Jewish summer camps are hosting a one-day, three-on-three basketball tournament to raise money for charity and to raise the camps' profile among school-aged youngsters.

The Inter-Camp Charity Basketball Tournament will take place from 1 to 8 p.m. on Sunday, May 1, at the Pavilion Fitness Centre.

Sponsored by Young Judaea and Camp Gesher, the event is expected to attract 120 teens from grades 8 through 12. Each team of up to five players is being asked to raise $60 ($20 for individual players). The money will support charities selected by the teams from a list of pre-approved agencies in the Jewish community, said Daniel Sourani, program director for Canadian Young Judaea.

"It's an opportunity for Jewish camps in and around Toronto to get kids together for a good cause." Half the teams will likely consist of players affiliated with one of the Young Judaea camps, with many of them public school students, he said.

"We initiated this tournament as a result of the popularity of basketball at the camp and in order to enable the youth to have the opportunity to take responsibility for a charity event in a tikkun olam project," said Camp Gesher spokesperson Oren Sukenik.

Canadian Young Judaea manages seven summer camps in Canada, three of them in Ontario, including JSummer Camp, Camp Solelim and Camp Shalom. The camps are Zionist in orientation and offer programs that enhance Jewish education and identity, Sourani said.

Camp Gesher is a community and family-oriented camp that's part of the Habonim Dror youth movement.

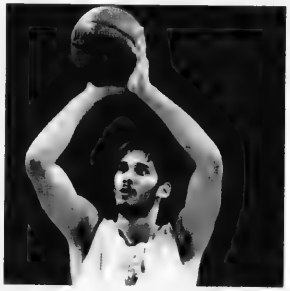
Billboard image vandalized for third time

JTA

SACRAMENTO — The face of Israeli NBA basketball player Omri Casspi was vandalized on a Sacramento Kings billboard in the city's downtown.

It was the third time Casspi's image has been defaced on a team billboard.

The portion of the billboard with Casspi's face painted on it was ripped off. The painter of the mural, Anthony Padilla, painted a message in the space offering a reward for information on the vandal.



Omri Casspi

Last September, two billboards with Casspi's image were defaced with red-painted swastikas. No one was apprehended.

Casspi, a forward for the Kings, is the first Israeli player in the NBA.

He recently wrote in a column on the Israeli sports website ONE that he would like to be traded from the Kings, since he spent much of the past season on the bench. Playing about half the game, Casspi averaged 8.6 points and 4.3 rebounds this season.

Little Black Dress frontman has a 'strong Jewish identity'

More news for young Jews on heebonics.ca

Jordan Press
Special to The CJN

Juno week last month was busy for Little Black Dress frontman Dan Sadowski, who became fully immersed in the hoopla surrounding Canada's premier music awards show.

There were events.

There were parties.

There was business.

And it was fun.

"Juno week this year was kind of crazy because it was just off the chain. I've never seen a scene like that," Sadowski says on the phone, laughing at the whirlwind that consumed him a month earlier.

But none of it bothers him. This is what the 26-year-old Toronto native wants to do for the rest of his life. He wants to be the frontman of his pop-rock band, write songs that people can connect with emotionally and perform on stage.

"I do this because I love it," he says.

"I don't want to change the world. I don't want to make this incredible mark on music or on fashion or on art. I think that what I want to do is make people happy, let people have something the way I had something growing up, the way I loved certain bands growing up."

Sadowski remembers the first time he heard music on a cassette tape. He says he was about three years old when he heard the satirical musical stylings of Weird Al Yankovic coming through the stereo. As he got older, his older sisters introduced him to Phish, the Dave Matthews Band and the Grateful Dead.

When he was 12, he picked up a guitar for the first time. He had no idea how to play any chords, yet he wrote a song and played it. The song writing snowballed after Sadowski learned to make the guitar sing.

The writing led him to Concordia University in Montreal, where became a creative writing student, but that didn't last long. Another brief stint at George Brown College in Toronto didn't work out ,either.

"Post-secondary and I just didn't see eye to eye," Sadowski says. "I knew I didn't want to be a writer. I just could feel it.

"I knew what I wanted to do was write songs and play music."

He joined a band and started touring. Sadowski was hooked. He had found his calling in life.

But his first band soon broke up.

"Things didn't fall apart, but we just lost the drive to be a band. We all kind of sensed it."

After going out on his own for a few months, which included playing acoustic shows in Toronto, Sadowski got bored and wanted to be back on stage with a band.

After posting a message on his Facebook page that said he was looking to start a "super group," and was seeking a few bandmates, things started to come together for him.

Within an hour, Sadowski received a message from Brian Seligman, who became the new band's lead guitarist. Soon after that, they teamed up with drummer Lewis Spring and finally with bassist Damian Dobrowolski.

And so, Little Black Dress was born.

The first concert the foursome played was sold out. The second show jammed 500 people into a 700-person venue. Yet, as Sadowski points out, no one had ever heard the band play together.

"This was completely unheard of," Sadowksi says. "We started selling out shows from our first show."

On its website, the band describes itself as a "melting pot of borderless, genre-crossing tunes" that includes "hook-laden party tunes, dance-floor anthems, and straight-up rock 'n' roll."

Music lovers can judge for themselves by downloading their tracks on iTunes or checking out the band's MySpace page.

Seligman, Spring and Dobrowolski are the theoretical foundation for the band's musical evolution, relying on their formal training in music, Sadowski says. Little Black Dress has recently added piano and synthesizer player Kyle Hohmann to the mix. And as for Sadowski?

"I do all the writing, and these are songs that are taken from all walks of life."

That includes his Jewish roots.

"I feel very connected and a very strong Jewish identity. There's a lot of lyrical content, and almost all aspects of my life contributes to what's being said, what's being written and what's being sung," Sadowski says.

This past year, Sadowski had a chance to connect his Judaism with his music in another way. The 2011 UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's campaign was looking for a new theme song, one that was a little more upbeat and youthful.

This year's campaign song is a band original: The Future In Our Hands.

"I think [the song] came out pretty well," Sadowski says.

Between shows, Sadowski also keeps himself busy as the band's business manager. Sadowski oversees everything from merchandise sales, to ticketing, to dealing with promoters, to the band's online presence and the logistics of putting a tour together.

As Sadowski says, he has to look after all the little and big things that help a musical act survive in the music business. Record labels usually take care of the business side of things, but Little Black Dress isn't signed and that doesn't appear to be changing any time soon.

"I kind of avoid record labels, not at all costs, but I'm capable of doing the work right now that a record label could do.

"What I'm working towards... is to eventually have the opportunity where somebody else is doing some of our work, so we can focus on the art," Sadowski says. "If a record label were to approach me... all I would be looking for is a fair deal."

Sadowski says his life has been full of firsts – the first guitar, the first song he wrote and the first time he was on stage – but he knows there are more firsts to come and there is no telling where the music will take him next.

'Buy me a dog'

New to Canada

Nina Shenhav

You all know I have a part-time cat (Sneezy). What you don't know is that I'm really a dog person. Don't like cats, but love dogs. Want dogs, need dogs. There's this minor problem, though. Meir hates them.

We lie in bed, and I'm wearing my sweetest nightie (well, my better PJs). I ask Meir huskily, "How 'bout someone licking you head to toe?" Meir tries to get rid of my nightie, so I change the tone immediately. "Um, wait, how 'bout someone welcoming you with joy when you come home?" He seems even more excited. Guess I'm not on the right road here. I sit straight and look him in the eye. "How 'bout someone eats all the leftovers?"

Meir starts kissing me ecstatically all over. "I know you finished that chocolate cake from last week," he whispers passionately, "you hungry little beast." I'm following his lead.

"Yeah, think beast, think animal, think dogs, a dog!" I shout. Thank God, he stops kissing me. "I wanna dog. Buy me a dog," I say.

Meir suddenly sits up. "We've discussed it already, Nina. We have a cat, a fish, two bunnies, two kids. No more!"

The next day, as I escort him to the pet shop, he reminds me of the obvious: "I'm not getting a male, they're too excitable, and a female we don't need, either, 'cause they'll want babies" (yeah, that's my Meir's point of view on genders). "I'm not buying a puppy," he continues, "'cause I'm too old to potty train it, and a grown dog is not needed, either, because it has history. I'm not buying an expensive one – we don't have the money – yet we don't need a cheap one 'cause then it's suspicious."

As we stroll through the shop, I see her. She's small, intelligent looking, and her big brown eyes say: "Are we going home yet, or what?"

When we bring Sara home, the kids look indifferent – they so take after their "cat people" dad, I tell you.

Sara is so friendly. She likes everybody but the bunnies. And the cat. And the kids. And our friends. And Meir (she has no problem with the fish, or with me).

Sara doesn't pee anywhere but on the couches. And on the beds. And on the cat. And on our friends, who came to visit only once and then changed their phone number, and neglected to give us the new one. Sara never howls, except at night. Every night. And during the day, too. She eats almost everything but her expensive multi-vitamin dog food.

Sara wants to go out only 15 times a day, more often on rainy days. She sleeps in my bed, so I haven't seen my husband for a while now, and she constantly bites the kids, so they're away with their dad (and the cat) for "an unlimited time," as Meir clarified over the phone.

Well, they do say a dog is man's best friend, but truth be told, from time to time a man misses his hubby and kids, hell, even his damn cat!

MARCY GOLDMAN'S PASSOVER MOCK CARAMEL "CORN"

Volunteer group visits isolated seniors

Rabbi Dov Ber Marshall

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Jewish Senior Circle (JSC) has been changing the lives of lonely or isolated seniors for more than two years.

Started up by Rabbi Dov Ber Marshall, 27, and his wife, Gila, with the help of a grant from the Ontario Trillium Foundation, JSC provides visits to seniors living at home and in seniors' residences.

A Chabad Lubavitch rabbi who has two daughters, Rabbi Marshall said he has seen first hand the effect friendly visits have on seniors.

As a student at Brunoy Yeshiva in France, he said, his job every Friday was to visit a large seniors' residence. "It became the highlight of my week."

He said that after JSC began, he was on a weekly visit with one elderly man who showed him family pictures, and sang to him. "His son walked in and said, 'This is the first time I've seen my father smile in six months.'"

Another man, who had been a widower for 30 years and never had visits from his son, told the rabbi after their first visit that "this had been his happiest day in decades."

By visiting seniors one on one, Rabbi Marshall said, JSC is catering to those who are already isolated and to those who are in danger of becoming isolated.

At the seniors homes – volunteers visit about 24 in the GTA – JSC volunteers meet with between 10 to 50 residents in a group setting.

"We hold weekly programs such as challah baking, Judaic art, holiday program and children's performances, and sometimes we come a second time for a pre-Shabbat program. The residents look forward to it tremendously. The need is clearly evident."

Rabbi Marshall said that the programs have been a source of comfort and inspiration to everyone involved. "Even the best nursing facility cannot provide the same warmth as the company of a family member or friend."

He said that volunteers have even helped out as far away as Haliburton. "An isolated 97-year-old woman wanted to be in touch with the Jewish culture. We found a couple who travel to that area regularly, and they visit her when they're there. The volunteers and the woman enjoy the time they have together."

Cousins discover each other 66 years later

First cousins Aryeh Shikler and Liora (Shapira) Tamir met for the first time at Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial museum in Jerusalem last week on April 21. Tamir believed she had no family anywhere in the world. Shikler and Tamir are residents of Haifa and Tel Aviv, respectively. They discovered each other thanks to a Page of Testimony on Yad Vashem's Central Database of Shoah Victms' Names containing information on their mutual grandparents, who were murdered in the Holocaust. [Flash90 photos]

Gairdner winners make 'seminal discovery'

Jenny Hazan
CJN Israel Bureau

TEL AVIV — Five representatives from the Gairdner Foundation of Canada toured Israel earlier this month and met with the Israeli recipients of this year's prestigious Canada Gairdner International Awards.

The prizes, given to professors Chaim Cedar and Aharon Razin – researchers at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem – are worth $100,000 and are awarded to seven scientists annually in recognition of achievements that "contribute significantly to improving the quality of human life."

The other recipients this year were Adrian Peter Bird of the University of Edinburgh; Shizuo Akira of the WPI Immunology Frontier Research Center in Osaka, Japan; Jules Hoffman of the University of Strasbourg in France; Robert Black of Johns Hopkins University in Baltimore, and Michael Hayden from the University of British Columbia.

The Israeli winners, who will officially receive their awards at a ceremony in Toronto in October, were honoured for their work on DNA methylation, a basic chemical process that turns parts of each cell's genetic code on and off.

Depending on what parts of the cell's genes are expressed (switched on) or subdued (switched off), it will assume a specific function, such as producing liver, brain or skin cells.

Egypt committed to peace with Israel: consul

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Amin Meleika is 49 years old, a 26-year career diplomat who became Egyptian consul general to Montreal – after previous postings in Ethiopia, the Netherlands, The Hague, Hong Kong and Geneva – about a month before history took over in Cairo's Tahir Square, where the uprising led to the peaceful ouster of longtime president Hosni Mubarak and contributed to continued upheaval in the Arab world.

The CJN spoke by telephone with Meleika on April 14.

CJN: It might be a good idea to begin with your overall impressions about the recent historic, tumultuous events in Egypt.

Amin Meleika: I was appointed here in Montreal – to be precise I came on Dec. 10 – just a little over a month before things started. You will meet today Egyptians or others who say they could see it coming – things were getting worse, etc. – but I don't think anybody expected it to happen on such a scale, including my own self. So, like everyone else, I was quite taken by surprise, but I could see that Egypt was ready for a change, a transformation.

A lot of people talk about the 'Arab spring,' the domino effect, and [say] that Tunisia probably gave it a spark, but I think that [given] the internal situation, Egypt was ready for a change. People are now hearing about what was going on, and they are appalled by the amount of corruption and nepotism and all kinds of wrongdoings that were taking place.

CJN: So you do see all this as a positive development for Egypt.

Meleika: Yes, [but also] in the sense that it happened "smoothly." Of course I realize that there were some events that were not so small, but in general, when you think about the number of people who came out in the streets – over one million, sometimes over two million – just wanting to restore their dignity and respect, not wanting to be marginalized anymore, wanting to have a part in decision-making, and the way the regime responded, in the sense that ex-president Mubarak got the message.

Amin Meleika

Of course he took some time before making up his mind, but still he decided to go and to hand over the power to the military, who themselves have pledged that they would hand over the power to a civilian government as soon as their six-month mandate is over.

A referendum took place in March about modifications in the constitution that would allow for parliamentary elections in September, and, hopefully, presidential elections before the end of the year. So in the sense that people needed to change, they changed. In the sense that the government responded in a civilized way and the military did not confront the people, they accepted that this was a fair and legitimate demand that people were making. Considering some incidents that are taking place in neighbouring countries, I would think we did it well.

Pittsburgh Jewish schools start new initiative

Offering free tuition for new students in grades 3-11 for the coming school year

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Although UJA Federation of Greater Toronto spends $10 million a year on Jewish day school tuition subsidies, annual fees are daunting.

Full-day tuition here ranges from almost $11,000 for junior kindergarten at the Toronto Heschel School to $20,100 at the community high school, the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

In Pittsburgh, Jewish day schools are offering free tuition to new students in grades 3 to 11 for the coming school year.

The initiative is being paid for by three schools as well as by a grant from the Jewish Federation of Greater Pittsburgh. Tuition ranges from more than $4,600 to $14,000 (US) per year.

Is the new initiative relevant to Toronto, which doesn't have a comparable program?

Paul Shaviv, director of education at Tanenbaum-CHAT, said that UJA Federation, which spends $12 million annually in total on Jewish education, is "by far the most supportive of Jewish education and Jewish schools of any federation in North America."

As well, he noted, Pittsburgh has approximately 900 students in Jewish day schools, compared to more than 11,000 in Toronto.

However, he added, "the initiative, in providing extra incentives at entry points into the system, is a very interesting one." He suggested it himself in a report he wrote on Jewish education in Toronto, but it has not been followed up on, he noted.

The Pittsburgh initiative, according to Shaviv, also "signifies a renewed interest and appreciation of the importance and effectiveness of day schools at a time when our own federation seems to be emphasizing informal Jewish education."

Paul Shaviv

Howard English, UJA Federation's vice-president of corporate communications, told The CJN that, aside from the difference in the size of the day school populations in Pittsburgh and Toronto, "the purpose of the Pittsburgh initiative is to increase the proportion of students going to day school." In Toronto, he noted, about one-third of Jewish school-age children go to Jewish day schools.

"Although the numbers could always be higher," he said, "our numbers are the second-highest [in North America], next to Montreal. That's not our major challenge. We have been concentrating far more on tuition subsidies to make it financially comfortable."

English added that the amount of money being spent on tuition subsidies in Toronto is "larger than all the major cities in the United States combined."

High tuition fees are related in large part to teachers' salaries – the largest proportion of costs, English said.

Vote and remember

Election day next week, May 2, is significant for us for reasons far beyond the "mere" peaceful changing of our federal government.

It happens also to be Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah.

The commemoration date this year actually falls on May 1 – the 27th day of Nisan on the Hebrew calendar – but it will be marked on Monday, May 2, in Israel.

The date of Yom Hashoah on the Hebrew calendar was established by decree of the Knesset on April 12, 1951. Like most legislation in democracies, its final content was the result of compromise.

Many individuals believed it was appropriate that the special day of remembrance should coincide with the beginning of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising, April 19, 1943.

From the editor's desk...

It was not by accident that the Nazis chose that day to launch the final liquidation of the Jewish remnant of Warsaw. For it was the eve of Pesach, the 14th of Nissan.

Nazi cruelty was comprehensive.

Their purpose was not only to annihilate an entire people; it was also to mock, scorn, deride and humiliate our religion as well. But on Erev Pesach 1943, it was they, the avatars of the Aryan master race who were humiliated. They did not anticipate what happened on that day.

At 3 a.m. on April 19, 1943, some 2,000 German soldiers with heavy military equipment and arms surrounded the ghetto. They expected it would take up to three days to "remove" the 60,000 Jews then remaining in the ghetto.

But the low and lowly "subhuman" Juden fought back.

The 700 to 750 Jewish resistance fighters, armed with grenades, rifles and revolvers held out against the Nazis for nearly 30 days. On May 15, the Germans blew up the great Tlomackie Synagogue, the elegant symbol of the three million Jews who once lived in Poland. Inexplicably, the Nazis left standing the Jewish historical and cultural institute that stood beside it on the adjacent street. The institute stands there today.

Mordechai Anielewicz, the 24-year-old commander of the combined Jewish fighting cells in the ghetto, died on May 8. That he was so young and yet the commander, that so many of his fellow fighters were so young, will speak for all time about the bravery, courage, selflessness and sacrifice of Jewish youth that we see every day reincarnated in the Israel Defence Forces.

Several thousand Jews were buried in the rubble and detritus of the ghetto. Of the tens of thousands who emerged, about 30,000 were either immediately shot or transported to death camps. The remainder were sent to labour camps.

After the resistance of the fighters came to an end, the resistance of the chroniclers began.

Personal diaries, accounts, written testaments buried under the rubble would soon be recovered and brought to light as the final humiliation of the Nazis.

The Nazis did indeed destroy the Jews of Europe. There are no words nor can there ever be any words of solace, comfort, understanding or even the slightest, most infinitesimal abatement of sorrow. Ever.

Nearly eight years after the Tlomackie Synagogue was destroyed, the Knesset in Jerusalem enacted the legislation that established Yom Hashoah.

In its wisdom, the Knesset selected the date of 27th day of Nissan, a day that falls between Pesach and Yom Ha'atzmaut. It would not have been appropriate to interlace Yom Hashoah with Pesach or with Yom Ha'atzmaut.

Between the holiday celebrating the freedom of the ancient Jews from their slavery in Egypt and the holiday celebrating the freedom of the sovereign state of the modern Jews, we reflect on, remember and sanctify the memories of the six million who were killed, not as casualties of war, but as objects of hatred and contempt for having been Jewish.

To try to ensure that all members of the community, including the very observant, would be able to accept the date, more conditions were added to the final compromise: If the 27th of Nissan affects Shabbat, i.e., falls on Friday or Saturday, the commemoration date moves. If it falls on a Friday, Yom Hashoah moves to the preceding Thursday. If it falls on a Sunday, Yom Hashoah moves to the following Monday.

Thus, when we vote next week, we must feel an extra dimension in its significance. It is hard to conceive of a Nazi regime flowering in a true and strong democracy.

It is an unremarkable act, to be sure, to mark a preference for a specific candidate on a ballot. In truth, it is, as we all know but seldom remember, a mundane-made-profound act, too. As is our right, we may choose not to vote. Not voting is an also an exercise of our rights. But not voting does nothing to strengthen our democracy.

There are many significant ways to mark Yom Hashoah. Voting in the federal election is one of them.

Teen conference to combat apathy

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

To 16-year-old Shane Feldman, the founder of the first World Youth Conference, age is just a number.

He's just like any other teenager, he insists.

"I just had this spark inside of me and motivated myself to do this."

Shane Feldman
[Paula Feig Photo]

The May 4 conference aims to motivate and inspire students to create positive change in the world.

"Kids can do just as much as adults. You just need to believe in yourself and not let anyone talk you down."

The spark was ignited when the Westmount Collegiate student began to notice that his peers were apathetic about the plight of Third World communities.

"I felt like I was surrounded by so many friends and peers who just didn't care," Feldman said.

"People weren't aware of what was happening in Third World countries. We're privileged to live in a society like Toronto and Thornhill that is fortunate to have clean water and proper housing. So many youth take that for granted and don't... understand how lucky they are."

Feldman, who had the idea for the project two years ago and began planning the conference last year, said that he was driven to move forward when he succeeded in motivating his younger sister to be more socially conscious.

"All of my friends, peers and all of the youth that I see continue to drive my passion to create this movement to develop an understanding of what's happening around the world," Feldman said.

The former Leo Baeck Day School student, who credits his family and former teachers with introducing him to the concept of tzedakah, added that "his Jewish upbringing helped [him] realize the importance of a charitable mentality."

About 400 high school students from across Ontario are expected to attend the May 4 conference, to be held at the City Playhouse Theatre in Thornhill.

He said originally it was supposed to be a school-wide event to inspire his peers to volunteer and become youth leaders, but he added, "I don't really go small. I go big or go home.

"I thought, 'Why am I limiting this to just my school?'"

Once he made the decision to reach out to students province-wide, he never looked back.

"I'm a bit of a computer geek, so I created a website, which I built, developed and paid for... I mailed out an information package to every school in the [York Region District School Board] and Toronto District School Board."

He said he also spent a lot of time looking for corporate sponsors. Initially, securing sponsorship was slow going.

"I contacted more than 50 corporations around Canada for sponsorship, and of those 50, I received three phone calls and two e-mails... and zero sponsors."

But that wasn't enough to discourage him. He continued to push forward and has since secured sponsors, including Pizza Pizza and TD Bank. He's also going to charge $10 per ticket to help cover the cost of the non-profit event.

He said word about the conference even spread to Ontario's Minister of Education, Leona Dombrowsky, who offered to provide a video message to be played during the event.

The one-day conference will include motivational and inspirational speakers such as Lynda Fishman, author of Repairing Rainbows, a memoir about the difficulties she faced when her mother and two younger sisters were killed in an Air Canada plane crash when she was 13.

Fishman also works to support children dealing with tragedy and who have life-threatening diseases, and she fundraises for various charities.

Spencer West, who lost his legs at the age of five, will speak to students about the struggles he faced – his search for meaning and happiness – and his eye-opening volunteer experiences.

Students will also be introduced to a website Feldman partnered with, charityrepublic.com, a Canadian-based organization that gives volunteers the opportunity to choose from hundreds of charities and non-profit organizations with which to connect.

"You'll see links between our two sites because at the end of the conference, the main thing we want every delegate to leave with is an empowerment that they can make a difference, and we want them to log on and register with Charity Republic so that they can start volunteering and making a difference," Feldman said.

He wants people to understand that "youth are not only the future, they are also the present," he said.

"We're just trying to tell these youth, 'So what, you're a kid... You can go out and make the positive change that this world needs.'"

Israeli orphans to visit Toronto, Niagara Falls

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Some time during the month of August, 40 to 50 Israeli kids around bar mitzvah age will visit Toronto for a couple of days.

Although their agenda is not set in stone, they're likely to do the kind of fun stuff that kids everywhere like to do – visit Canada's Wonderland, play laser tag, have a party. The usual.

However, these kids are hardly average, carefree, happy-go-lucky youths. They're part of a select group of youngsters who will be visiting Canada and the United States as part of a program designed to help them adjust to a sad reality. All the children are orphans whose fathers or mothers were killed while serving in the Israel Defence Forces or the country's security agencies.

Shahar Azani

For years, IDF orphans have been flying to the United States to attend Jewish summer camps. This year, they'll attend Camp Chi in the Chicago area before spending some time in New York. They'll wrap up their North American adventure with a trip to Niagara Falls, followed by two days in Toronto, said Shahar Azani, director of external affairs of the IDF Widows & Orphans Organization (IDFWO).

"The trips are a great opportunity for the kids to be together and see that their situation is shared by others," Azani said. "They can talk about it far from Israel, in tranquility and a serene environment, discuss it. It's a milestone on the road to adulthood."

Azani was in Toronto last week to introduce the organization to the local Jewish community. He met with synagogue congregations, expat Israelis and others who might be convinced to support the organization. He was particularly taken with his warm reception and the strong Zionist commitment of those he met. He's confident he'll be able to find billets for the youngsters.

He said the summer trip is an important part of the kids' adaptation to a life without a parent. Most of those visiting Toronto this summer were orphaned fairly recently. Choosing who will participate becomes complicated by the emotions involved and by determining who is ready for a three-week separation from home, he said.

The IDFWO was founded in 1991 to address those issues and to "empower women."

"The widows decided after their loss to take their fate in their hands and get back to life," he said. "They decided to get together and help each other and get back to life after a horrible loss of a father, sometimes a mother, a pillar. It's hard to get back to normal life when something is missing."

Today, a core group of volunteers makes themselves available to comfort "new widows and tell them 'I'm here for you.'"

Nava Shahan-Solan, chair of the group, was widowed in 1982 when her husband was killed in Lebanon. Following the deadly Mount Carmel fire last year, she visited six widows "whose entire world shattered in one fateful moment, widows who now have to stick the pieces back together into a whole," she wrote in the group's magazine, Together.

Membership now consists of close to 9,000 widows and orphans, some dating back to the 1948 War of Independence. One of the best known is Gabriela Shalev, Israel's ambassador to the United Nations, whose husband was killed in the Yom Kippur War.

The IDFWO receives some financial support from the Ministry of Defence, but the sums are modest.

"The organization covers all the other needs, such as reaching out, money for families in need, education courses for widows [to improve their job skills], helping them get back to work, reaching out to orphans by providing school supplies.

"During bar or bat mitzvah celebrations, the group sponsors celebrations at the Kotel [Western Wall] led by the chief rabbi of the IDF, hosted by the president, followed by a tour of the Knesset," Azani said.

"It becomes an extra-special day when people express their love for them and the father is missed so much," he said.

As the kids get older, the organization helps with academic scholarships and provides "generous wedding gifts."

The Gerald Schwartz & Heather Reisman Foundation will provide 76 academic scholarships to IDF orphans through the IDFWO in 2011, said foundation spokesperson Moshe Ronen.

"We consider it an important segment of our work with Heseg, which is an organization for former soldiers and lone soldiers in particular, which we sponsor in order to encourage them and help them pursue and develop successful careers," Ronen said.

The IDFWO also raises funds through membership fees and private donations, Azani said.

For more information visit www.idfwo.org. To volunteer as a billet, Azani can be reached at shahar@idfwo.org; or sed.azani@gmail.com.

Some parents being 'priced out of Jewish education'

Rabbi Jay Kelman – a founder of Torah in Motion who teaches ethics, Talmud and rabbinics at TanenbaumCHAT and is a chartered accountant by training – said that some parents are being "priced out of Jewish education." He said he knows of a few observant families who are considering sending their children to public school.

Rabbi Jay Kelman

Rabbi Kelman believes that the funding issue can be solved in two generations "if we restructure the way we finance the education."

His idea is based on replacing subsidies with loans for parents who can't afford tuition. "A lot of middle class parents have no money while they're going through the system," he said. "A lot of them will be wealthier 20 years from now."

He suggests that parents could pay back a loan in the future, or leave 10 per cent of their estate to Jewish education.

As well, a key element of his plan is that parents be given the option of buying $1 to $2 million of life insurance, with their children's school as beneficiary.

"My ultimate goal is that tuition be reduced by 50 per cent, on condition you buy a $2-million life insurance plan."

He said the idea hasn't been well received by schools, whose financial concerns are time-sensitive. To address those concerns, philanthropists would need to offer "bridge financing" in the interim – either as a loan, or preferably a gift, he said. "If we would have done this 50 years ago, we wouldn't be in the situation we are today."

He added that a couple of variations of the idea are being tried in the United States.

To fund Jewish education is "a communal obligation, not a parental obligation," Rabbi Kelman said. "Our first priority is to get our kids in the public school system into day school. Our first priority should be to make the cost less expensive."

Yisroel Janowski, who was involved in trying to get government funding for Jewish day schools as founding president of the Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools, said that what the federation has been doing to help families who aren't able to afford tuition is "wonderful, but there is a whole host of other families who are dropping out because they don't want to go through the scholarship system."

As well, he said, schools that aren't affiliated with the federation "are not getting a dime. All kinds of people are not being helped... It's just not sustainable."

LEARNING TOLERANCE THROUGH SCIENCE: Zareinu Moveathon staff recently visited the Bialik Hebrew Day School's science fair to see the toys created for Teaching Tolerance Through Toys, a program of the Zareinu Educational Centre for children with physical or developmental challenges. Each Bialik student used science to develop a toy intended for a specific Zareinu child, and, at the same time, learned about tolerance and acceptance of kids with special needs. The toys will be on display at Downsview Park during this year's Zareinu Moveathon, June 12.

Important civic and communal duties call

We learn at school, and then our experiences confirm, that a democracy requires its citizens to become involved in myriad aspects of the running of society. The more our lines of involvement, the stronger the sinews of our society. The formula is quite simple: the more we care about something, the more we pay attention to it. Strength cannot flourish through indifference. And who among us would not wish for our society, our democracy, to be the strongest it can be?

Wherever Jews have settled in the pre and post-Enlightenment modern world, we have always played active roles in seeking to establish or solidify the safeguards to secure and prosperous living that are inherent in true democratic structures and processes.

Thus, as individuals and as a diverse, heterogenous community, we are summoned next week to pay attention to our democracy, to perform duties, in two significant ways.

On May 2, Canadians will elect a new Parliament. By now we have heard, seen and read the positions of the party leaders and our riding candidates. The issues relating to domestic and foreign policy are vital. We must go to the polls in large numbers to cast our ballots according to conscience, political preference and calm calculation. Every vote is precious.

Next week is also census week.

As most readers know, recent changes to the once-each-decade survey replaced the mandatory long form census with a voluntary National Household Survey (NHS).

Community planners, leaders and advocates require the information about the community that derives from the longer, more complete NHS. Without it, they will be at a profound disadvantage in planning broad communal policy, considering all possible options when dealing with pressing issues, and in speaking to government or other decision-making bodies.

Demographer Charles Shahar, chief researcher for national census analysis at Federation CJA in Montreal, told The CJN last week that it's "critical" for people who receive the NHS long form to complete it. He emphasized the importance of as many people as possible completing the voluntary longer form census, saying that "at least" an 80 per cent response rate to the NHS is necessary for the data to be considered reliable.

Linda Kislowicz, CEO of UIA Federations Canada, reinforced the urgency of Shahar's plea. "If we don't get a large critical mass of people [completing the survey], it won't be useful."

Next week will be a busy one for democracy in Canada.

We have our duties. We must, therefore, fully engage with them. We owe the country and the community nothing less.

25 years ago in The CJN

Bank of Israel governor Moshe Mandelbaum quit in the wake of a scathing report on Israel's banking system by a commission set up to probe the collapse of bank shares in 1983. The commission urged, among other things, that Mandelbaum and the heads of Israel's five largest banks resign within 30 days.

Day school funding

In his Pesach greetings to our community (April 14), Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty speaks of Ontario celebrating "difference" and thriving on "diversity," and our province's "cultural and religious mosaic." Yet his lofty words ring very hollow in light of his government's continued discriminatory policies in education, which continue to fund Catholic schools to the exclusion of all other religious minorities. We should never forget this government's vehement opposition to equity in educational funding.

In our best interests to work together

The letter in your April 14 issue about JSpaceCanada ("Group to inflict damage") perfectly illustrates why our new organization is so essential to the Canadian Jewish community. JSpaceCanada (www.jspacecanada.ca) is an autonomous group (not, as Michael Salamon incorrectly guesses, started by the New Israel Fund or affiliated with J Street in the United States), and we formed JSpaceCanada out of a love for Israel and the desire to combat the BDS (boycotts, divestments, and sanctions) movement – and more broadly the delegitimization of Israel – on the Canadian left. Being progressive Jews ourselves, we thought, and think, this positions us to be particularly effective in this endeavour. As mentioned in the article "New community voice joins pro-Israel left" (CJN, March 31), JSpaceCanada believes that only the pro-Israel left can influence the anti-Israel left, since we have (on some issues, though obviously not on Israel) a common language. In terms of JSpaceCanada's basic intent, we share with the rest of the Jewish community a passionate love for Israel and a profound abhorrence of those who seek to destroy or delegitimize it.

Given the real, serious threats posed to Israel and the Jewish people by our powerful and well-funded enemies, we believe it's in our community's best interests to have all of Am Yisrael working together to fight these enemies, rather than weakening our community's effectiveness by wasting our precious time and energy on internal divisiveness. JSpaceCanada, being pro-Israel and politically progressive, obviously differs in some respects from pro-Israel Canadian Jews with other political opinions, but we believe that our community is strengthened by diversity of views, and that respectful disagreement and debate are a time-honoured part of our tradition. If Hillel and Shamai were able to respectfully debate the key issues of their time, surely we, too, can struggle with the difficult challenges of our own without dismissing or delegitimizing each other. And if not now, when?

Shoe store boycott

Since October, Palestinian and Jewish Unity (PAJU), supported by Québec solidaire co-leaders Françoise David and Amir Khadir, Québec solidaire MNA for Mercier, have boycotted the 25-year-old Le Marcheur shoe store on St. Denis Street in Montreal because one of the brands of shoes it sells is from Israel ("Anti-boycott support," Montreal edition, March 10). The boycott began when the store's owners, the Archambaults, refused to back down to threats, and thus began a weekly demonstration demanding that St. Denis be Israeli-products free. PAJU also boycotts a shoe store across the street, Naot, because it sells Israeli-made brands. Wearing Québec solidaire pins, the boycotters block the sidewalks and intimidate passers-by. The boycotters do not care about employees of these stores, nor the workers in Israel, of Russian and Palestinian origin, who would lose their jobs if these businesses closed. Québec solidaire divides people, rather than building bridges. The people of Quebec shop at the stores every week, supporting free enterprise, and join our weekly counter-demonstration to provide support to the Archambaults. A vote for Québec solidaire is a vote for a bunch of "heels" who have not walked a mile in our shoes.

A monument of Good Deeds

Eli Rubenstein

Many years ago, I came across a fragment of a story that still haunts me to this day. As I remember it, two little Jewish boys – brothers – were playing soccer with their friends in a Lithuanian town during World War II. Their game was abruptly interrupted by a Nazi roundup and the two boys were immediately dispatched to an awaiting cattle car. As the wagon left the station, it passed the very soccer field where the boys had just been playing. There was a small crack on one of the sides of the train which allowed the boys to peer through and catch a small glimpse of the outside world – and the soccer field. What did they see? Their friends continuing to play soccer, charging up and down the field, as if nothing had happened.

The two Jewish boys were heading toward an almost certain death, and to their friends it seemed to not matter one bit. Half a century later, the brothers are still troubled by this image of indifference and apathy they witnessed from a small crack in a train on the way to their deportation.

This tiny fragment of a story, this ever so brief moment in time, is this not the entire story of the Holocaust? Is not apathy and indifference in the face of utter cruelty and barbarity the most apt description of what took place during the Kingdom of Night?

Yet there is another story which also must be told, a story involving courage, bravery and altruism beyond belief, where people took enormous risks – and even sacrificed their lives – to save others.

Why must this other side be told? So the entire picture of the Holocaust is properly shown. So that the study of the Holocaust does not cause us to give up completely on humanity. So that these courageous people can serve as role models in our own lives.

Naomi Azrieli has expressed this point so eloquently. She said that no one survived the Holocaust without the help of another. It could have been a hiding place, an extra ration, a pair of shoes – even a kind gesture. It is these acts of nobility we must remember, along with acts of Nazi horror and cruelty and the collaboration of others, that we are so familiar with.

For this reason, in most recent years, on programs like the March of the Living and March of Remembrance and Hope, a meeting with one of the Righteous Among the Nations is always included. Our young people must be given hope for the future and an understanding that evil was indeed resisted during the darkest of times – and can still be confronted today.

It is especially important to tell the stories of courage and altruism expressed by people who were not Jewish toward Jewish victims of the Holocaust, in most cases risking their lives and their families to save a complete stranger; they were not saving family members, friends, acquaintances, or even people from the same cultural background. They often had nothing in common – except for their humanity.

A little Jewish girl slipped out of the Czernowitz ghetto to the alien side. A Nazi caught her, and believing she was a Christian girl, informed her he would personally walk her home. He took her by the hand and ordered her to lead the way to her parents home. Terrified about what would happen to her and her family if she led the soldier back to the ghetto, she decided she would take the Nazi to the home of someone on the Aryan side. But who? Suddenly she remembered the address of a famous opera singer, and that is where she led the soldier. When they arrived at the home, the singer answered the door. The soldier explained to her that he had found her daughter wandering in the streets. Without pause, the woman started to berate the girl for being such a difficult child, forcefully pulled her into the house, quickly thanked the soldier for his efforts and slammed the door shut. When the door was firmly barred, and the soldier was gone, the woman ended her tirade, looked at the girl with kindness in her eyes, and simply said, "You're a Jewish girl aren't you?."

In a split second, this woman not only had the moral courage, but the moral imagination to take the steps that would save a life, the life of someone she had never met before in her life.

In Albania, the Nazis knocked on the door of a Muslim family hiding a Jewish boy, demanding they give up their Jewish guest. The Muslim father insisted there were no Jews in his home, only his two sons. But the Nazi insisted that the Muslim father only had one son. "Now is the time to show who we are," the father said as he looked at his true son.

"Who is the Jew?" the Nazi asked again.

His real son then stepped forward and was shot.

During the 1932-1933 Holodomer, the Stalinist man-made famine that resulted in the deaths of millions of ethnic Ukrainians, Andrei Novikov, a starving Ukrainian was saved by Jewish villagers.

But years later, when the Nazis deported the Jews from the town that had sheltered him, there was nothing Novikov could do. Except for one thing. The only thing the Jews of the village asked Andrei to do was to remember them after their death.

So Andrei Novikov committed to memory the 127 names of the Jews that were deported and, years later, sent the list of the names of his martyred Jewish friends to Yad Vashem, in Israel.

Jerzy Kozminski, centre, hid 13 Jews during the Holocaust. He met with Canadian students in Poland who travelled there on a recent trip of the March of Remembrance and Hope. With him, from left, are Alyssa Idler, Carolyn Bartlett, Tashauna Reid and Nahayat Tizhoosh.

Let me close with one final story recounted by Israeli Holocaust survivor and historian Israel Gutman.

"A Jew... knocked on the door of a poor farmer's cottage and asked for food. They let him in and discovered that he had been wandering about in the woods for several days with his wife and two children. The poor peasants took them all in. In time, the two families bonded so well that they became as one. One day, the farmer returned from a trip to a neighbouring village and told them that the Germans found a Jewish family sheltered there and murdered them all, both the Jews and the Polish family hiding them. They all lapsed into silence. The Jews realized that they couldn't keep endangering their Polish protectors so during the night, they packed up their belongings. In the morning, the Poles came to their room. "We've been talking about this. Stay. Whatever happens to you, will happen to us." And these people survived.

The story symbolizes the most noble in values that can be found among people who, only recently, had been complete strangers to each other. The poor farmer and his wife first offer food to an even poorer, starving Jewish man, then they rescue him and his entire family. Then the Jewish family decide they cannot place the Polish family at risk, and resolve to leave – but the Polish man and woman insist they stay, telling them: "What happens to you, will happen to us." Are there any more beautiful words than these that were ever spoken during the Holocaust?

Twelve-year-old Donia Rosen wrote in her diary on June 23, 1943, hiding in the forest after the murder of her family....

"Words fail me, but I must write, I must. I want to ask you not to forget the dead. I want to beg you with all my heart that... you establish a memorial to us, a monument that reaches the sky, a mark that will be seen throughout the world – a statue not of marble and not of stone, but of good deeds. For I believe with a full and perfect faith that only such a monument can ensure you and your children a better future, and then the evil that seized control of the world... will not return."

Those who resisted Nazi tyranny during the Kingdom of Night have left us a monument of good deeds. It is in their footsteps, in the example of these heroic individuals, and in homage to their exceptional spirit, that we, even in the smallest way, must try to emulate their actions. It would be the greatest and most profound tribute to their courageous spirit and at the same time an utter rejection of everything the Nazis stood for.

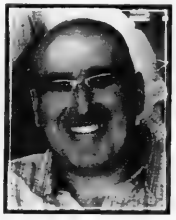
A bright light for the future

It's not always easy living in Israel, with its high taxes, low tolerance, terrible traffic, hateful regional neighbours, too many Jews and too few manners.

But it only takes an incident or two a month to make me realize why I chose to live here and why I wouldn't live anywhere else.

I recently completed a week of miluim – military reserve duty. After midnight one Thursday night, as things were winding down, a young reserve officer came into the room I was in and asked if anyone was heading to Jerusalem. I was, and offered him a lift.



Yair Lootsteen in Jerusalem

Being tired, I struck up a conversation to stay awake. Turns out this young, soft-spoken Rehovot native studies computer engineering at Hebrew University. He was concerned about the classes and material he'd missed during the week.

The conversation drifted to our military backgrounds. He told me how he'd come to be doing reserve duty in the unit he's now posted in.

He did his compulsory military service in the combat engineering corps, an infantry unit that trains sappers but also specializes in building and breaching fortifications, as well as in biological and chemical warfare and the operation of heavy mechanical vehicles.

He completed officer training, and early one morning in August 2006, during the Second Lebanon War, he successfully led a platoon of soldiers in several armoured personnel carriers to a purportedly protected encampment overlooking a village in southern Lebanon. He spoke of the fear he felt later while dashing under fire to retrieve a vehicle that had been left outside the post, a fear he hadn't spoken of for several years, something he'd put behind him.

Hezbollah rockets and shells rained on their position. He took shrapnel to the head and waited more than 12 hours to be evacuated to a clinic in Kiryat Shmonah. Doctors who examined him diagnosed only superficial head wounds. After transfer to a hospital in Safed, it became clear, however, that some shrapnel had penetrated his brain. He was airlifted to Haifa's Rambam Hospital, where he underwent emergency surgery and spent several weeks recuperating.

After further convalescence, it was determined he hadn't suffered any permanent impairment.

He was disappointed that his comrades-in-arms, particularly his company commander and the commander's deputy, hadn't visited more often while he was hospitalized. Somehow, though, he understood. They, too, wanted to move on with their lives.

After recovering fully, the army informed him that he'd been released from further duty. He successfully contested the decision, returning to his unit, albeit to a slightly less-dangerous position.

Upon completing his four-year compulsory tour of duty (officers serve at least one extra year), he was assigned to his current reserve unit, in which he served during this latest round of miluim.

The army is no longer central to his life. His studies are, although he also finds time for his girlfriend. He's in a hurry to graduate and get into the real world. He wants a job in high-tech.

He finished his story just as we entered Jerusalem. It was late and the buses had stopped running. I drove him to Hebrew U's Givat Ram campus, letting him off without even asking his name.

Although it was the dead of night when I got home and no one was awake, it took me a while to fall asleep. This young man's tale had touched me. No bravado, just understatement. Not terribly emotional. He'd told it matter-of-factly. Despite his trauma, he's getting on with his life. He's going to succeed.

Israel's future often looks downright bleak. Left or right, there aren't any real leaders. Peace is certainly not at hand. Our region is in turmoil. Corruption seems rampant. It seems we'll soon be overrun by haredim.

But things are far from hopeless. The economy is booming. There's a renaissance in Jewish studies, both religious and secular. Universities are teeming with world-class scientists and professionals. Volunteerism is up, and when things get tough for particular sectors in society, mutual responsibility (arvut hadadit) is being exhibited wonderfully through the work of thousands of organizations and individuals.

We're succeeding, despite our governments. And with young people like my travelling companion, one can't help but be optimistic.

I hope to meet him again next time I'm in miluim.

Goldstone reconsidered

As CJN readers know, I've been a consistent and substantive (as distinct from personal) critic of the Goldstone report from the beginning. This travesty was the predictable result of the unholy alliance between the worst human rights violators – the regimes controlling Libya, Iran, Syria, Saudi Arabia, etc. – and powerful officials of non-governmental organizations (NGOs) who exploit the façade of moral language for immoral goals. The leaders of this alliance abused the tragedy of the Gaza war (December 2008/January 2009) and Judge Richard Goldstone's reputation in order to promote a lethal political assault against Israel.

It took Goldstone a long time, but he has now taken a major step toward restoring his moral standing. Goldstone's recent article in the Washington Post belatedly acknowledges that there was no basis for the libel accusing Israeli soldiers of deliberately killing civilians in Gaza and that his report put far too little emphasis on the thousands of Palestinian missile and terror attacks against Israelis – each of which constitutes a real war crime.

Understandably, the victims of Palestinian attacks in Sderot and southern Israel whose tragedies were ignored in this report will not be quick to forgive Goldstone. And the same is true in the case of Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit, whose kidnapping was erased. Similarly, the damage caused by falsely labelling Israeli soldiers "war criminals" and accusing them of "violations of international law" won't disappear quickly. Goldstone must make his peace with them before he can be forgiven.

At the same time, many others responsible for this immoral farce have attacked Goldstone for admitting any mistakes, while they continue to promote lies about Israeli policy. This group of hard-core propagandists initially embraced the Jewish judge from South Africa who attacked Israel, but have now dismissed Goldstone's words because he no longer supports their party line. Instead of crediting him with the wisdom to see the evidence and admit mistakes, they invoke racist stereotypes of a nefarious Jewish/Zionist lobby that forced him to make statements he knew to be untrue.

For anyone who has known and listened to Goldstone, this accusation is particularly galling and unjustified, just as the personal attacks from critics of his role as the leader of the UN-NGO assault on Israel were wrong. In reality, a careful reading of Goldstone's statements over the past six months shows a gradual but growing recognition of the truth.

He admitted that the mandate provided by the UN Human Rights Council was entirely biased and that the evidence copied by the "fact-finding" commission staff from their ideological NGO allies had been invented. The Goldstone report had its origins in the infamous NGO forum of the 2001 UN Durban anti-racism conference, in which the leaders of more than 1,500 groups that have kidnapped the rhetoric of human rights adopted a strategy of demonization of Israel. He should have had the wisdom to reject all manifestations of this political war.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

Therefore, it took courage for Goldstone to go against lifelong friends and allies who have misappropriated the flag of human rights, and he should be given credit for this and encouraged to continue in this direction.

By recanting, Goldstone has also exposed the ways the UN-NGO alliance invents "facts" and distorts international law beyond recognition in order to single out Israel. Human Rights Watch, Amnesty International, B'Tselem, and numerous Palestinian and other groups that use human rights rhetoric provided most of the unverifiable "evidence" used in the Goldstone report. Their exploitation of human rights has now been highlighted for all to see.

In a desperate effort to limit the damage, Kenneth Roth, an obsessive anti-Israel ideologue who heads Human Rights Watch, published articles in the Jerusalem Post, the Guardian and the New York Times, attempting to rewrite Goldstone's carefully chosen words. Under Roth, HRW also marketed Gadhafi's "Tripoli spring" and sought funds from Saudi Arabia in order to attack Israel.

This unethical behaviour by powerful NGOs, and their intensive efforts to distort and spin Goldstone's recognition of moral mistakes, is not unique. In 2010, Robert Bernstein, the founder of HRW condemned his own organization and suffered the same type of abuse as Goldstone is now receiving. Bernstein stood fast and refused to be "spun" or reinterpreted, and now Goldstone has joined him in speaking truth to the abuses of NGO power.

A city in the eye of historical storms

Call it whatever you please – Czernowitz, Chernivtsi, Cernauti or Chernovtsy. This city in southwestern Europe, the birthplace of the poet Paul Celan, has presented itself in various guises. Until the collapse of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, it was known as Czernowitz. In the wake of World War I, it was called Cernauti. Under Soviet rule after World War II, it was renamed Chernovtsy. Since the resumption of Ukraine's independence in 1991, its name has been Chernivtsi. As is evident, this city has been in the eye of historical storms, having witnessed the upheavals that convulsed this comparatively remote corner of Europe in the 20th century.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

When I visited the city in the autumn of 1992, I came away with the distinct impression that it had seen far better days.

Yet its quaint old quarter, with its grand buildings, cobblestone streets and fin-de-siecle atmosphere, was, as I wrote back then, "redolent of 19th-century Vienna."

From the mid-19th century to the end of World War II, the city was a centre of German Jewish and Eastern European culture.

But Jews who had lived there, like the Israeli novelist Aharon Applefeld, carried mixed memories.

On the one hand, they remembered it as a multicultural, tolerant place where German literature, music, art and philosophy flourished. On the other hand, they recalled the fascist and communist eras, when Jewish lives were expendable.

Ghosts of Home: The Afterlife of Czernowitz in Jewish Memory (University of California Press), by Marianne Hirsch and Leo Spitzer, examines Czernowitz in all its ethnic and cultural permutations from the Habsburg era to the contemporary period.

Blending history and communal memoir, this is a book whose echoes reverberate across generations and in which the authors are personally invested.

Hirsch, a professor of English and comparative literature at Columbia University, was born in Romania, the daughter of Holocaust survivors who came from Czernowitz.

Spitzer, a retired professor of history who taught at Dartmouth College, was born in Bolivia, the son of Austrian Jews from Vienna.

Hirsch and Spitzer visited the city, some 50 kilometres north of the Romanian border today, four times between 1998 and 2008, once in the company of her aged parents.

Hirsch spells out her reason for going there early on. "I grew up in 1950s Bucharest, Romania, within a community of fellow German-speaking exiles from Czernowitz whose tastes, attitudes, behaviours and stories about a world that had long ceased to exist shaped me profoundly," she writes. "My desire to visit Czernowitz originated with these encounters and grew in intensity over many years."

Hirsch, whose first and second languages were German and Romanian, adds, "After my parents and I [immigrated] to Austria in 1961 and to the United States in 1962, my parents' city of origin acquired an ever more distant, mythic aura."

German became the official language of Bukowina – the province in which Czernowitz was located – when it was ceded to the Habsburgs in 1775.

A mosaic of cultures, Bukowina was ultimately inhabited by Ruthenians (modern-day Ukrainians), Moldavian Romanians, Poles, Jews, Germans and Hungarians.

Its Jewish inhabitants, having been granted a range of civil and economic rights previously denied to them, were encouraged to assimilate into and identify with Austro-German norms and values.

As Yiddish speakers, Jews had little trouble learning German.

And while many Jews happily adopted German and shed old Jewish ways and customs, traditional Jews, particularly in villages and rural areas, resisted the new cultural influences and resented the imperial limitations on the legal autonomy of Jewish communal organizations.

Franz Joseph's accession to the throne in 1848 led to a further expansion of the emancipation of Jews, a process that culminated in 1867 when Jews were granted full political and legal rights, Hirsch and Spitzer write.

Acculturated Jews gained professional advantages over their less assimilated coreligionists and over ethnic Romanians, Ruthenians and Poles, who remained less identified with Germanic culture.

This was a factor that fed anti-Semitism and fueled the further development of tribal nationalism.

Jews played an integral role in the economy and in the modernization of Bukowina.

They were important in the lumber industry, instrumental in building short-distance tram and rail transport facilities and prominent as the proprietors of inns, hotels, taverns, coffee houses, beet sugar factories, breweries, mineral oil refineries, wood-burning stove plants and building materials supply yards.

Jews gravitated into the professions as doctors, lawyers, teachers and journalists and participated in politics on the local and provincial levels.

By the turn of the 19th century, Jews comprised one-third of Czernowitz's population.

On the surface, Bukowina's mix of ethnic groups got along reasonably well, but they rarely socialized after working hours.

Antisemitism always bubbled, sometimes erupting and triggering "a crisis of identity" among assimilated Jews.

Eventually, they were caught in an ideological clash pitting German cosmopolitans who favoured integration against German volkists who valued racial purity and shunned "outsiders."

The advent of Romanian rule, after World War I, was an inauspicious event for Jews. They faced increasing restrictions, quotas, exclusions, harassment and even violence.

Romania's policy of Romanianization initially applied to Ukrainians in Bukowina and to Hungarians in Transylvania, but Germans and Jews were soon subjected to it as well.

During the 1920s and 1930s, openly anti-semitic Romanian groups, like Alexandru Cuza's League of National Christian Defence and Corneliu Condreanu's Iron Guard, emerged. But Germans and Ukrainians were infected by the virus, too.

In 1938, King Carol II appointed a pro-German government, headed by Cuza and Octavian Goga, and they proceeded to annul the citizenship of 225,000 Jews, or one-third of Romania's Jewish population.

For Jews, the Soviet occupation was no picnic either. But compared to the abysmal period when Romania aligned itself with Nazi Germany, it was benign.

Jews were murdered en masse and deported to Transnistria. In Cernauti, Jews were ghettoized, compelled to wear a yellow star and subjected to a whole host of indignities.

The war in Bukowina ended in March 1944 with the Red Army in command. But life continued to be "brutally hard, sullen and joyless," a Jewish resident reported.

When I passed through Chernivtsi almost 20 years ago, the Jewish population had sunk to 6,000. I suppose the Jewish presence is considerably smaller today.

But judging by Ghosts of Home, this city still exerts a special pull on its former Jewish residents and their children and constitutes an integral part of their identity.

Fundraiser helps provide guide dogs for the blind

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Organizers of a fundraiser for the Israel Guide Dog Center for the Blind (IGDCB) hope a June 2 event in Toronto will raise awareness about a 20-year mission to restore independence and dignity to the lives of the unsighted.

Until IGDCB was founded in 1991 by Noach Braun, the only way a blind Israeli could have a guide dog was by training at a North American centre for the blind.

Only those who spoke fluent English and could leave their families behind for a month could take part, and even if someone did receive a guide dog from overseas, there was no system in place to provide assistance if a problem arose.

Today, the non-profit IGDCB, located in Rehovot, Israel, is the only accredited centre of its kind in the Middle East working to give blind people a new lease on life by training guide dogs and giving them to people who need the help.

Since 2009, Sara Gabriel, the executive director of the Canadian Friends of IGDCB, has been working from her Thornhill home to promote the organization.

"We try to tell people and make them understand that guide dogs are a bridge between the sighted and the unsighted world," Gabriel said.

Since the centre is supported almost entirely by donations from individuals, foundations and organizations, much of Gabriel's time goes into fundraising.

In June, the Canadian Friends of IGDCB will host about 300 people at the Eglinton Grand in Toronto for its second annual cocktail and wine reception.

The MC for the event, which will also celebrate the organization's 20th anniversary, will be radio and television personality Ralph Benmergui. It will feature a performance by Juno Award-winning jazz singer Sophie Milman.

Israel Defence Forces veteran Moti Levy, who lost his eyesight and his left arm during an IDF training exercise in 1976, will tell his story of being partnered with Sammy, a Canadian-born golden Labrador retriever that was donated to the IGDCB by Canadian Guide Dogs for the Blind when he was a puppy.

"We are also going to be raffling off two spaces for people to be blindfolded and go through an obstacle course with Sammy," Gabriel said.

"Nothing can make you understand or feel what it is to be a blind person, but with this, there will be the sensation that we want people to feel."

Gabriel said she had a similar experience when she first visited the centre in Israel.

One of the trainers encouraged her to take part in a demonstration to better understand the service that guide dogs provide. Standing blindfolded on a busy street in Rehovot, Gabriel said she got a taste of what it is like to put your trust into a guide dog.

"I was nervous because the dog didn't know me and I didn't know the dog... The dog felt my hesitation, but when he felt that I was more secure with him, we began walking and we walked at a fast pace."

After 20 minutes of walking up and down the sidewalk and crossing busy streets, relieved, Gabriel ripped off her blindfold.

That's when it really hit her: a blind person doesn't have the option of removing a blindfold.

"Israel has more blind people per capita than anywhere else in the world. We have more than 27,000 blind people because of wars, terrorism, as well as genetic diseases," Gabriel said.

To date, she added, the centre has helped nearly 400 people, and last year, they arranged 32 partnerships, the most ever in one year.

Moti Levy and Sammy in the snow

While the service is completely free for the recipients, each partnership between a dog and a blind person costs $25,000, and in less than two years, the Canadian Friends has collected and sent about $400,000 to the centre in Israel.

"That's because of the generosity from the community, so we try to continue to bring awareness to the community about what we do and how important it is to give a guide dog to a blind person," Gabriel said, adding that the goal for the upcoming event is to raise $150,000.

She said celebrating the organization's 20th anniversary is less about looking back on its accomplishments and more about pushing forward to see what else can be done to serve the blind community in Israel.

She spoke about a new training method called "clicker training" that was developed by Guide Dogs for the Blind in San Rafael, Calif.

In this system, each time a dog successfully completes a task or demonstrates good behaviour, it is rewarded with a click produced by a small, hand-held device, quickly followed by a treat, Soon, the treat can be replaced by praise and a warm pat.

Gabriel said the trainers in Israel have been using this method for just one year, and training times have been reduced by four weeks, to 16 weeks. The goal is to eventually reduce the training time to 12 weeks.

She said this is important because the waiting list for this service continues to grow, "so the faster we train a dog, the faster we can give it to a blind person."

Survivor to share testimony and love story

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Holocaust survivor Nancy Kleinberg, whose against-all-odds survival and love story inspired audiences when it was featured on Live! With Regis and Kelly's Greatest Love Story contest earlier this year, will be sharing her testimony at a Holocaust Memorial Service in Oshawa.

On May 1, Oshawa's Beth Zion Congregation and Ajax's B'nai Shalom V'tikvah will host their sixth annual service at Beth Zion.

Kleinberg will share her story that includes forced labour, a three-day death march from Auschwitz to Bergen-Belsen, constant hunger and debilitating disease.

Nancy and Howard Kleinberg

"So many times I was close to death," Kleinberg said in an interview.

But what makes Kleinberg's story unique is the events that unfolded after Bergen-Belsen was liberated in April 1945, when she and her aunt decided to cross over to the men's side of the camp to check for survivors.

"All you saw were so many corpses," she said.

Kleinberg, who was 16 years old at the time, saw movement in a pile of dead bodies.

It was an 18-year-old boy, Howard, whom she recognized from her hometown of Weirzbnik, Poland. He was barely clinging to life.

"My aunt said, 'You're crazy. He's dead.' I said, 'He is not dead, but if we leave him here, he will be for sure.'"

Over the next three weeks, Kleinberg was committed to saving his life and slowly nursed him back to health in an abandoned barrack. One day, Howard mustered up enough strength to make his way to the side of the road. He was picked up by British soldiers and taken to a hospital where he spent six months recuperating.

Kleinberg said she had no idea where he'd gone and was sure she'd never see him again.

Upon learning that her parents, siblings and most of her relatives had perished during the Holocaust, she eventually made her way to North America, finally settling in Toronto in 1947.

Meanwhile, Howard had also immigrated to Toronto about six weeks earlier and learned that she had arrived.

"Back then, Toronto was a very small town and he heard that I had arrived, and he wanted to see the girl who saved his life," she said.

Without warning, Howard showed up on her doorstep with a corsage and a question: "Remember me?"

Three years later, they were married, and last month, the Kleinbergs celebrated their 61st wedding anniversary.

Kleinberg said that at the May 1 service, she will be sharing more details about their love story, as well as stories about her countless near-death experiences and the unimaginable hardships she faced.

She added that sharing her story is difficult, but insisted that "as long as HaShem gives us the strength, we should speak out and educate our children about the Holocaust."

Lina Zatzman, one of the organizers of the service, said the event will also include a candlelighting service and the reading of names of community members' relatives who died during the Holocaust.

The Beth Zion Hebrew school children will also be singing.

"Our synagogue is not large, and we find that... the children's singing makes the service personal and heimish," Zatzman said.

Morah Chana says learning has to be fun

Carol Green's long denim skirt is not surprising, given the practicality of the fabric and the typically modest attire of teachers at Netivot HaTorah Day School, an Orthodox institution.

But her colourful socks, incorporating a cheerful yellow bird with a bright orange beak, are hardly de rigueur. Earlier this month, she wore them to school because the Hebrew letter tzadi was the "letter of the week" in her Hebrew immersion senior kindergarten classroom. (Tzipor, which starts with tzadi, is the Hebrew word for bird.)

By Frances Kraft

Full disclosure: Morah Chana, as she is known to her students, is my sister-in-law. Although a couple of people who know her professionally had suggested that I profile her for this column, I deflected their suggestions, to avoid the appearance of nepotism. But when her name came up again recently, and I heard more details about her approach to teaching, I decided it would be a shame not to interview her, and my editor agreed.

A native of Toronto who grew up in a traditional Conservative family, Green attended Associated Hebrew Schools and the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto before completing her BA in psychology at the University of Toronto. Later, she attended the Midrasha l'Morim, where she received a teaching diploma in 1987, and subsequently earned her special education and principal's credentials from York University through its Jewish teacher education program.

A lesson from the teacher: "In special education, you learn to catch a child doing something good. That's what I train students to do: look for the good. If you look at the positives in each other, you'll have a much more positive environment to learn in."

Her career at Netivot dates back to 1986, when she began as a classroom assistant. Currently, Green splits her day between the school's Shaarei Shomayim campus, where she teaches Hebrew immersion SK, and the Thornhill location, where she teaches Grade 1 Hebrew.

She likes to wear "child-friendly" clothing, and carries a key chain with attachments that often serve as conversation-starters for young students.

On the first day of school, she likes to wear a t-shirt that reads, "Shalom, Kitah Aleph," in Hebrew letters. "That's the first thing they learn how to read," said Green, a mother of two who visits Israel about once a year.

"Learning has got to be fun," she said.

A typical "letter of the week" lesson includes actions that relate to the letter when the letter comes up as part of tfillah or in songs. Her students think they're just having fun, she said.

As a teenager, Green worked as a camp counsellor and a teacher in a Sunday Hebrew school. She enjoys working with young children, especially "seeing the light go on" when they learn to read and write. "It's amazing what they can do."

A believer in structure, Green said that once children get used to classroom routines, they "can flourish within them."

Carol Green [Frances Kraft photo]

The most challenging aspect, she said, is "making sure you really do touch every child, and that every child feels equally special."

A Message from Ken Dryden

Dear Friends,

I feel compelled at this time to share with you what I believe on matters that are of special importance to you and to me:

I believe, and the Liberal Party and Michael Ignatieff believe, in the security and safety of Israel, and the justice of its cause.

I believe, as Michael Ignatieff has put it, that while there are many differences between us and the Conservatives, on Israel we stand as one in support of our democratic ally. The Liberal government's record is one of historic support for Israel – the signing of the UN Partition Plan in 1947, the first ever free trade agreement with Israel, the designation of Hamas and Hezbollah as terrorist organizations in 2002, and the first major condemnation of anti-Semitism, all happened under Liberal governments.

I believe it's important to engage Canadians who are not Jewish on matters of Israel and anti-Semitism; to have as your advocates not just those who understand, but those who can also advocate to others and help them understand.

I believe that those of the Jewish community are also immensely proud of the role they've played in Canada in such matters as social justice, human rights, tikkun olam, and philanthropy, and know it was successive Liberal governments they supported and influenced that brought in medicare, the CPP, and the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

I believe in the importance of the Jewish community in all of its dimensions for Canada and for the future.

I know how much Israel means to you. I know how much Canada means to you.

Ken Dryden

"Ken Dryden is an authentic national icon – and not only because of his athletic prowess as a Stanley Cup champion. He is a true renaissance man – a unique combination of mind and heart – an incredible human being and I personally can bear witness to his outstanding performance as a Cabinet Minister who negotiated a childcare agreement with all the provinces – only to have it dismantled by the Conservatives when they took power. We need Ken's voice and vision back in Parliament and the government for the benefit of the constituents of York Centre and the Canadian people." –Hon. Irwin Cotler

Michael Ignatieff – in his own words

On support for Israel in Canadian politics: "My party will never claim to be the only genuine defenders of Israel in Canadian politics because I don't want my party to be alone in the defence of Israel – I want all parties to be genuine defenders of Israel." (Michael Ignatieff, Speech to the Canadian Jewish Congress Plenary, May 31, 2009)

On anti-Semitism: "This is what we have to fight. And we have to say whatever our origin, whatever our politics, whatever our past, whatever our religions, whatever our faith – anti-Semitism is not just a threat to the Jews, it's a threat to every single one of us and to all humanity." (Speech to the Inter-parliamentary Coalition for Combating Anti-Semitism, November 8, 2010)

How to keep your kids safe from online dangers

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

With the emergence of the World Wide Web in the 1990s, warning our children about talking to strangers has taken on a whole new meaning.

While the Internet has allowed us to become more efficient and better connected, concerned parents have the new challenge of protecting their children from the many risks associated with having an online presence.

Robbins Hebrew Academy and Beth Torah Synagogue presented a lecture April 12 on "Personal and Internet Safety" as part a series called Partnering with Parents.

Carlos James, Robbins' director of information technology, warned parents about the dangers their children face when they become active members of the online community that consists of nearly two billion people.

He said 93 per cent of children between 13 and 17 years of age are online, but the laws in place to protect them from online sexual predators, scammers and other dangerous people, are largely unenforced or outdated.

He said parents should be the first line of defence, but some feel overwhelmed and challenged by the new technology.

Perhaps the biggest concern of the parents at the lecture was how to monitor their preteen children who have profiles on social networking sites and are chat room participants.

James stressed the importance of utilizing all the available privacy settings provided by the sites, and being careful about the information volunteered online.

As a general rule, when it comes to sharing personal information, "if you don't need to share it, don't share it," James said.

Even if all the privacy settings are being used, "somebody always finds their way around them... There is still a chance that we might find it through another source," he added.

Another issue that comes up with networking sites is the damage that could be done to someone's reputation if scandalous photos or messages are posted.

"Social networking sites are great places. It's great to be able to catch up with people... and they give us a place to express personal identity and maintain electronic connections with friends," James said.

"However, like all things, we have to be careful about what we share, what we disclose, what might be out there in terms of photos, and how it could damage our reputation by having that material up and not realizing it."

Claire Sumerlus, Robbins' head of school said she always tells her students that "if you wouldn't post it [on a billboard] at Bay and Bloor, don't post it on Facebook."

There are many other issues children need to be wary about as they become more technologically savvy.

For example, James warned that children and teens could become addicted to online gaming and gambling sites, fall prey to scams and identity theft, access pornography – intentionally or not – become involved with child predators, and become victims of cyberbullying.

Cyberbullying, which can include repeatedly sending offensive messages or posting messages online to damage a person's reputation, has recently garnered more attention since an increasing number of teens and young adults committed suicide after becoming victims to this new trend.

James said cyberbullying has the potential to be even more damaging than in-person bullying because it's more difficult to escape it. A bully can incessantly attack his or her victim via Facebook, text messaging and e-mail.

Another concern is identity theft, which can affect Internet users of all ages, but children in particular are generally more naive about what could be potentially dangerous.

"Be aware of what you choose to make public and know that even if it is secure, it can still [accessed]. Be cautious and consider getting identity theft insurance," James said, adding that most major banks offer it and it can be included in your home insurance free of charge.

James offered a number of tips parents can use to protect their children from Internet dangers.

He said it's important for parents to discuss with their children which sites and subject matters are off-limits; establish a schedule for computer use so that the parents can monitor their childrens' behaviour and protect against child predators; warn their children against giving out personal information including their name, phone number and address; and insist that they should never agree to meet an online stranger without parental permission.

With technology that allows people to carry the Internet in their back pocket, it's becoming increasingly difficult to monitor what children are doing and seeing online, James said.

This is why parents shouldn't completely restrict their children from using computers and other electronic devices, James said.

Instead, "we must empower them to independently make good choices – to know what's right, what's wrong, what is safe, what is not safe."

Unilateral declaration will lead to conflict

Mahmoud Abbas

Salam Fayyad

The April 16 National Post editorial, "A better way to build a Palestinian state," presented what might appear to be a reasonable case for the Palestinian Authority's decision to seek recognition for a Palestinian state at the United Nations in September.

The Post noted that unlike former PA president Yasser Arafat, who used violence and terrorism against Israelis, the current PA leadership, President Mahmoud Abbas and Prime Minister Salam Fayyad, "have made a conscious decision to pursue statehood through non-violent means. And this month, they are expected to receive an extraordinary gesture of encouragement from the international community."

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Indeed, the IMF, World Bank, and the UN have all recently acknowledged that the PA, which, in the words of the Post, is committed to "building the trappings of a real, modern state," has met the conditions for statehood.

The "West Bank economy is now growing at an annual rate of 9 per cent. A decade ago, Palestinians were synonymous in the media with human bombs: Who would want to give the powers of a sovereign government to such extremists? Now, the public face of the PA is two somewhat boring men who put on trade shows and celebrate the merits of direct deposit."

In other words, the Post argues that the Palestinians have finally earned the right to statehood – something, the paper points out, many Israelis who favour a two-state solution, also support.

Who could object to this promising picture?

Well, the Post acknowledges that "Supporters of Israel may be concerned by a PA campaign for statehood that endruns Israeli negotiations," yet immediately adds, as if this mitigates that concern, "But the nature of that campaign at least shows a welcome turn in Palestinian tactics."

In a nutshell, here's the problem: a change in Palestinian tactics does not amount to a change in strategy. As this column explained a few weeks ago, the PA's refusal to negotiate with Israel, in violation of the Oslo II agreement, signals to Israelis that the Palestinians want to establish their state without recognizing the Israeli one. In this respect, Abbas' strategy is not different from Arafat's, even if his tactics are.

When the Post wrote that "PA leaders already have announced that, absent meaningful negotiations with Israel this year, they will apply for UN membership in September," it failed to observe that it's the Palestinians who reject negotiations. They believe that, without having to compromise with Israel, they can achieve statehood by appealing to the international community instead.

(This refusal to compromise became even more entrenched following Al Jazeera's leaks of the "Palestine Papers," which erroneously made it appear that during the Annapolis talks in 2008, Abbas made generous offers that then-Israeli prime minister Ehud Olmert rejected. Abbas was left embarrassed before his outraged public and then declared he'd no longer be able to "compromise" with Israel.)

Now, Palestinian officials speak about pressing the UN to call for the recognition of a Palestinian state based on the "1967 borders" along with the acknowledgement of the "right of return" of Palestinian refugees (to Israel) – both "red lines" for Israel.

Some legal analysts in Israel have tried to downplay the impact of the PA's UN gambit, arguing that General Assembly resolutions are only recommendations (i.e. non-binding), so Israel has little to fear. Others, though, explain that should Palestinian statehood be recognized under the "Uniting for Peace" GA resolution (which employs the language of "aggressor" and "threat to peace" – language that would be applied against Israel), the Jewish state would likely become even more isolated internationally and vulnerable to sanctions. Branding Israel an "aggressor" would officially play into the Palestinian/Arab narrative and turn history on its head.

Meanwhile, UN Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338, which underlie all Mideast peacemaking efforts, including Oslo, require, through negotiations alone, the recognition of Israel, the "establishment of safe and secure boundaries," and the "termination of all claims or states of belligerency." The PA's unilateral drive ignores all these requirements.

That's a prescription for conflict, not peace.

First Canadian named to head intl. ICRF

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Bradley Goldhar is the first Canadian to become international president of the Israel Cancer Research Fund (ICRF).

An investment adviser, Goldhar, 50, who is married and has two children, has served as vice-president of the international board and president of the Toronto chapter of ICRF.

In 1997, after living in England for five years, he came back to his native Toronto and was looking to get involved in the community, he said.

"I wanted to show my support for Israel, and I wanted to help support cancer research. Getting involved in ICRF allowed me to do both."

Bradley Goldhar

He was invited to work on the organization's gala honouring the Koffler family, he said, and after that he joined the board and the executive committee.

His new volunteer executive position is a significant commitment, he said, and has to fit in with his day job. "I'll be overseeing the whole global community – United States, Canada and Israel."

He said ICRF is a meaningful organization that has identified and funded world-class cancer research scientists working in Israel. "The organization is focused on funding both established scientists and young researchers who are just starting their careers.

"Our targeted funding has helped lead to the discovery of significant cancer-fighting drugs such as Doxil, Gleevac and Velcade, which help thousands of cancer patients in North America and around the world."

> 'I want the money to flow to the best projects'

Every year, he said, ICRF puts out a call to Israeli scientists asking them for their research proposals.

This year, they had more than 100 proposals, out of which they chose 40. These 40 scientists gathered on March 21 in New York to present their work.

"It is a peer review process, and magic happens when these senior scientists identify the best projects," Goldhar said.

There are different levels of funding, he said, including $25,000 (all figures US) or $30,000 for a two-year period, $35,000 or $45,000 for a three-year period, a professorship for $50,000 for seven years, and a distinguished chair who receives $200,000 for five years.

Last year, the organization granted just under $2 million for 51 scientists who are working at the Technion-Israel Institute of Technology, the Weizmann Institute of Science or Shaare Zedek Medical Center.

"It is a spectacular day. I'm not a scientist, but when I see the incredible work these people are doing, I can feel their passion. I want the money to flow to the best projects."

During his term, he said, he hopes to achieve a significant increase in funding, "and I'm looking forward to establishing new geographical areas of support."

The 150-year rule

Rabbi Leigh Lerner

"And you shall tell your child on that day..." (Exodus 13)

This, the ultimate source of the Pesach Haggadah, makes every generation responsible for sharing the story of the Exodus. It's the Jewish antidote to the poison pill that every historical fact swallows, for every historical fact has a chartable existence. After 150 years, most historical facts disappear from societal memory.

Why 150 years? It's the time covered by transmission of information from grandparents to grandchildren, and then to their grandchildren. Thus, stories are transmitted across five generations by human beings who had contact with the stories' source. After five generations, they stop being "memories" of the living.

Let's go back 150 years, to June 23, 1858, in Bologna, in the Papal States. Police seized six-year-old Edgardo, the son of a Jewish couple, Salomone and Marianna Mortara, and transported him to Rome to be raised by the Catholic Church.

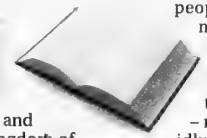
Inquisition authorities in Rome, authorized by Pope Pius IX, had learned that a Catholic servant had baptized Edgardo when he was ill because she feared he might die and go to hell. Under Papal State law, Edgardo's baptism made him a Christian. Under canon law, Jews could not raise a Christian child, even their own.

Edgardo was taken to a house for Catholic converts in Rome. Pius IX turned away all appeals. The Mortaras could have Edgardo back if they converted to Catholicism.

There were many protests, including from governments. Pius IX held firm.

The case hardened opinion among liberals and nationalists that the pope's rule over central Italy was an anachronism and an affront to human rights in an "enlightened" age of rationalism. It helped persuade Britain and France to allow the Kingdom of Piedmont to wage war against the Papal States in 1859 and annex the pope's territories.

Rabbinic Reflections



Edgardo Mortara became a priest and, in later life, visited his mother. Elena Mortara, a great-great-granddaughter of one of Edgardo's sisters, and a literature professor in Rome, still campaigns for an apology and against the canonization of Pius IX. But who among us remembers this case?

As Yom Hashoah approaches, we needn't worry whether the Holocaust will be forgotten in our time. When we approach 2100, virtually all of us will be gone, and the memory of the Shoah will be thin, indeed.

But Pesach gives us a message for Yom Hashoah: if a memory defines a people, and if that memory is religiously institutionalized, it can endure. The Exodus from Egypt was a defining moment for Judaism. The seder institutionalized the memory.

To preserve the memory of the Shoah, our first question is, can we discern the way it defined the Jewish People's character? But it must be a positive way, because people will not celebrate negativity for long.

We can answer yes. Because "I was a slave in the land of concentration camps," I – we – resolve never to stand idly by the blood of our brothers and sisters, and by extension, never to stand idly by the blood of any human being. But it can be phrased positively: be it resolved that the Jewish People will actively defend the right of every peaceable person and group to live and flourish. That approach must be institutionalized by ritual and by deed. If we cannot accomplish that task, even the Shoah might, God forbid, fade from memory after 150 years.

Reena in the News

Reena

In Loving Memory of Harry Edelstein ז"ל

Sadly at Reena, we are in mourning for a very precious member of our family, Harry (Hersh) Edelstein, who passed away on March 20th at the age of 78. Harry was part of the Reena family for 31 years.

To know Harry was to love him. He was such a character, pushing everybody's buttons, challenging us and keeping us smiling and on our toes all at the same time. He was smart. He could speak five languages and when he was in one of his storytelling moods, he kept us in awe indefinitely recounting his life.

Harry was not born with a developmental disability. Towards the end of WW2, while trying to defend his mother and sister from attack in Poland, a German soldier smashed him in the head with the butt of his rifle, causing permanent brain damage. After the war, what was left of his family came to Canada. Harry lived in his family home with the support of Reena staff until 1980 when he was able to move into a group home. He lived in a number of Reena homes where he was always treated with respect and admiration for his feisty personality.

Two years ago, when his health began to fail, he moved to a special long-term care program at Baycrest Geriatric Centre* where he continued to be cared for by Reena staff. Ensuring a continuity of support for Harry from group home to long-term care was important to all of us who knew him.

The following excerpt from a letter written by his supervisor when he moved into Long Term Care expresses the feelings of every Reena staff who cared for him over the years....

I have a million Harry stories, and of course many of them involve his colourful use of the Yiddish language. I shared some of these stories with Harry's niece Rena, in our conversations over the last few days. I believe it has comforted her to hear them, as she shared with me some of her own.

Many people have approached me sharing their own moments and stories about Harry, recounting them with a smile, and I realize that collectively we are lucky to have known him in all his glory.

Harry, may you rest in peace in the arms of Hashem as you so richly deserve.

Reena has a partnership with a number of Long Term Care homes including Baycrest Geriatric Centre, Cummer Lodge and Maple Health Centre where Reena staff continue to support individuals when they move from a Reena home into Long Term Care. The partnership enables persons with a developmental disability to stay connected with their friends and receive the support necessary for good quality of life.

The power of silence

Whatever happened to silence? Cacophony seems to be the hallmark of our age. Noise, dissonance – these are everywhere.

John Ruskin called mid-Victorian London "rattling, growling and roaring." He should be living now! Even a home is no sanctuary or refuge from sound. The TV, radio or stereo are ubiquitous.

James Truslow Adams, the American historian, suggested this: "Perhaps it would be a good idea, fantastic as it sounds, to muffle every telephone, halt every motor, stop all activity one day to give people a chance to ponder... on what life is all about, why they are living and what they should really want."

Long ago, Blaise Pascal said: "All the evils of life have fallen upon us because human beings will not sit alone quietly in a room."

In the Talmud, Rabbi Simeon ben Gamliel, said: "All my life, I was brought up by the sages, and I have found nothing better for a person than silence."

The Book of Ecclesiastes teaches that there is a time to speak and a time to be silent. Many Holocaust scholars are convinced that the only true and realistic approach to unimaginable horror is silence. As the philosopher Ludwig Wittgenstein put it: "What we cannot speak about we must pass over in silence." An American diplomat boasted that he could remain silent in five languages. And everyone, I am sure, is familiar with the old adage that it is better to remain silent and be thought a fool, than to speak and remove all doubts.

An ancient Greek myth relates that one day, the god of silence, Harpocrates, discovered Venus, the goddess of love, in one of her amorous adventures. Cupid, Venus's son, convinced Harpocrates to remain silent about the event and gave him the gift of a rose.

Since that time, the rose has been a symbol of silence. In fact, during the Renaissance, and later during the reigns of the pre-revolutionary kings of France, the rose was a favourite architectural motif and was often sculpted on ceilings, dining rooms and drawing rooms where diplomats gathered. The obvious implication was that matters discussed "under the rose" were to be held in strict confidence.

In his seminal work, In Speech and Silence, The Jewish Quest for God, Rabbi David J. Wolpe writes, "To convey love, sorrow or pride, a look is often more compelling..., more powerful than any word."

The power of silence is represented in the Bible by the painful story of Aaron's sons, Nadab and Abiahu, who offered alien fire before the Lord and were consumed. The passage ends with the words: "And Aaron was silent." The Bible gives us no sense of what Aaron is feeling and the deeper meaning of his silence. Evidently words, no matter how apt or eloquent, would limit, confine or circumscribe the experience.

Finally, Rabbi Wolpe brings us these cryptic words of the chassidic Rabbi Nachmon of Bratzlav: "Know that it is possible to let out a very great scream in a voice that no one will hear. No sound emerges. The scream takes place within the silence. Everyone is capable of such a scream."

Demonization of Israel as free speech?

As anyone who engages in advocacy will agree, inappropriate public comments, whether deliberate or accidental, can have lingering and often irreversible consequences. And when there is an evident absence of prompt – or any – damage control, or even an attempt at clarification, the natural assumption is that the remarks in question must have been intentional.

It is within this context that a statement to the Hamilton Spectator ("Y drops extra fee for controversial group," March 31) by the executive director of the Hamilton Jewish Federation (HJF) becomes all the more troubling.

What triggered the Spectator article was a heated dispute between Canadians for Justice and Peace in the Middle East (CJPME), a group that has been in the forefront of the boycott, divestment and sanctions campaign against Israel, and the Hamilton YWCA. Tempers flared when the YWCA began to reconsider its decision to allow CJPME to rent its auditorium for a presentation by photojournalist William Parry, who was to discuss his book Against the Wall: the Art of Resistance in Palestine. After much debate, the YWCA reverted to its initial position and allowed CJPME to use its facility.

According to a member of the Jewish community who attended, Parry's lecture was the usual concoction of crass generalizations and factual distortions that have come to typify the anti-Israel invective promoted by groups like CJPME.

Inevitably, that hallowed pillar of political correctness that flies under the capricious banner of free speech captured the media's attention in the days leading up to Parry's visit.

It was within this rancorous climate that the federation leadership felt obliged to express its support for the YWCA's position. In the process of doing so, the following statement, quoted verbatim, appeared in the Spectator: "Gerry Fisher of the Hamilton Jewish Federation said the federation believes free speech, as long as it not hateful, trumps objections to the CJPME's 'demonization' of Israel."

By any stretch of interpretation, such an assertion is astounding. Aside from the preposterous implication that demonization of Israel can be anything but hateful, it – even more seriously – diminishes the construct of "demonization" as a fundamental pillar of what is widely recognized as the "new" antisemitism. In doing so, it significantly undermines the efforts of pro-Israel advocates who use the tenets of the new antisemitism as a basis for argument – especially on university campuses where the tension between "free speech" and "demonization" is so pivotal to the ongoing discourse.

Soon after the Spectator story broke, the HJF president received a letter urging that he dissociate himself, and the federation he represents, from the press statement attributed to his executive director; and to "set the record straight." If he was not prepared to do so, he was challenged to a debate "in front of the Jewish community of Hamilton ... to support the position that demonization of Israel is defensible, even in the interests of free speech."

To the time that this column went to press, that letter has gone unanswered. Meanwhile, the HJF's stand has been applauded by both CJPME and Independent Jewish Voices which, to some, must come as a source of great pride and affirmation, if it were not so surreal.

Chupahs: origins and symbolism

It's perhaps the most touching moment of a Jewish wedding. The chatan and the wedding party are joined under the chupah by the kallah. The chupah, or wedding canopy, is a beautiful and ancient tradition. Today, a look at its origins and symbolism.

We find two biblical references to chupahs: Psalm 19:6 compares the rising sun to a groom's radiance as he exits his chupah [http://bit.ly/chupah1]; and Joel 2:16 exhorts a bride to leave her chupah, and the groom his wedding "chamber" to ask Divine forgiveness and avert national disaster. [http://bit.ly/chupah2]

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

In Chupah: From Eden to Today, Eliezer Segal explains that today's weddings under the chupah harken back to the "paradigm of all weddings: the Revelation of Torah at Mount Sinai. In the biblical account of the marriage between God and the people of Israel, our sages also discovered allusions to the presence of a chupah, whether in the enveloping cloud of darkness that hovered over the people, or in the fact that the Israelites, about to enter into marriage with God, were made to stand 'beneath the mountain' – just as the bride stands beneath the sheltering chupah on her wedding day." [http://bit.ly/chupah3]

I found some discussion and interpretation of the significance of the bride's circling the groom under the chupah. Valerie Thaler writes that the "bride's circle symbolizes her protection of the groom and her shift in commitments: her top priority is now her husband (while before it was her parents). Until recently, liberal Jews usually chose to omit this ritual from their ceremony since it suggested the bride's subservience to her groom." Thayer says the circling has made a "reappearance" in some liberal Jewish weddings. "Some brides now view their circles as an active moment in which she defines familial space." [http://bit.ly/chupah4]

Karen Miller Jackson agrees that traditional sources look at the chupah as the groom's domain into which the bride enters. But she then draws from the midrash and from Song of Songs, which describe the chupah as a space shared by the bride and groom. "Far from representing the woman's transfer from one domain to another, the chupah in these sources signifies a home built on joint consent and mutual involvement." [http://bit.ly/chupah5]

As for what actually takes place under the chupah, the Jewish Virtual Library provides a good summary of the wedding process from bashert to engagement to the ceremony. [http://bit.ly/chupah6] I was particularly interested in the chupah-related questions people have asked rabbis, including:

- Can you use someone else's ring at the ceremony?
- Can you say a prayer for a dead parent at a wedding?
- Why are chupahs traditionally held outdoors? Rabbi Leibie Sternberg answers that since Abraham was blessed that his descendants would be as numerous as the stars, we wish to apply that blessing to every couple. [http://bit.ly/chupah7]

And there was one query I hadn't expected: Does the groom have to wear a white tie under the chupah?

Responds Rabbi Mark Schaffel: "There is no halachic or even traditional issue I know of... my wife says it's classy!"

Fundraiser aims to end exodus from Jerusalem

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Nir Barkat

A dinner in Toronto on May 2 will oficially launch a $4-million fund-raising drive to stem the exodus of young Israelis from Jerusalem.

"We want to turn this thing around," said Ian Leventhal, executive director of the Jerusalem Foundation in Toronto.

By all accounts, thousands of Israelis, mostly secular Jews, leave Israel's capital every year in an attempt to improve their lives.

"Jerusalem right now has a problem," said Leventhal, citing limited job opportunities, a lack of affordable housing, a lagging education system and the reluctance of secular Jews to live among a growing population of haredim.

The mayor of Jerusalem, Nir Barkat, has warned that the "strongest" sector of its population will leave unless "current trends" end.

Data from the mayor's office made available to The CJN suggests that the problem is extremely grave.

From 2001 to 2007, 113,000 residents of Jerusalem left the city. Forty seven per cent of them were Jewish young adults between the ages of 24-35.

Further, the majority of students studying in Jerusalem leave after earning their academic degrees.

Barkat believes that without this young adult segment of its population, Jerusalem cannot renew itself, generate change or bring life to its urban spaces.

He wants to strengthen Jerusalem by upgrading it in terms of housing, employment, community and culture.

The keynote speaker at next month's dinner, to be held at The Carlu, will be George Will, the conservative American syndicated newspaper columnist.

The dinner is sponsored by the Jerusalem Foundation, which seeks to safeguard Jerusalem's future as Israel's capital.

Diaspora Jewish soldiers focus of conference

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

The Jewish experience with military service in the Diaspora has been mixed, a conference on Jewish studies was told.

In some countries, such as France and Italy, a career in the military was a function of upward mobility, signifying social acceptance and civil emancipation, University of Toronto historian Derek Penslar suggested at an April 12 graduate student conference sponsored by the Centre for Jewish Studies.

Derek Penslar

But in czarist Russia, soldiering had negative connotations, being associated with forced conscription and conversion to Christianity, he added.

Penslar, who's writing a book on Jews in the military, said there have been four types of Jewish soldiers in the Diaspora over the centuries.

The "citizen soldier" carried out his military obligations willingly, he said, citing Jews who joined the Ottoman, French and German armies.

But the case of the French Jewish officer Alfred Dreyfus, who was falsely convicted of treason in 1895, proved that the the army could be a symbol of thwarted emancipation, he said.

The Jew who joined the "uniformed civil service" and rose in the ranks as an officer did so to achieve social and economic advancement.

Svetlana Frunchak

In many cases, these Jews came from humble backgrounds and married into wealthy families.

"Revolutionary" soldiers joined national guards and militias and, as in Poland, fought for the independence of their respective countries.

"Rebels" and "extremists" were ghetto fighters and partisans in World War II. This group, he said, suffered the highest rates of mental and physical trauma. "They were fighters, not soldiers," Penslar observed.

Commenting on the formation of the Israeli army, Penslar said native-born Palestinian Jews were its chief commanders during the 1948 Arab-Israeli war.

In terms of its doctrine of warfare, the Israel Defence Forces was a hybrid, borrowing from tbe British, U.S. and German armies.

Jewish volunteers from the Diaspora played an important role in Israel's victory in the 1948 war, he said.

They flew or serviced most of the planes in the Israeli Air Force and manned many ships in the navy.

Commanders such as the Canadian Ben Dunkelman and the American Mickey Marcus were instrumental in some of Israel's key battlefield victories.

"They were motivated by a sense of Jewish solidarity," he explained.

In passing, Penslar mentioned the role Jews played in the International Brigades during the Spanish Civil War and in World War II.

The day-long conference also heard from two U of T PhD candidates.

Svetlana Frunchak spoke about Jews in Czernowitz in Ukraine, while Daniel Rosenthal's topic was Jewish women, suicide and Jewish public discourse in interwar Poland.

Ignatieff, Layton talk with The CJN

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

After the election call, The CJN tried repeatedly to secure interviews with all of the major party leaders.

Just prior to Passover, Liberal leader Michael Ignatieff and New Democrat leader Jack Layton spoke with the paper in separate interviews from their respective campaign trails on a range of topics of interest to the Canadian Jewish community.

Each leader was asked to answer the same questions, except where indicated.

Our deadline for leaders' responses was Monday, April 18.

CJN: Would a Liberal or NDP government reinstate the long-form census?

Ignatieff: "Yes. There's no question about it. I thought [the Conservatives' decision to cancel the long-form census] was an act of vandalism. Canadians need a long-form census, and our process of collecting census data has been rights-respecting from the beginning. [The Conservative government] picked an ideological quarrel for no good reason."

Layton: "Yes. It should never have been abolished. The idea that having information is somehow an obstacle to privacy is just so wrong."

CJN: What would a Liberal or NDP government's stance be with regard to a potential unilateral declaration of independence by the Palestinian Authority?

Ignatieff: "That idea awakens concern, because unilateral declarations that are not acceptable to Israel are simply not going to work. It's a practical issue. My party and our country have supported a two-state solution... since the painful partition debates of 1947-1948. A two-state solution implies two peoples making peace... agreeing on borders together, agreeing to all the outstanding issues in relation to Jerusalem, to settlements, refugees, potential land swaps. For one party to come to the UN and seek unilateral recognition as a state would, I think, be a problem. I urge Israel, the Palestinians and the international community to start talking now and make some progress. If we're in government, we'll do everything we can to ensure that Israel and the Palestinians sit down together and do this together.

Layton: "We've always believed that the peace should be negotiated with the partners for justice for Israel and Palestine within a framework of respect for UN resolutions and international law. That would include the right of both Israelis and Palestinians to live in peace and viable independent states with agreed upon borders. So our hopes naturally would extend to a negotiated approach. New Democrats believe in a balanced approach. We're ready to work with [U.S. President Barack] Obama's administration toward that end."

CJN (specific to Ignatieff): In an April 2002 article you wrote for The Guardian, you compared the West Bank to an apartheid-era bantustan. You wrote: "When I looked down at the West Bank, at the settlements like Crusader forts occupying the high ground, at the Israeli security cordon along the Jordan river closing off the Palestinian lands from Jordan, I knew I was not looking down at a state or the beginnings of one, but at a bantustan, one of those pseudo-states created in the dying years of apartheid to keep the African population under control." Do you still believe this comparison is apt?

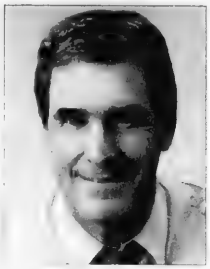
Ignatieff: "There's no comparison whatsoever between Israel and Apartheid South Africa. There was no comparison intended or implied then or now. I've been very explicit ever since I entered public life in my denunciation of Israeli Apartheid Week. I think it's possible to criticize Israel, but to compare Israel to a regime that was in itself a crime against humanity, based on institutionalized and constitutionalized discrimination, is grotesque. Israel is a democratic state in which Palestinians have constitutional rights. There's simply no comparison between the two.

"If I used the word 'bantustan,' it was in a very different context to say that one of the challenges for peace in the Middle East is to make sure that the Palestinian entity that comes into existence, after a comprehensive peace agreement with Israel is viable. By 'bantustan,' I simply meant to refer to those states as not viable, divided, chopped up. It's important for Israeli security that a Palestinian state be viable. That's the point I was trying to make then and now."



Michael Ignatieff

Jack Layton

CJN (specific to Layton): Last year, NDP sources indicated that you were planning your first trip to Israel. If elected, will you make that trip as part of your prime ministerial duties?

Layton: "Yes. That would be part of visiting the region, the Palestinian territories as well. Last year, the exigencies of Parliament, and of course my own health challenges I faced, put a damper on some of the travel plans I might otherwise have had."

CJN: Would a Liberal or NDP government follow up on Liberal MP and human rights advocate Irwin Cotler's suggestion to bring Iran up on charges of incitement to genocide in the International Criminal Court?

Ignatieff: "I've been to Iran and seen the Ahmadinejad regime up close. We do think Iran is a strategic threat to the entire [Middle East] and to the world. It's incendiary antisemitic rhetoric and Holocaust denial tied to nuclear capability gives Israel a justified concern for its own future. Canada can always count on a Liberal government to be militantly opposed to the weaponization of Iran's nuclear capabilities... and we would follow Cotler's lead. If he thinks he can make a case to the International Criminal Tribunal... I strongly support Cotler."

Layton: "I have not studied the case dossier on that subject. However, we're certainly willing to work with the Obama administration, as I mentioned earlier... and we're very pleased President Obama is taking such strong action around nuclear disarmament, because we have deep concerns about Iran's ability to build nuclear weapons. We've always had a longstanding commitment to nuclear disarmament."

CJN: Would a Liberal or NDP government continue to provide security funding for communities at risk for hate crimes, as the Conservative government has done through its $3-million Security Infrastructure Program?

Ignatieff: "We'd continue this program as long as it was needed. A federal government that believes in religious freedom will provide security for every religious community that needs it, not just the Jewish community. Whatever it takes. But I would make the additional point that every Jewish community leader I've talked to doesn't want to be under lockdown. Jewish community leaders want to be open and accessible to the public. They treasure their place in the community and their religious freedom. The simple answer is we've got to be there for as long as any religious community needs it."

Layton: "We certainly have supported the [Security Infrastructure Program] and wouldn't see any end to that. If [the program] is not adequate for doing the job, then it's the kind of thing we'd need to sit down with affected communities to discuss."

Teens need to stay informed about politics

Marni Shankman
Co-op Student

Guest Voice

With May 2 fast approaching, it seems the upcoming federal election is the number 1 topic on most people's minds and tongues.

However, this is not true for those not making their way to the polls. For those of us under 18, it seems that nobody is taking our views into account or asking for our opinions. As a grade 11 student at Thornlea Secondary School, I can advise that, within my school, there's no talk of the election. I'd be surprised if the students at my school are even aware that there is an election in a few days!

But just because we can't vote doesn't mean we shouldn't stay informed. Teenagers need to be involved. After all, in just a few short years, we'll be allowed to cast a ballot, but we'll be unable to do so if we don't know all the facts and details.

Maybe we don't pay attention to politics because it seems boring. Quite honestly, it is. I find politics utterly boring, consisting of too many promises and ideas, and not enough action. The leaders in the English-language debate did little to convince voters of why they should vote for their party. Instead, they focused on why you shouldn't vote for the other parties. But people tuned in to listen to ideas about the future, not to watch all of the leaders point fingers at one another.

So yes, politics is boring. There are many topics that seem more exciting and interesting. However, politics is important. It's what keeps Canada growing and moving forward.

We teenagers need to be in the know. Otherwise, we will grow into a generation of adults who are ignorant and have a small and limited view of the world. Reading the news can give different opinions and perspectives so that a teenager can learn to think more broadly and from different sides, as well as helping them create informed opinions.

Maybe some teens don't have time to sit down and read a newspaper. That's understandable. After all, we have to juggle school, extracurricular activities and after-school jobs.

But for many, it's not that they don't have time to follow the news, it's that they don't want to. And for most teenagers, the news is just a click away.

Tory challenges Hall Findlay in Willowdale

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Prime Minister Stephen Harper faced tough questions on ethics, scandals and respect for Parliament during televised election debates, but he managed to dial his answers back to his favourite subject, the economy.

It seems like the Conservative leader's game plan is being played out in Willowdale as well. Conservative challenger Chungsen Leung, who is attempting to unseat Martha Hall Findlay in a riding that has been Liberal for most of its history since 1979, said the Tories' stewardship of the economy through tough times is what is most appealing to voters. The Conservatives' program of keeping taxes low and ensuring a stable government is key to creating wealth that ensures employment and generates the funds to pay for the country's social programs, he said.

Whether the Tories' promise of a steady hand on the economy's controls will convince voters to abandon the Liberals remains to be seen. The irregularly shaped riding is flanked by Steeles Avenue to the north and Highway 401 to the south and extends as far as Victoria Park Avenue in the east and Bathurst Street to the west.

Leung is challenging the incumbent, Hall Findlay, a lawyer and businesswoman, who won the riding in a byelection after longtime MP Jim Peterson resigned. She defeated Conservative challenger Jake Karns in the 2008 election by almost 8,000 votes.

New Democrat Mehdi Mollahasani is also contesting the riding, but did not make himself available for an interview. At the time The CJN went to press, the Green party had not named a candidate, according to the party's website.

Martha Hall Findlay, Chungsen Leung

Though Leung is touting the economy as the riding's major concern, Hall Findlay tells a rather different story. Tory attack ads targeting Liberal leader Michael Ignatieff are not working, she said. Instead, people are intrigued by the Liberals' positions on easier recognition of foreign credentials, settlement services, which were cut by the Conservative government, and calls for the feds to be involved in public transit.

What's more, she continued, "for the people of Willowdale, national issues are our issues. For the first time, a government was found in contempt of Parliament." She accused the Tories of practising "taxpayer fraud" in the way they channelled funds to favoured ridings, and she said the "auditor's report is absolutely scathing in terms of ethics and integrity.

"People are furious at the door, at Stephen Harper because [the scandals] are seen as reflecting on Harper," she said. "He ran on transparency, ethics, and they're furious at the level of control and lack of respect for democracy and Parliament."

Leung said that the "Conservative government has provided Parliament with an impressive commitment to openness, transparency and accountability.

He said that as an immigrant from Taiwan, whose own credentials were not accepted when he immigrated to Canada in 1982, he is sensitive to the needs of immigrants. He said the last pre-election budget included $6 million to help immigrants acquire the accreditation to become productive members of the community.

However, "the key issues I've heard is the economy and job creation," he said.

Leung said that in his previous career as a public accountant (he's now an engineer), "I audited big corporations. I think we are heading in the right direction by lowering taxes. It will attract foreign investors to invest here.

"People come to Canada because of opportunity. The future is here. We need to keep our corporations strong and profitable in Canada. This will make our entrepreneurs stronger and make Canada the export nation it needs to be."

On the Middle East, Leung said the government's support for Israel is based on principle and standing up to terror. Asked if Canada should adopt a more even-handed approach, he said "Canada will not be ambivalent in the face of terrorism, between right and wrong."

Hall Findlay said the Liberals "believe in a two-state solution." She said Ignatieff "is a strong supporter of Israel," and the Liberal party backs steps that will lead to a peaceful resolution of the conflict.

Canada can play a constructive role in assisting the Palestinian Authority in the areas of governance and policing, she said, adding that tackling poverty and improving Palestinians' economic prospects would undermine radicals. As for domestic economic issues, Hall Findlay said she supported an end to corporate tax reductions. "I support corporate tax cuts, but not when you run a major deficit. It makes no sense to borrow money to give breaks to the top five per cent of wealthy corporations," she said.

הקונצרטים של האקדמיה המלכותית מתקיימים באולם המדהים שלהם ברחוב בלור 293, ומחיר הכרטיסים הוא כמחיר כרטיס קולנוע. שלא תגידו שלא ידעתם. אבל שישאר בינינו.

"איך לא הייתי הקורבן ה 59"

ב"ידיעות אחרונות" מספר העיתונאי הבכיר איתן הבר איך ניצלו חייו בטורונטו. לפני מספר שנים הוא התחיל לאבד שווי משקל וליפול במקומות שונים, וכמעט נדרס ברחוב ניו יורקי הומה. בדיקות מקיפות לא העלו דבר, אבל רופא בכיר הביע את דעתו שמדובר כנראה במחלה קשה וחשוכת מרפא. עשה הבר את מה שעושים רבים אחרים במצב כזה- עידכן את צוואתו והתכונן להיפרד מן העולם. ואז בביקור בטורונטו, בשיחת אגב בארוחת בוקר, אמר לו רופא מקומי שהוא סובל מתופעת לוואי נדירה אך ידועה של התרופה שהוא נוטל להורדת כולסטרול. וכך הוחזרו לו חייו, ועם הפסקת התרופה- נעלמו תופעות הלוואי המסוכנות שמהן סבל.

כשרושמים לכם תרופה- קחו עשר דקות ותקראו את דפי המידע שמצורפים לקופסא- אל תצפו מהרופא לספר לכם את כל זה. זה הגוף שלכם והבריאות שלכם, ואין לכם בעייה בהבנת הנקרא. אבל שישאר בינינו.

'It is important to know what is going on so you can be aware'

With today's technology, it's easy to stay in the loop. There are dozens of iPod and phone applications that send news wirelessly to your devices, instantly letting you read up on the latest stories.

Brad Pearson of Thornlea Secondary School says that he signed up for an application that sends local news straight to his BlackBerry.

"It's really easy to stay informed," says Pearson. "All I have to do is look at my screen. It was free to download, and it makes it so easy to keep up to date on what's going on in Canada."

Pearson also agrees with the need for teens to stay informed about world issues, especially when it comes to politics.

"If we don't stay informed, when it comes time for us to step up and vote, we will be in complete confusion. We wont be able to think for ourselves because we have no information or knowledge."

Other Thornlea students agree. Eleventh grader Liora Domb always makes sure to keep up-to-date on the latest news regarding the election.

Although many think that parents influence teenagers, Domb feels the opposite. Domb says her parents would not influence the way she would vote, saying that she gets her information from reading the newspaper and watching the news, and from that, forms her own opinions.

"It is important to know what is going on so you can be aware."

And for all those who don't keep up to date or aware of what is happening in Canada, Domb thinks that it is time to become informed.

"Most people who are 16 should have an opinion."

The 'wow' factor

How often have you left a meeting, a presentation, a job interview or an audition and wished that you had brought the "wow factor" to it?

What is the wow factor and why do some people have it naturally and others have to work at it? Is it something that can be taught or learned? How do you develop that edge that sets you apart? All of these answers are in the wonderful new book, The Wow Factor: The 33 Things You Must (and Must Not) Do to Guarantee Your Edge in Today's Business World, by Frances Coles Jones.

Life Coach Corner

Judy Siblin-Librach

I spoke to Cole Jones and interviewed her about how she coaches people to develop that wow factor in their work and in their lives. When I asked what motivated her to write these books, she answered: "We grew up as a Sound of Music family, and we were taught to present ourselves properly." She says it was very easy for her, and she wanted to share that knowledge with other people.

Cole Jones has a theory that comes from a study done at UCLA – the "7%-38%-55% rule." The rule states that there are three elements to any face-to-face communication: words, tone of voice and body language." For example, we've all been introduced to the person who says, "Nice to meet you," with a fishy hand, a nominal smile and an "over our shoulder to see if someone more interesting, important or attractive is coming in the room" gaze.

Contrast that with someone who's genuinely delighted to meet you. You will be automatically wowed by the genuine person who really cares about what you have to say.

So part of it is just being aware of your tone and your physicality. As Cole Jones puts it, "If you say I'm sorry, I missed your call, sound sorry."

Cole Jones has prepared a number of clients to be guests on the Oprah Winfrey Show. As well, she suggests when preparing for an important meeting, you should be ready and prepared with the "egg formula."

"In the Duncan Hines cake mix marketing theory, the decision was made in the marketing department to have the 'at-home cook' add an egg to the mix, rather than putting powdered egg in the mix themselves. Why? Because when we add the egg, we take ownership of the cake. We are proud. We feel okay saying, 'I baked.'"

So before your meeting, ask yourself: why is this person's unique contribution valuable to me and the project?"

Cole Jones gives a great example of an actor friend who was going to meet with a big movie producer, and by knowing his work, which featured strong female leads, she was able to go into the meeting well prepared to mention this and then talk about how she could contribute. As Cole Jones says, "This was his egg! His gift was being unafraid to bring strong women to the screen."

So the next time you are getting ready to make a request of another – whether it's financial or emotional, business or personal – take the time to ask, and answer the question: "What's their egg?"

And of course as a coach, my question to you is, what is your egg? What is your unique gift, talent or capability that differentiates you and makes you stand out? That is one of your first clues to finding your own wow factor.

Fatah may partake in Gaza flotilla: Palestinian official

Jack Khoury
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Gaza Strip is not experiencing a humanitarian crisis, the Israel Defence Forces quoted a Red Cross official as saying last week.

In an interview conducted by Rotem Caro-Weizman and published on the IDF's Spokesman's Office website, Mathilde Redmatn, deputy director of the Red Cross in the Gaza Strip, said that there "is no humanitarian crisis in Gaza," adding: "If you go to the supermarket, there are products. There are restaurants and a nice beach."

Rather, according to Redmatn, the issue in Gaza was "mainly in maintenance of infrastructure and in access to goods, concrete for example."

Referring to Israel's blockade on the strip, Redmatn said that while "Israel has the legitimate right to protect the civilian population, this right should be balanced with the right of 1.5 million people living in the Gaza Strip."

"Despite the easing of the closure and the partial lifting of export bans in the wake of the flotilla incident, continued restrictions on the movement of people and difficulties in importing building materials hampered sustainable economic recovery and dashed any hope of leading a normal and dignified life," the Red Cross official was quoted as saying.

"Our goal is not to negotiate peace, but to ensure the well-being of the civilian population," Redmatn told the IDF website.

"We understand and recognize Israel's right to security but it needs to maintain the balance between that and the right of Palestinians living in Gaza to [earn] a living and to [access] proper medical care. Of course, this is also the responsibility of Hamas to its citizens and therefore we also have relations with them."

Redmatn also reiterated her condemnation of rockets fired from Gaza into Israel, saying that "rocket-fire from the Gaza Strip is against international law because it is directed at civilians," adding that the Red Cross conducts a "confidential or bilateral dialogue with Hamas on the matter. As time passes, the dialogue also develops."

In related developments, senior Fatah officials will be allowed to take part in a planned aid flotilla to the Gaza Strip, a senior Fatah official said last week, departing from the party's previous policy of only supporting Gaza initiatives from afar.

Nabil Sha'ath

The Free Gaza Movement, a pro-Palestinian activist umbrella group, has said it was planning to launch a 15-ship aid flotilla in late May bearing international passengers including Europeans and Americans.

Speaking with Nazareth's A Shams, Fatah official Nabil Sha'ath, in charge of the party's foreign affairs portfolio, said Fatah would permit senior officials to partake in the planned flotilla, since it was considered a humanitarian effort geared at lifting the Gaza blockade.

Referring to the possibility that Fatah officials may require authorization from both Israeli security forces and Hamas, which governs the Strip, Sha'ath said: "We don't need approval to arrive at our homeland, and certainly not from a movement like Hamas and Israel's security establishment."

Sha'ath's comments came after donor states to the Palestinian Authority, which held a conference last week in Brussels, condemned uncoordinated aid flotillas to Gazain its concluding statement.

Schalit's grandfather criticizes PM

In an open letter to Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu last week, Zvi Schalit, missing soldier Gilad Schalit's grandfather, severely criticized what he considered the premier's inaction regarding his grandson's captivity. He accused Netanyahu of essentially signing the abducted Israeli soldier's death sentence. "A year ago a deal to secure Gilad's release was all but signed, but you thwarted it in a last-minute decision," the elder Schalit wrote. "Your refusal then and today to comply with the request of former defense officials to free Gilad at the said price is tantamount to Gilad's death sentence." Schalit also criticized what he considered Netanyahu's media posturing geared at making it look as if Israel was working to secure Gilad's release, when in fact it was doing nothing. The Prime Minister's Office released a statement in response to Schalit's letter, saying that "actions to release Gilad Schalit are continuous, and are supervised directly by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu."

Turkey slams Israel

Israeli media reported that Turkish President Abdullah Gul said in a New York Times editorial last week that the fate of the Arab world uprisings will be determined by whether there is peace between Israel and the Palestinians. "Whether these uprisings lead to democracy and peace or to tyranny and conflict will depend on forging a lasting Israeli-Palestinian peace agreement and a broader Israeli-Arab peace," Gul said in the article. The Turkish president said that Israel, more than any country, needs to adapt to the new political climate of the region. "But it need not fear," he said, "the emergence of a democratic neighbourhood around Israel is the ultimate assurance of the country's security."

Mass protests in Syria

Israeli media reported that Syrians took to the streets in large numbers again last week in the central city of Homs, where activists say more than 20 pro-democracy protesters were shot dead early last week by soldiers and irregular forces. Protesters' chants demanded "the downfall of the regime," defying a heavy deployment of security forces and an order by officials to stop all forms of demonstration. The protest went ahead despite a concession by the government, which approved legislation ending the state of emergency in force in Syria for the last 48 years.

Israelis win medical science award

"DNA methylation is like the annotation on the instruction booklet that is our chromosomes. Each cell contains the same 'complete booklet' of genetic code, but through the release of chemicals, methylation tells each cell how to 'read' its own specific instructions," said Cedar, who has been a professor on Hebrew U's medical faculty since 1981.

"For example, some things should be read with emphasis, some not. Some things should only be read at one time or another. The human genome is chemically annotated, and we discovered this annotation and figured out what it is and does."

This theory has resulted in new approaches to cancer treatment, since they discovered that healthy cells can "switch" into cancerous ones.

The idea is that if the methylation that causes cancer can be stopped, or prevented, so, too, can cancer.

"Cancer cells, like all cells, have the exact same instruction booklet as normal cells, but they have adopted different properties than normal cells because the annotation, or methylation, has changed," Cedar said.

Currently, there are drugs that can inhibit or slow down the methylation of cancer cells with some success, but more research is needed to develop drugs that will target cancer cells more effectively, he added.

Cedar and Razin's research may be instrumental in that process.

"If we really understand how methylation works, we can develop methods for modulating or altering it. This can be an unbelievable tool for the development of medicine," Cedar said.

John Dirks, the Gairdner Foundation's president and scientific director, said the pair's work is groundbreaking.

"The award is directed at scientists who have made a seminal discovery in medical science," Dirks said after visiting with Cedar and Razin at Hebrew U.

"[Cedar and Razin] started 30 years ago, and it has taken a long time for the medical community to understand the significance of their research, but science often takes awhile to mature, like good wine... I would say this is a very important step forward and we're going to hear a lot more about it."

The chair of the foundation's board, Lorne Tyrrell, who joined Dirks in Israel for the tour, said he was impressed with Cedar and Razin's "amazing" research.

"They have discovered a simple answer for how some genes are expressed in some tissues and not in others, and have provided insight into our basic understanding of how cells grow and develop and become cancerous," Tyrrell said.

"They have given us a new approach for dealing with [cancer]. This will have a long-term impact on disease and health and a transforming effect on medicine."

Relative to the importance of the research, Tyrrell said their labs and offices "are quite modest... but the people are special.

"I enjoyed it so much sitting with them in their lab while they discussed with such passion their science and the history of their work," Tyrrell said.

He also appreciated the fact that graduate students can receive academic credits by working with the scientists on their research, and he admired "Israel's culture of... science."

"Science has a big influence on [Israel's] culture. People appreciate science. I think that's very enlightened," Tyrrell said.

Cedar said that this culture of science is one of the top reasons he immigrated to Israel from New York in 1973.

"There is an advantage to doing science in Israel. Science and research is a culture, an infrastructure. Society has to want to support it.

"It has to be ingrained in the culture of the people, and in Israel, it's the culture of the Jewish people that prizes academic challenge, studying, learning, the desire to find out about things and do something to help mankind, and there is a willingness on the part of society to invest in this."

Cedar and Razin are not the first Israeli recipients of Gairdner awards. Michael Sela, former president of the Weizmann Institute of Science, received an award in 1980, and 2004 Nobel Prize winner Avraham Hershko, of the Technion – Israel Institute of Technology, won a Gairdner Award in 1999.

Cedar said he was thrilled to be counted among the recipients.

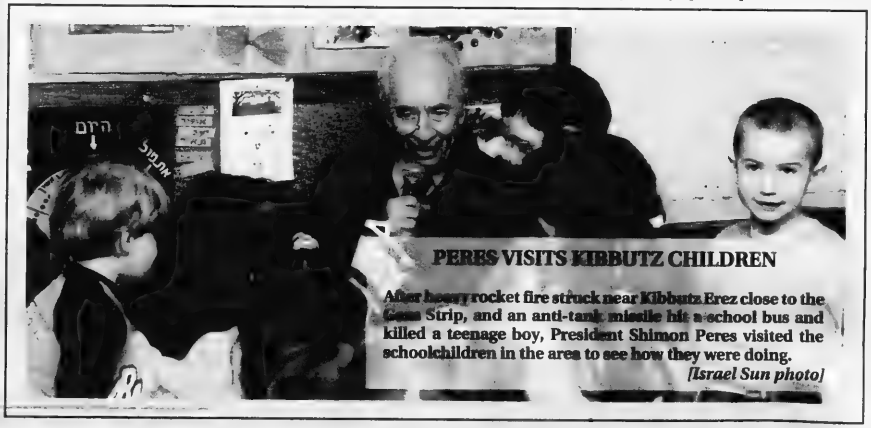
"It feels great to receive this award," he said. "You don't do the work to get a reward, but it's encouraging. It's nice to know that other people recognize that what you've done is important and worthwhile. Having these awards stimulates science, brings about a general interest in science, helps educate the public, and encourages scientists."

Dirks said some of the highlights of his trip to Israel included meeting with Hebrew U president Menachem Ben-Sasson and Israel Academy of Sciences president Ruth Arnon, as well as touring the Weizmann Institute campus, and attending an evening reception for the award-winners hosted by Canada's ambassador to Israel, Paul Hunt, at his official residence.

"It has been really special," Dirks said. "Everything has been great – the hospitality, the meetings, the beauty of the country, the weather."

Tyrrell said the meeting between Canadians and Israelis was particularly special.

"The atmosphere was very nice," he said. "To see the Canadian and Israeli cultures come together was just amazing. Israel is really a very special place."



PERES VISITS KIBBUTZ CHILDREN

After heavy rocket fire struck near Kibbutz Erez close to the Gaza Strip, and an anti-tank missile hit a school bus and killed a teenage boy, President Shimon Peres visited the schoolchildren in the area to see how they were doing.

Warsaw can do better

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

As Poland stands poised to assume the EU presidency on July 1, no one in the family of nations is happier than Israel. Over the past two decades, Poland has distinguished itself as one of Israel's staunchest supporters in Europe. When problems in Brussels arise, Jerusalem knows it can count on Warsaw.

Laurence Weinbaum

Poles have also come to recognize that Israelis are among their sincerest well-wishers. In recent years, many Israelis and Diaspora Jews have rediscovered and renewed ancestral ties to the land that they, their parents or grandparents once called home. Israeli-Polish relations, cultural and commercial, scientific and social – whether formal or informal, official or unofficial – are flourishing.

No post-communist country in Europe has come close to matching Poland's courage or candor in confronting the darkest chapters in its own wartime history, including transgressions of commission and omission. This has engendered Israel's respect and strengthened the connections between the two nations.

For this reason, the Polish government's recent announcement that it will end attempts to enact legislation on the restitution issue is very disturbing and perplexing.

Ever since the fall of communism, successive Polish governments have pledged to resolve the complex issues arising out of the plunder of private property and postwar expropriations and nationalizations.

Since turning back the clock is impossible, any "solution" is inherently imperfect. To be sure, this is not a strictly Jewish issue, as non-Jews were also dispossessed. However, the case of Polish Jewry was one of total despoliation.

An entire people was stripped of everything it had accumulated through centuries of toil. To make modern consideration of the matter even more complicated, most Jews who lost property were murdered, and their heirs no longer live in Poland. Survivors who sought to reclaim their properties immediately after the war were often met with hostility and even murderous violence. This only hastened their departure and added to their bitterness.

Poland blames Germany for the immeasurable destruction, human and material, of World War II – and rightly so.

But the fact is that all immovable property belonging to Jews killed in the Holocaust remained in Poland. The survivors did not take their apartments, houses, stores, lots, factories or forests with them, and the Polish government, local authorities and individuals to whom they devolved were enriched by those assets.

Radoslaw Sikorski

In a recent interview with Ha'aretz, during an official visit to Israel, Poland's Oxford-educated foreign minister, Radoslaw Sikorski, hastened to explain: "The Holocaust that took place on our soil was conducted against our will by someone else."

In view of what is now known, this is somewhat misleading.

The latest scholarship to emerge in Poland makes clear that the participation of locals in the dispatch of Jews was hardly an exceptional phenomenon.

On occasion, intoxicated by the lure of instant enrichment, Poles did not recoil from taking part in the killings, whether orchestrated by the Germans or at their own initiative. And for many years, not a few Poles slept in Jewish beds, ate off Jewish china, played Chopin on Jewish pianos and rocked their babies in Jewish cribs. Presumably, some still do.

The Bible tells us that God sent Elijah to confront Ahab after the innocent Navot was stoned to death so that his land could be seized.

"Hast thou murdered and also inherited?" Elijah asked. Had that question been put to the people of Poland after World War II, the answer for quite a few would have to have been, "Yes."

And some among Polish officialdom would have us believe that there is nothing wrong with perpetuating that state of affairs.

Quite paradoxically, even as Polish scholars unflinchingly document the magnitude of local complicity in the destruction of Polish Jewry, Poland's government is adopting the approach taken by its communist predecessors – denying all responsibility.

Instead, to deflect criticism, Sikorski lashed out at Washington for its very real failure to take any meaningful action during the war to save Polish Jews. That too is a page taken from a tired, communist-era playbook and has no relevance to the present discourse.

The Polish government has justified its stance by claiming that its treasury could not sustain the burden of any payout. That, of course, is a disingenuous argument.

Modern-day Poland has one of the strongest and most dynamic economies in all of Europe. If anything, Poland should take a cue from Macedonia. That small Balkan country, whose economic and geopolitical situation is far more precarious than that of Poland, set a noble example in 2002 in enacting and implementing comprehensive restitution legislation that addressed the issue of property lost in the Holocaust.

Historic wrongs are rarely righted and the challenge of real justice is impossible where the Shoah is concerned.

But in refusing to face the issue and rejecting the idea of even a symbolic resolution, it is as if Poland's government has turned its back on all that is great and glorious in Polish tradition.

No one better symbolizes that tradition than Wladyslaw Bartoszewski, whose personal heroism in Poland during the Shoah should inspire to action. As the grand old man of Polish diplomacy observed in his memoirs about that period: warto byc przyzwoitym – it pays to be decent .

Report links Iran, China

Yossi Melman

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Near the city of Qom, Iran has a secret plant that is part of its chemical weapons program, according to a secret U.S. cable sent by Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, which is part of the WikiLeaks documents obtained by Ha'aretz. Clinton instructed the U.S. Embassy in Beijing to take action against a Chinese company that is involved in the transfer of equipment, know-how and technology to Iran.

The document, dated July 24, 2009, reveals American concerns about the company, Zibo Chemet, which has supplied vital equipment for Iran's chemical-weapons program. Such sales are forbidden, according to the regulations of the Australia Group, which supervises the sale of sensitive chemical technology, equipment and materials. China is member of that group. According to the cable, "We have new information indicating that Zibo Chemet transferred technology for the production of glass-lined reactor equipment to Iranian customers, significantly enhancing Iran's ability to produce indigenously chemical equipment suitable for a chemical warfare program."

The cable asks the U.S. Embassy in Beijing to pass on information about the company to the Chinese government and demand that it take aggressive action to get the firm to cease its shipments. The cable also provides background on the company, revealing its dubious track record.

It says the company in April 2007 was blacklisted by the United States amid suspicions that it supplied similar equipment to Iran, North Korea and Syria. The earlier suspicions forced the Chinese government to open an investigation into the company and take "limited punitive action," which is not detailed in the cable.

But, despite the company's dubious past and the steps taken, it did not refrain from holding secret contacts with Iran. According to the cable, the company "recently transferred Australia Group-controlled technology to manufacture glass-lined chemical reactor vessels to the Iranian entity Shimi Azarjaam. This glass-lining plant is located in Shokoohieh Industrial Park, Qom."

The equipment supplied by Zibo Chemet includes technology and expertise that would allow the Iranian company to produce glass-lined reactor vessels resistant to the chemicals they contain. The raw chemicals from which weapons such as nerve gas are produced are placed into these containers, which must be glass-coated so the chemicals don't eat away at the containers and evaporate into the air.

Clinton's cable shows that as the international community anxiously follows the progress of Iran's nuclear program, Iran continues to develop conventional and unconventional weapons, including chemical ones. And this progress has gained momentum in recent months as the revolutions in the Middle East divert attention from the Islamic Republic. Iran's decision to speed up the development of chemical weapons at the end of the 1980-1988 Iran-Iraq War was one of the lessons of that conflict.

Saddam Hussein's army used chemical weapons against front-line soldiers during that war; to this day thousands of these Iranian veterans are still suffering. One of the largest suppliers for Iran's chemical program was Israeli businessman Nahum Manbar, now serving 16 years in prison. He is due to be released in two years, after all his requests for a reduced term were denied.

Israel offers socially responsible investments

Elli Malki
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — In sectors where consumer opinion matters, charitable donations boost sales. But while a donation may be a clever move for business, that doesn't necessarily make a company a good investment.

One goal of the nonprofit Maala – Business for Social Responsibility is to convince investors to choose companies that are socially responsible. For this reason, Maala and the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange initiated the Maala Socially Responsible Investing Index, which includes companies from the Tel Aviv-100 Index that Maala has deemed socially responsible.

The Maala-SRI index, launched in February 2005, lists 38 companies. Investors can buy into the index through KSM's (a manager of index-linked certificates) exchange-traded note, KSM Maala or Psagot's mutual fund, Psagot Maala.

Comparing the Maala SRI index to the TA-100 can tell us whether contributing to society indeed makes a company a better investment. Through 2008, Maala SRI kept a close pace to the TA-100, but in 2009 and 2010, it began lagging behind Tel Aviv's main benchmark.

Since its launch, Maala has averaged annual returns of 8.6 per cent, while the TA-100 averaged 10.6 per cent. Maala returned 62 per cent over the past six years, while the TA-100 returned 82 per cent.

Israel isn't the only country that has tried to push investors to pick socially responsible companies. Such investment options exist in the United States, too. One is via iShares' exchange-traded fund KLD, which tracks the MSCI USA ESG Select Index, an index that includes 190 companies committed to the environment, society and governance, or ESG.

If we compare the KLD fund to the exchange-traded fund SPY, which tracks the benchmark Standard & Poor's (S&P) 500, we see that the KLD fund tracked the SPY fund nearly perfectly over the past six years. KLD, which like Maala, was launched at the beginning of 2005, averaged annual returns of 2.4 per cent, while SPY averaged 2.6 per cent. KLD returned 15 per cent over the past six years, while SPY returned 16 per cent. Part of the difference can be explained by the fact that KLD has higher management fees.

In a twist of humour and entrepreneurship, the company USA Mutuals launched the VICEX mutual fund at the beginning of 2005, too. That fund's name is no coincidence – it was introduced as an antithesis to all the do-gooder funds. It invests in companies that sell cigarettes and alcohol, profit from gambling, drill for oil and deal in arms.

It turns out that when compared to SPY, VICEX was considerably more volatile. But over the past six years, investing in vice paid off more than investing in virtue. After fees, the VICEX returned an annual 2.9 per cent and a total of 18 per cent, beating out SPY's 16 per cent. Given that VICEX's annual fees of 1.8 per cent are significantly higher than SPY's 0.1 per cent, it's fair to say that the vices outperformed the S&P 500.

Stock Exchange in Tel Aviv

So does this mean investors should steer clear of socially responsible companies? To answer that, we need to know what's behind the various indexes' returns.

We'll find out by breaking down performance based on business sector. The KLD social responsibility fund has a similar sectoral distribution to that of the S&P 500. All industries included in the S&P 500 are represented in the MSCI social responsibility fund, and all have an equal weight.

VICEX, in comparison, concentrates on consumer goods, consumer services and industrial materials. In periods when these sectors did better than others – such as after the prices of oil or basic food-industry inputs increased – VICEX also showed higher returns.

However, the fact that MSCI's social responsibility index mirrors the sectoral breakdown of the S&P 500 means that the KLD fund's returns were almost identical to the SPY fund's. This will ensure that KLD and SPY will have nearly identical returns in the future, too.

Comparing the sector breakdown of the Maala index to the TA-100 as a whole paints a fairly similar picture. Some sectors, such as industrial investment, gas exploration, financial services, computers and wood products, have no representation in Maala. Real estate and investment and holding companies are under-represented, while services, insurance, electricity and electronics are over-represented.

Therefore, we can say that Maala's returns dragged behind those of the TA-100 not because Maala is somehow inferior, but because the sectors with heavier representation in the do-gooder index didn't do as well as other sectors over the past six years.

Investing in socially responsible companies is a moral decision. But it's not an investment strategy, and should not be considered a replacement for one. Traditional strategies see investors choosing assets based on proper distribution, low correlation between assets and the desired risk level.

It is possible to include social responsibility indexes in your portfolio in a way that conforms with an investor's overall strategy.

Investor seeking exposure to the U.S. market who want to put their money into socially responsible companies could invest in the KLD fund. This fund imitates the more general SPY fund almost precisely because the MSCI USA ESG Select Index has the same sectoral breakdown as the S&P 500.

However, an investor seeking exposure to the Israeli capital market who chooses a Maala-based fund will receive returns unequal to the TA-100 because Maala SRI and the TA-100 have different sectoral breakdowns.

Israeli growth strong

Moti Bassok
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Israeli economy is continuing to show strong growth. Gross domestic product climbed 7.8 per cent in the fourth quarter of 2010 on an annual basis, according to the Central Bureau of Statistics. For the second half of 2010, GDP growth was 5.8 per cent.

Another important indicator, the Bank of Israel's composite state-of-the-economy index for March 2011, increased by 0.5 per cent from February. The increase indicates continued growth in domestic consumption and exports, as well as manufacturing production. March was the second consecutive month in which almost all components of the index rose.

Israeli industrial exports in the December 2010 to February 2011 period jumped 23 per cent in annual terms, mostly as a result of a 28.1 per cent rise in high-tech exports, the Central Bureau of Statistics reported. The increase in exports, reflecting the recovery of western economies, came despite exporters' complaints in recent months about the fall in the dollar against the shekel.

New ways to view Anne Frank

One of the hallmarks of graphic novels and memoir is their use of the personal voice.

This is best seen in Art Spiegelman's Maus, where the author's idiosyncratic relationship with his father and his own discomfort with the meaning of success as a writer about Holocaust experience, account for much of the book's liveliness and provocation.

Anne Frank: The Anne Frank House Authorized Graphic Biography (Farrar, Straus and Giroux) lacks such a personal voice, and in this, it is a more distanced and abstract text than the original Diary. Anne Frank: The Anne Frank House Authorized Graphic Biography is by Sid Jacobson and Ernie Colón, who have held important positions at Marvel and DC Comics.

Reviewed by Norman Ravvin

As an "authorized" biography linked with the Amsterdam museum devoted to Anne Frank's memory, the Biography's approach is historical: rather than create a unique artistic look and voice – as Spiegelman did in Maus – Jacobson and Colón make use of elements familiar from other graphic texts, without bringing any new experimentation to the genre. These elements include a lively use of colour, the quick cuts and close-ups that graphic artists borrow from film, and the use of muted black and white to convey the darkest historical events.

The Graphic Biography proceeds chronologically, telling its story in chapters that mix Anne's own narrative with a detailed description of wartime events. Both before and after she went into hiding, Anne Frank was well-informed about how the war was progressing. But the reader of the Graphic Biography learns a great deal more about the German treatment of Europe's Jews than Anne herself did while her family hid in the "secret annex." Clearly, the Biography's authors see their goal as dual: to tell the familiar story of Anne's hiding and the creation of her Diary, alongside a broader account of the disaster that befell European Jews. The latter goal is served throughout the book by the use of detailed maps, and through sections headed "Snapshot," usually a single page made up of five or six image frames that address a key historical issue.

Who, one might wonder, do the creators and their sponsors, the Anne Frank House, have in mind as their Biography's audience? Young people will be drawn to the book's graphic presentation, and might be in need of the history lesson it offers. In this, it would seem that the success of Maus with young adults provided the model for retelling Anne's story in graphic form.

As the Biography notes in its conclusion, Anne's Diary has found success in a remarkable number of venues and cultural contexts. Having appeared first in Dutch in 1947, it has been translated into more than 70 languages. It was reworked as a Broadway play in 1955 and as a Hollywood film in 1959. Books on the Diary and on Anne's life, sometimes associated with museum shows and the Anne Frank House, have appeared in impressive number. Most provocative of these – notably absent in the Biography's "Suggestions for Further Reading" – is Philip Roth's 1979 tour de force, The Ghost Writer.

The creators of the Graphic Biography end with a full-page image of the Amsterdam museum, which includes "the original diary itself, which is there on display." The image of the well-known red notebook, which Anne addressed as Kitty, reminds readers, however fleetingly, that the Diary itself is readily available in a variety of editions, whether early ones, edited by Otto Frank, or more recent versions, which are complete with scholarly apparatus, photographs and historical essays.

If the Graphic Biography attains substantial success, might it simply supplant the Diary as the primary source on Anne for young readers? Will young readers who find their way first to the Biography be encouraged to return to the source and read the Diary? Is there a good reason to turn the Diary into a Graphic Biography, beyond the possibility that the willingness to read is being supplanted by a desire to look, and then read a little? A spokeswoman for the Anne Frank House has said, "Not everyone will read the diary... The one doesn't exclude the other."

One thing is assured: Anne Frank is a key icon of the Holocaust years, and her Diary is among the major texts of Jewish response to the war. The treatment of such a legacy is serious business.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Guns N' Roses' drummer returns with an appetite

Robert Collins
Special to The CJN

Steven Adler understands that he's lucky to be alive.Two decades of heroin and crack cocaine addiction will take a toll on the toughest constitution.

"I tried killing myself," the former Guns N' Roses drummer admits. "It is not easy! A human body can put up with a lot. I had a stroke, a mild heart attack and I was in a coma for four days – all at once. My doctor said I'd be brain dead or lose the left side of my body. I was blessed because I can still play drums and I didn't lose my brain."

Adler, 46, can now laugh at his own expense. It's part of a boundless enthusiasm for life that has been his constant companion since defeating his demons.

Twenty-one years ago Adler was musical royalty — one-fifth of Guns N' Roses, the biggest and best hard rock act of the late 1980s. Widely labeled as "the most dangerous band on earth," Guns N' Roses upped the ante to effectively destroy what would subsequently be called hair metal. They ditched the makeup and turned everything up, leaving behind a critically acclaimed masterpiece album, Appetite For Destruction still the best selling debut album of all time.

With the music came a distinctly decadent Los Angeles lifestyle. Appetite For Destruction's lyrics of easy sex and hard drugs were born from experience, and Adler partied harder than anyone. So much so that in July 1990 he was fired from a band full of drug addicts for excessive drug use. It was the beginning of a downward spiral that took Adler over 20 years to pull himself out of.

"I wasn't expecting to get kicked out of the band," he says "That was unexpected. I was just doing the same drugs that the other guys were doing. That's what all my idols did! "

Adler chronicled the many highs and near fatal lows in a fascinating autobiography, My Appetite For Destruction: Sex & Drugs & Guns N' Roses, published by Harper Collins last summer. As an author, Adler held nothing back, whether detailing orgies orchestrated by Aerosmith's Steven Tyler; the crushing realization that he'd been sacked by the people he considered his best friends; or the desperation and self-loathing of addiction, the many lowlights including smoking a crack pipe in the car as his mother drove him to rehab.

"Writing the book was emotionally, physically, mentally and spiritually healing," he declares. "I got to put everything in my life on paper. At the beginning of the book I talked about hanging out in nightclubs as a teenager and getting sexually abused by older men. I thought that if I said those words out loud I would feel worse and people would think bad of me.

It was the complete opposite. Once I said it and people understood, it was like a huge weight was lifted off of me."

Former Guns N' Roses drummer Steven Adler

For Adler, moving forward included repairing his relationship with his family. Unrelentingly rebellious as a youngster, every time his mother kicked him out of the house he was taken in by her parents. Those grandparents are the first people thanked in the book's dedications and they're proudly included in its photo gallery in a shot taken at the 13-year-old Steven's bar mitzvah.

Hijacking the Holy Land lacks nuance

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

The Arab-Israeli conflict is a complex dispute brimming with shades of grey. It does not lend itself to simplistic black-and-white analysis.

Yet Joel Israel's Hijacking the Holy Land, scheduled to be broadcast on Vision TV on Monday, May 2 at 10 p.m., presents a somewhat one-dimensional account of an infinitely complicated problem.

Barabara Crook

In methodical fashion, it ticks off the shortcomings of the Arab side: The Arabs rejected the 1947 United Nations Palestine partition plan. They exploited Palestinian refugees for political ends. They sowed the conditions for the outbreak of the Six Day War. They forced Israel to build the controversial separation barrier.

Hijacking the Holy Land is also on firm ground in advancing the thesis that the Palestinian Authority has not done nearly enough to promote the idea of peace. The Palestinian media spews hatred against Israel. Palestinian schools generally portray Israel and Jews in a negative light. Palestinian clerics deny the historical Jewish connection to Israel and defame Jews in disgusting antisemitic diatribes.

These accusations are made by, among others, Itamar Marcus and Barbara Crook of the Palestinian Media Watch organization.

But in other key respects, Hijacking the Holy Land misses the mark and is patently misleading.

Its specious claim that Yasser Arafat's successors, Mahmoud Abbas and Salam Fayyad, seek nothing less than Israel's destruction is belied by their consistent advocacy of a two-state solution. Its allegation that the Palestinian inhabitants of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip are the descendants of Arabs from the Arab world is unsubstantiated.

Its implicit suggestion that radical Islam is really no different than mainstream Islam is suspect. Its conclusion that Israel's withdrawal from Gaza brought a hail of Qassam rockets rather than peace ignores an important point: Israel's pullout from Gaza was unilateral.

In this documentary, a procession of Palestinian extremists vent vile views. But where are the moderates, the reasonable Palestinians, who are prepared to coexist with Israel? They are nowhere to be seen.

In this vein, Hijacking the Holy Land leaves the impression that Israel has no Palestinian negotiating partner. This is untrue, as a former Israeli prime minister, Ehud Olmert, has attested.

This film would have been more useful and credible had a nuanced approach been used.

A sampling of films at Hot Docs festival

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Shortly after he was elected president of the United States, Barack Obama issued a brief statement rejecting Israel's controversial settlement policy in the West Bank.

"It is time for these settlements to stop," he said, echoing a sentiment to which his predecessors have fully subscribed.

In Igal Hecht's film, The Hilltops, scheduled to be screened at this year's edition of the Hot Docs Canadian International Documentary Festival, Obama's tart comment is juxtaposed against an uncompromising retort issued by Daniella Weiss, one of the leaders of the settlement movement.

Cockily dismissing her opponents as ignoramuses, she declares, "The land is ours." She adds that no one but Jews are entitled to the West Bank, known biblically as Judea and Samaria.

A fairly detached movie, The Hilltops explores the Jewish claim to the West Bank through the eyes of the settlers. Curiously enough, a Palestinian Arab who appears on screen as a counterpoint does not even attempt to make the case for Palestinian statehood in the West Bank.

Apart from Weiss, a self-assured woman with tunnel vision, Hecht trots out a succession of settlers who elaborate on the thesis that the West Bank belongs to Israel and only Israel.

One of them, Nadia Mattar, dislikes Obama intensely. Proceeding from the fallacious assumption that Obama has not stated his position clearly, she says, "Better an enemy who speaks his mind than one who gives you honey and stabs you in the back."

Later, in a questionable and self-serving remark, she claims that the majority of Israelis do not want to relinquish the West Bank.

Still another settler, whose name I did not catch but who sounds like an American, claims that the Palestinian inhabitants of the West Bank are merely guests "in my country."

Although it is hard to tell whether Hecht sympathizes with their aims, he leaves a nuanced impression of the settlers. On the one hand, he sees them as idealists and zealots who love Israel. On the other hand, he regards them as lawbreakers who flout the authority of the state by building unauthorized outposts in the heart of Arab populated areas in the West Bank.

The Hilltops, in short, presents them as a fiercely committed, formidable ideological force.

The Hilltops – which will be screened at the Royal Ontario Museum on Sunday, May 1 at 4:30 p.m. and at the Cumberland 2 on Tuesday, May 3 at 9:45 p.m. – will be followed by an Israeli short, Susya.

Directed by Dani Rosenberg and Yoav Gross, it is a spare but telling film told from the Palestinian point of view.

Twenty five years ago, during the first Palestinian uprising, the Palestinian inhabitants of Susya were evicted from their homes so that an ancient Jewish village from the Roman era could be excavated.

In Susya, a Palestinian father and son return for a brief visit. Surveying the excavations, the father says, "Here, this was our home." As if to emphasize his point, he adds, "This is our home." Not surprisingly, a feeling of hopelessness overcomes him.

When an Israeli soldier in a jeep asks them to leave the site, the old man grows still more bitter. "This is racism," he says. As he walks away, the jeep trails him, gunning its engine menacingly in an attempt to intimidate the Arabs.

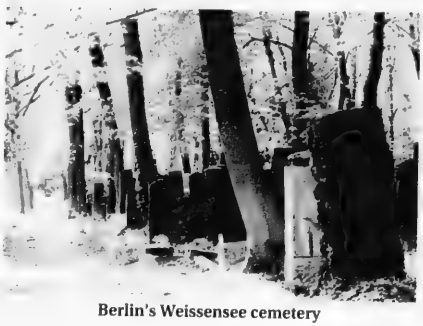
Susya leaves a viewer with a bad taste in the mouth.

Britta Wauer's German-language film, In Heaven, Underground: The Jewish Cemetery in Berlin-Weissensee, is a portrait of Europe's largest active Jewish cemetery. Dedicated in 1880, this sylvan retreat contains the remains of 115,000 German Jews in 130 separate sections.

Distinctly different characters glide through Wauer's nostalgic film.

German students collect rubbings from headstones. Israeli troops in uniform pay tribute to Jewish soldiers who laid down their lives for Germany in World War I.

A German Jewish man recalls playing in the cemetery as a youth. A young couple who live in a cottage on the grounds talk about the cemetery. A policeman assigned to the cemetery speaks about the Jewish customs he has learned over the years.



Berlin's Weissensee cemetery

Weissensee, an invaluable repository of Jewish history, was left untouched by the Nazis. Thankfully, they did not get around to levelling it in an orgy of anti-Semitic animus.

There will be three screenings of In Heaven, Underground. The first two take place on Sunday, May 1 at 9:45 and on Tuesday, May 3 at 3:45 p.m. at the Isabel Bader Theatre. The third screening will be held on Sunday, May 8 at 7:30 p.m. at the Toronto International Film Festival Bell Lightbox.

Limor Pinhasov's Melissa – Mom and Me is a portrait of two attractive thirty-something women sharing emotional pain. It brings together an Israeli and an American who were once strippers in a club in Japan.

Yael, known in Tokyo as Jenny, has since become a painter and a wife in Tel Aviv. Melissa, a single mother and a former drug addict, lives with her mom in a small town in North Carolina. The pair are reunited after a seven-year absence when Yael, feeling lonely and recalling their days in Japan, suddenly shows up at Melissa's doorstep one day.

They share memories and heartaches and re-establish their bond. Melissa's mother adds a layer of moral complexity and ambiguity to this drama.

Melissa – Mom and Me will be screened at the Royal Ontario Museum on Wednesday, May 4 at 6:30 p.m. and Friday, May 6 at 10:30 a.m.

Hot Docs runs from April 28 to May. For a full schedule visit www.hotdocs.ca

'My grandmother was very spiritual'

"Like every young person you do what your family wants you to do," he explains. "My grandmother was very spiritual, and she thought doing Jewish things was important for my life. They weren't important for me, but she was older and wiser."

Part of Adler's physical and psychological revival is his commitment to his new band, Adler's Appetite. It's a chance for fans to enjoy old favourites from Guns N' Roses' heyday, paired with a few new tracks from the mature and newly sober rockers.

"When I'm on stage playing with my new band it totally reminds me of back in the day playing clubs on Sunset Strip. And the new songs go over just as great as the [Guns N'Roses] songs. It's a kick ass rock and roll show. Every night we think, 'God help whoever has to open up for us.' We don't care if we play for two or 2,000 or 200,000 people, you're going to get the same thing."

Two decades of squabbling egos and legal battles make a reformation of the original Guns N' Roses' line-up unlikely. Still, Adler makes a convincing argument why it should happen.

"There are two reasons why I want to do a tour with the original G'n'R guys," he says. "There's all the love I receive around the world. I have heard 'Appetite For Destruction is the soundtrack to my life' in so many languages. I've heard it thousands of times and that is the greatest thing anyone can say to me. We owe it to those fans. And two, the money we could make! The whole thing could make billions of dollars. All we have to do is get on stage with each other for 90 minutes."

Adler is shortly embarking on a tour with his band Adler's Appetite which will see him play in British Columbia in August. For more details visit www.adlersappetiteonline.com

Shahar Peer could reach tennis top 10 this year

Marvin Glassman
Special to The CJN

MIAMI — Two years ago, Israeli tennis star Shahar Peer made world headlines when she was denied a visa to enter the United Arab Emirates to compete in the 2009 Dubai Tennis Championships.

The ban backfired, not only because the tournament was fined $300,000 (US) and forced to allow Peer to compete for the next five years, but also because it strengthened Peer's determination to play above expectations.

Peer recently entered the Sony Ericsson Open in Miami, and the 23-year-old has demonstrated that her legacy in tennis will not be based on a single political incident. Rather, she channelled the anger and pain of the past and turned 2010 into her best year of competition. Ranked 38th in 2009, she returned to Dubai in 2010, finished as a semifinalist and went on to six other semifinals in international tournaments that year. In June 2010, her outstanding results, including a runner-up finish at the Moorilla Hobart International in Australia, raised her world ranking to No. 14, making Peer the highest-rated Israeli man or woman ever in tennis history.

"Sports and politics should never mix, and to this day, I never forgot the anger when I was banned. But I play better when someone tries to take something from me. I became more determined than ever to do well in tennis. Now that I made history in my sport for the right reason, I want to continue to get better," Peer said following her second round match (a 6-2, 6-2 loss to Spain's Anabel Medina Garrigues) at the Sony Ericsson Open.

Despite the loss, Peer has kept her momentum going. With two quarter-final finishes this year (Dubai and Indian Wells), she has continued to move up the rankings to a current position at No. 11. A top 10 ranking is within reach this year.

To that end, Peer has worked with some of the best coaches in tennis. For the past six months, she has been coached by Craig Kardon, who guided both Lindsay Davenport and Martina Navratilova to the No. 1 ranking in tennis. And she's hired Harold Solomon, who was instrumental in Jennifer Capriati's winning the 2001 French Open. Peer is hoping to improve her serve and net play.

"Shahar has as much of a chance as anyone in tennis to have her best year yet," said former player Mary Joe Fernandez, who has done television commentary on Peer's matches for many years. "With the Williams sisters [Serena and Venus] being injured for the past year, there is a void in tennis, and Shahar has the resolve and determination to get into the top 10. While Shahar does not possess a big weapon like an explosive serve, she rarely beats herself with unforced errors and has beaten top 10 players this year with her improved play at the net. With a will to always fight to the end in her matches, I think she can continue to finish deep at most tournaments."

Since the Dubai incident and because of her international exposure at tournaments around the world, Peer has become one of the most recognizable Israeli athletes in the world. She has won both Woman of the Year (2009) and Athlete of the Year honours (2006-2009) in Israel, and she's used her celebrity status to benefit others when she is honoured by Jewish and Israeli organizations at tournaments.

Peer received much praise for joining last year's March of the Living in Poland, leading 10,000 students to the Auschwitz-Birkenau death camps. She was accompanied by her maternal grandmother, Yuliana Eckstein, an 81-year-old survivor who lost her parents and brother at Auschwitz and who was liberated in 1945.

"She [her grandmother] never told me the horrors until she went with me to the camps. Leading the March of the Living has given me strength and values that make winning or losing a tennis match not seem that important anymore," Peer said.

Barring injury, Peer will be in Toronto to compete at the Rogers Cup from Aug. 8 to 14 at the Rexall Centre.

Clinton: Talks are the only way

Natasha Mozgovaya
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WASHINGTON – U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton said last week that Israelis and Palestinians must immediately return to negotiations, even amidst the Arab revolutions recently sweeping the region.

In an interview with PBS' Charlie Rose, Clinton urged that it's in the best interest of both Israelis and Palestinians to return to "the hard work of determining borders, determining the security requirements and dealing with all the other issues that they have to face."

Clinton reiterated the U.S. opposition to any unilateral effort by the Palestinians to declare a state in the United Nations and emphasized the importance of a two-state solution through negotiations.

"Negotiations are the only way" to achieve a two-state solution, Clinton said.

Hillary Clinton

She added that both the Israelis and Palestinians had their reasons for being concerned about proceeding with negotiations even before the upheaval in the Arab world, and are now trying to analyze what impact the uncertainty of the region will have on their future positions.

Clinton also commented on Iran, saying that the U.S. doesn't want Tehran to be given "one iota of credit" for the revolutions sweeping the Middle East.

Clinton said Iran is trying to take advantage of the situation in the Arab world, and emphasized that the U.S. sees Iran as a major threat to the region.

With regards to the revolutions sweeping the Arab world, Clinton said, "We are now in scene one of act one of a five-act drama that will develop over a considerable period of time, and in which we have to determine our interests, our range of influence and what conflicting motivations may be involved."

Teaching in Israel was 'extremely challenging' but rewarding

Rina Goldberg, far right, went on a hike through the Galil as part of the Jewish Education Service of North America's (JESNA) Lainer-Masa Fellowship program.

More news for young Jews on heebonics.ca

For many people, teaching young kids in a foreign language and in a distant country would be a daunting task. For Hamilton-born teacher Rina Goldberg, it was the opportunity of a lifetime.

Goldberg, now 27, intensified her passion for Jewish education by participating in the Jewish Education Service of North America's (JESNA) Lainer-Masa Fellowship program in Jerusalem.

Masa, an organization that provides subsidized programs for Jewish youth to work, volunteer or study in Israel, allowed Goldberg to take courses at Hebrew University and simultaneously tutor kids at a local elementary school.

"Since my teen tour to Israel, I knew I needed to return for a longer period of time," said Goldberg, who participated in the program in 2004. "I had learned about the country from a young age and wanted to experience everyday life there."

As a third-year Jewish education student at York University, she was eager to see how teaching in Israel would compare.

Looking back, her year in Israel did not disappoint. "It was incredible. Living in Jerusalem definitely changes you," she said.

"I felt like I had the best of both worlds – I was living with North Americans, but also making friends with Israelis, and connecting with the locals. It was an incredible learning experience."

Throughout the program, she took courses about the Israeli education system at Hebrew University.

"In my classes, I became more educated about political and social issues, and as my awareness grew, my connection to Israel strengthened."

Although she'd travelled to Israel many times before, Goldberg felt that living there was a completely different experience. For her, it was the simple daily tasks like getting groceries in Hebrew and bargaining at the market that made her feel like she belonged.

"Everything I did there helped me feel stronger in my Jewish identity, from celebrating holidays to just ordering concert tickets," Goldberg said.

"That year, I realized that Israel wasn't just my 'kibbutz-in-the-sky' dream, but that it was a real place, with difficulties and challenges just like any other country," she said.

For her internship, Rina worked at an elementary school where she tutored Grade 1 students in English, Hebrew and math.

"The kids were at once impulsive and thoughtful," she said. "They moved very fast– literally and in terms of their curriculum. Sometimes it was difficult to grab the children's attention, but once they focused, they brought a ton of energy to the lessons."

Rina Goldberg

Goldberg was particularly impressed by how globally aware the kids were, even at a very young age.

"On a politically tense day, one of my students asked me if I'd heard the news," she recalled. "When I asked him what he meant, he said that something very sad had happened. It was my first time hearing such worldly awareness from a first grader."

Throughout the year, Goldberg was surprised at how attuned the Israeli children were to what was going on around them.

"It was refreshing and unlike anything I'd seen before."

At the same time, the Israeli classroom proved to be an extremely challenging environment.

"Even though I loved it, it was very tough for me. It's a very hard life being a teacher in Israel," she said. "It wasn't easy adjusting to the differences in language and culture. Even the schedule was different."

Ultimately, though, she describes her overall teaching experience as "really fun" and extremely rewarding.

"I feel like I was learning more about myself, my Jewish identity and my identity as an educator."

In addition to her courses and internship program, Goldberg enjoyed a variety of Israeli cultural, social, and religious events throughout the year. She even attended a Masa event where then-prime minister Ariel Sharon spoke to an audience of roughly 20,000 students.

"He was talking about some of the amazing internships we were doing, and he mentioned me by name," Goldberg gushes.

"It was a very special moment for me. A reporter even interviewed me on the radio in Hebrew afterwards. It was the kind of experience I just can't imagine happening anywhere else."

Goldberg considers herself very lucky to have been able to participate in the internship program, stressing that she would not have been able to go without the funding she received from Masa and York's Jewish studies department.

"I was also really lucky to have the support of my parents, at a time when many parents were really worried about letting their kids travel to Israel," she added. "My family has always been very committed to Israel."

After the program, Goldberg finished her degree at York and pursued a master's in Jewish education at the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York.

"When I got back from Israel, I realized that the best thing I could do with my knowledge and experience was to become a Jewish educator in North America."

Today, she teaches kindergarten at the Abraham Joshua Heschel School in New York City.

As a teacher, Goldberg hopes to share her passion for Judaism and Israel with young people.

"For me, teaching, increasing Hebrew literacy, and helping children feel good about their Jewish identities is my way of doing tikkun olam."

"I want to show by example that it's possible to grow up in North America and still learn to speak Hebrew fluently and have a full Jewish life."

More of you to love

Dear Ella,

It's taken me a while to get up the nerve to write this. I was hoping that once I got it off my chest, I would put it behind me. So far, I have been rehashing the conversation over and over, coming up with things I could have and should have said.

A few months ago, I went to my high school reunion. My friends insisted that it would be fun and they finally talked me into it. I bought a new dress, new shoes, got all dolled up and looked pretty good, or so I thought.

I wasn't there more than 10 minutes when Sandy, an old classmate whom I hadn't seen in over 20 years, came over. She was very excited to see me. She threw her arms around me in a tight hug. I didn't remember being so close to her that she should have that kind of reaction.

She stepped back and said, "I see life's been good to you. There's so much more of you to love."

I was speechless, and that doesn't happen too often. Here comes the worst part. I said, "I'm doing well thanks, Sandy. How have you been?" I totally ignored what she'd said, thanked her, and continued being nice, when all the while I was crushed.

I haven't been able to get that scene out of my mind. What should I have said to this woman? I still feel as if I want to call her up and give her a piece of my mind.

Classless Classmate

Dear Classless Classmate,

People can be cruel, especially when they are covering up for their own insecurities. Sounds to me as if Sandy wanted to get her shot in before you had a chance to ask about or comment on anything to do with her.

Sometimes people can cope better with their own inadequacies if they make sure everyone around them feels worse than they do.

I know you think you handled the situation poorly, but in fact you handled it perfectly. You showed restraint and class. When you didn't react in a negative way, Sandy was diffused. She didn't get the reaction she was trying to invoke.

You can't control what people around you do and say. What you can control is your reaction to it. By taking the high road and ignoring her comment, you gave no credence to her jab and maintained your self-respect. However, by brooding about it long after the incident is over, you have given Sandy her reward.

If her comment upset you so much, perhaps you have to look at yourself to see why you can't seem to detach your thoughts from it. She clearly hit a nerve for you. You have put far too much energy into thinking up a revengeful response. Instead, you should be using that energy to dig deep and see why her comment had such a negative effect on you. Sandy may have opened up an underlying wound that needs to be healed.

Once you have the answer to that, you will be well on your way to working on your own self-esteem. The control is in your ball park – use this incident to improve your own life.

The power of family

There is something special about my clinics. I am there in two roles: the primary is dealing with medical issues such as diagnosis, recommendations for treatment, followup, explanations to patients and families and referrals for tests and specialists.

The second role, part of being an academic physician, is teaching medical trainees, from late-year medical students to post-graduate trainees from family medicine, internal medicine and geriatric medicine programs. Those trainees close to the end of their training are the young physicians who will soon be taking care of all of us, including our elders.

I feel a special responsibility to medical students and post-graduate trainees. Part of it comes from an ancient tradition in medicine, espoused by the venerable Hippocrates: one of the duties that physicians owe to the younger generation is to act as teachers and mentors.

The Hippocratic Oath (fifth century BC) also required the physician to teach his teacher's progeny: "to consider dear to me as my parents him who taught me this art... To look upon his children as my own brothers, to teach them this art if they so desire, without fee or written promise." However, this has, over the centuries, evolved to include all those who come to physicians as students.

Among the many concepts I try to give these young students and physicians are the importance of family in the care of elders and the fact that the children show enormous devotion and love. In most medical education and experience, one does not necessarily get to experience the ties that bind the generations of families together, nor to witness the enormous dedication that most children exhibit in words and action toward their parents.

Senior Side of Life

Michael Gordon

I recall years ago hearing quite often that a characteristic of North American families is that they are not as devoted to their elders as they are in other countries, including those from which many immigrants come to Canada. The evidence often cited, for example, was that multiple-generation families often lived in one dwelling, a reflection of the attachment of the children to their parents.

Of interest is that many of these immigrant groups, when given the option in Canada, will move away from their parental home as they embark on their own lives. The issue is often that in the country of origin, living separately is not a social or economic option. If anything, I often find myself – as part of my supportive approach to caring family members – counselling them to make sure they are taking care of themselves as they endeavour to be devoted children. I have often observed children who sacrifice important aspects of their own life, work and family in their desire to properly care for their beloved parent.

Although pivotal within the Ten Commandments (No. 5: Honour thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee), which many people refer to within their religious tradition, even when they are not particularly observant, some children jeopardize their own well-being in their quest to be dutiful children.

My students often comment on the attentiveness of the family members. I emphasize the importance of these relationships when care must be provided to frail and dependent elders. The ties that bind are strong: all of us in health care must recognize this wonderful manifestation of filial love and build on those strengths while providing the best possible care.

Dr. Michael Gordon is medical program director of palliative care at Baycrest and co-author with Bart Mindszenthy of Parenting Your Parents (Dundurn Press). Leaders applaud bin Laden's demise

JERUSALEM — Israeli officials lauded U.S. President Barack Obama's statement announcing the assassination of Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden, with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu saying that Israel shared the "joy of the American people."

Obama issued the statement just before midnight on Sunday, Washington time. He said bin Laden's body had been recovered from Islamabad, Pakistan, by U.S. authorities.

"Justice has been done," Obama said in a heartfelt address Sunday, commemorating the nearly 3,000 people who were killed in the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on New York and Washington orchestrated by bin Laden.

Osama bin Laden

In a statement issued by the Prime Minister's Office on Monday, Netanyahu called the U.S. operation a "resounding victory for justice, freedom, and the values shared by all democratic countries fighting shoulder to shoulder against terror."

The prime minister personally congratulated the U.S. president, as well as American soldiers, saying that "the State of Israel shares the joy of the American people on this historical day, that of bin Laden's ouster."

Israeli President Shimon Peres said that "bin Laden was the great murderer and was destined to be hanged.

"This is a great achievement for the American security establishment, a great achievement for the U.S. president, this is a great achievement to the free world," Peres said.

Defence Minister Ehud Barak said: "Again we have come to realize that the fight against terror is shared with the world's leading democracies, and it will be won by a joint, multi-layered effort that has yet to be finalized."

Speaking hours after the announcement of bin Laden's death, U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton said: "I want to offer my thoughts and prayers to thousands of families of those killed in terrorist attacks.

"These were not just attacks against America, but the whole world. Innocent people, most of them Muslims, were targeted in markets and mosques, subway stations and airplanes," she added, in her brief remarks. "I know that nothing can make up for the loss of the victims or fill the void they left.

Staffenberg Returns

CALGARY — The Calgary Jewish Federation gets a new executive director, Drew Staffenberg, next month. He replaces Lance Davis, who left last July for Toronto for personal reasons. Staffenberg served as executive director of the federation's predecessor, the Calgary Jewish Community Council, as well as the city's Jewish community centre, from 1985 to 1993. He's currently executive director of campus development for the Jewish communities of Princeton, Mercer and Bucks, N.J. After leaving Calgary in 1993, he was executive director of the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver until 2001. From 2001 to 2005, he headed the Jewish Family and Children's Service of Greater Philadelphia.

Another Rabba

NEW YORK — A second woman will be ordained with the title rabba. The Academy of Jewish Religion in Riverdale, N.Y., is set to ordain Kaya Stern-Kaufman, 47, of Great Barrington, Mass., at a May 12 ceremony, the New York Jewish Week reported. Her ordination comes a year after Rabbi Avi Weiss, head of the Hebrew Institute of Riverdale, a modern Orthodox shul in New York, gave the title rabba to Sara Hurwitz, who serves the congregation, causing controversy in the Orthodox world. A month later, he said he would no longer give women the title rabba. He isn't affiliated with the Academy of Jewish Religion. Stern-Kaufman is one of seven women to be graduating from the academy, a pluralistic rabbinical school, this year, and the only one who will receive the title rabba.

Students Released

LOS ANGELES — Three teens admitted to antisemitic and racist vandalism at their Southern California school. Three Calabasas High School 11th-graders were identified by the Los Angeles County Sheriff as blanketing the school – including lockers, walls and a sidewalk – on the April 23-24 weekend with swastikas, a picture of Hitler and phrases such as "gas chamber" and "whites only. Seven students and two teachers, most Jewish, were named in the graffiti. The students were released last week, uncharged. The graffiti was removed before school started April 25. The school has a large number of Jewish students.

Invite Rescinded

LONDON — Britain rescinded an invitation to the royal wedding to Syria's ambassador because of Syrian government attacks on anti-regime protesters. The invitation was withdrawn the day before the April 29 wedding of Prince William and Kate Middleton. More than 450 anti-government protesters have been killed in a month of demonstrations. Hundreds more have reportedly been jailed.

Israel Helped Argentina in 1982 War: Book

BUENOS AIRES — Israeli prime minister Menachem Begin agreed to help Argentina during the 1982 Falklands War as revenge for Britain's crackdown on the Irgun during the British Mandate, a new book says.

Operation Israel: The Rearming of Argentina During The Dictatorship, by Argentine journalist Hernan Dobry, details how Israel secretly supplied arms and equipment to Argentina via Peru.

Menachem Begin

The book says Begin authorized the deal by saying, "Is this going to be used to kill the English? Kadima. [Go ahead.] Dov from up there is going to be happy with the decision." Dov Gruner was a close friend of Begin who was captured and hanged by the British in April 1947.

The testimony is provided by Israel Lotersztain, a salesman for Isrex, an Israeli defence company in Argentina.

Israel's support to Argentina during the 1982 Falklands War was legal, but was only shown by a few other countries, "such as Libya and Peru," Dobry told JTA.

Israel armed Argentina's military dictatorship with air-to-air missiles, 23 French-built Mirage IIICs fighter aircraft, fuel tanks for fighter bombers, gas masks and missile radar alert systems, according to the book.

Britain retook the Falklands in June 1982, less than three months after Argentina invaded them. More than 250 British and 650 Argentines were killed in the battle.

Survivors honoured for educating others

More than 2,000 people gathered to mark Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah commemoration

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

More than 2,000 people gathered on Sunday to mark the annual Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah commemoration at Earl Bales Park, where local Holocaust survivors and educators were honoured for their contributions to Holocaust education.

The ceremony, called The Faces Behind the Stories, was co-sponsored by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre and the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem. It featured a candlelighting ceremony, a performance by the Yeshivat Or Chaim vocal ensemble and speakers representing three generations affected by the Holocaust: Faye Schulman, a survivor and partisan, Howard Sokolowski, a child of survivors, and Samuel Buckstein, a grandchild of survivors.

The service, commemorating 66 years since World War II ended, also included prayers and songs, the March of the Colours by the Royal Canadian Legion and the Jewish War Veterans of Canada, and a brief address by Amir Gissin, Israel's consul general in Toronto.

Gissin said the community gathers for the commemoration every year because of "the need to learn something new about the Holocaust... to understand a new perspective."

He praised Canada as a country that can be compared to no other when it comes to supporting Holocaust education and the State of Israel.

"We will continue to meet here every year, to remember and to hope to learn a new thing, hear a new story, because this is our duty, not just for ourselves, but for the generations to come," Gissin said.

Schulman, who survived the Holocaust as a Russian partisan, one of the "Jewish boys and girls who fought back as armed resistance fighters," said that because so few partisans survived, their stories are seldom heard.

"We had to fight every day to survive... For 2-1/2 years, we lived in the woods, winter and summer. We never slept in a house. The roof was the sky.

Celebrate Yom Ha'atzmaut

At a remove of more than 70 years, with three new generations of sons and daughters, the unceasing rolling away of the clouds of time and the inevitable fading of the fine lines at the edge of memory, those of us born in the aftermath of World War II would have difficulty imagining how dark and foreboding the world seemed to our parents, say, in May of 1940.

In late May 1940, with the Allied army trapped in the harbour of Dunkirk, France, the overthrow of democratic western civilization by the genocidal, Nazi-led Axis actually seemed possible.

Between May 26 and June 3, 1940, nearly 340,000 British, French and Belgian troops were saved from capture in what remains to this day, one of the most dramatically, heart-rending operations of self-sacrifice and rescue.

But it was horribly clear to everyone in the West and especially, alas, to the millions of European Jews seeking safety from the Nazi predators that Hitler was on the march and there was little military roadblock in his malevolent, genocidal path.

Worse.

Some 18 months later on Jan. 20, 1942, the high core of the Nazi administrative apparatus met at the Wannsee Conference to plan the systematic mechanics of the Final Solution for the Jews of Europe. After that meeting, each and every Jew in Europe – man, woman and child – was targeted for death by the Nazi regime and its many collaborators.

From the editor's desk...

And worse still.

Six months later, in June 1942, the British Eighth Army failed to stop German forces at the battle in Gazala in the North African desert advancing inexorably eastward toward Suez.

The road to the oil fields of the Middle East lay open to the Nazis. It was the same road that led to the Jews of Mandatory Palestine, now exposed and vulnerable to the approaching horde of Hitler's murderers. The leaders of the Yishuv, the Jewish population in Mandatory Palestine, made contingency plans for their last fighting stand against the invading Germans.

It was not only soothsayers or the psychiatrically disturbed who warned that "the end is near." People from all walks and stations of life were justifiably frightened for their lives, for their families, their countries and their way of life.

But some four months later, from late October to the beginning of November 1942, fighting continuously, long, hard and in deathly cruel circumstances, the Allied army defeated the Germans in the second battle of El Alamein and stopped the German advance some 100 kilometres west of Alexandria. Britain's heroic prime minister Winson Churchill praised the victorious forces. Of that battle, he said: "We had neither a victory before it, nor a defeat after it."

The war against the Nazis would last nearly three more years. Millions upon millions more would yet die in battles of fire and blood or be murdered.

Jews from around the world joined the battle against the Nazis in great numbers. No cause was more moral, more compelling or more just.

Jews from Eretz Yisrael – Mandatory Palestine – served in various units of the British army even as they farmed, built and developed the land and defended it against Arabs hostile to the possibility of a sovereign Jewish state in the Middle East.

Five years and one month after the pivotal battle of El Alamein, the peoples of the world understood the important necessity of creating conditions for the establishment of an independent state for the Jews of the world.

The declaration of the UN General Assembly partition resolution Nov. 29, 1947, read in part: "The Mandate for Palestine shall terminate as soon as possible, but in any case not later than August first, 1948... Independent Arab and Jewish states... shall come into existence in Palestine two months after the evacuation of the armed forces of the Mandatory Power has been completed, but in any case, no later than October first, 1948." (My emphasis)

Local Arabs as well as the Arab League spurned the idea of two independent states and rejected the result of the vote that approved it. They immediately launched a war against the Jews of the Yishuv.

The Jews defended themselves and their communities. Then, too, the situation seemed horrendously bleak and desperate. But six months after the partition vote, on the fifth day of Iyar, May 14-15, the Jews of Eretz Yisrael declared the establishment of sovereign, free, independent Medinat Yisrael. With the help of volunteers from overseas, the 650,000 Jews of the Yishuv, defeated the armies of the Arab League and the local Arab fighters who tried so desperately to kill the Jewish state at its birth.

If the Arabs had wanted then to build their own society as much as they wanted to prevent the rise of a Jewish one, there would today be an independent Palestine too.

But they never have.

Perhaps one day they will.

We have not yet lost our hope.

Celebrate Yom Ha'tzmaut next week. It is a profound, watershed moment in modern history.

Next week's column will be written in Jerusalem.

FAST program surpasses one-million mark

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

In the half dozen years since its inception, Fighting Antisemitism Together (FAST) has reached almost 1.1 million young Canadians through its "Choose Your Voice" anti-racism and antisemitism program for grade 6, 7 and 8 students.

Elizabeth Comper, who launched the program with her husband, Tony, in 2005, referred to the educational venture as "a mitzvah" in a phone interview last week.

"We're excited about it," she said. "We never thought seven years ago that we would hit the one-million mark."

Tony, a past president and CEO of BMO Financial Group, and Elizabeth, a former teacher, launched the program in 2005 in Toronto with Canadian Jewish Congress. CJC served as a consultant on the program, which includes a DVD and lesson plans.

While the program is now used nationwide, including at 19 faculties of education, the "big effort this year" is to increase its penetration in British Columbia and Alberta, said Tony. The focus originally was more on schools in Ontario and Quebec.

Other areas of expansion include private schools, which have been "systematically coming on stream," he added. Last year, Elizabeth spoke at Bialik Hebrew Day School as well.

The Toronto-based couple speak about the program at participating schools as often as they can, Elizabeth said.

They have also taken part in Toronto's Holocaust Education Week and are launching a pilot program in the GTA – a competition offering students a chance to speak at Holocaust Education Week, based on what they write about the program and how it affected them.

FAST itself was an award-winner last year, when it received an Award of Excellence from the Canadian Race Relations Foundation. "That was a huge, huge honour," Elizabeth said.

The Choose Your Voice program fosters "great kindness, respect and tolerance," she added. "And the most important thing is that it creates a safe environment for children to be open and discuss any of their fears or concerns."

FAST's founding dates back to a rash of antisemitic incidents in 2004, which led the couple to reach out to other non-Jewish business and community leaders to lend their support to the project.

The Compers were introduced to Jewish tradition in the early 1970s as newlyweds, when Elizabeth began her career at a Lubavitch school in Montreal.

She said she and her husband could never understand antisemitism. "We always said if we ever have an opportunity, we want to be able to do something, because this is not right... This is not how we see life in Canada."

'Holocaust was a crime that challenged fundamental values all civilized peoples hold dear'

The bed was the ground and the pillow was the rifle," Schulman said.

"Because my family was killed I felt I had to do as much as I could... doing ambushes, attacks on the murderers, blowing up bridges, trains and more."

Schulman reacted to the oft-stated claim that Jews didn't fight back against the Nazis, "that we went like lambs to the slaughter. This is not true... We fought back," she said, defiantly.

"I was just a teenager, but I saved the lives of many wounded Jewish and gentile partisans... Unfortunately, I couldn't save my own family," Schulman added, fighting back tears.

"I am still grieving them."

She said that "in the woods, the ground is soaked with Jewish blood," but she hopes her testimony about the partisans will inspire future generations.

Louis Greenbaum, the program co-chair, acknowledged the presence of many Canadian politicians, including Toronto-Centre MP Bob Rae, Thornhill MP Peter Kent, York-Centre MP Ken Dryden, Vaughan Mayor Maurizio Bevilacqua, Thornhill MPP Peter Sherman and York Centre MPP Monte Kwinter, before he read a statement by Prime Minister Stephen Harper.

"It is important that we take this opportunity to remember the victims of the Holocaust and their families. It helps keep strong the conviction in our hearts to do everything we can – through our actions and our words – to stand firm against the forces of intolerance and remain vigilant against genocide," Harper's statement said.

"The Holocaust... was not just a crime perpetrated against a specific group of people; it was a crime that challenged the fundamental values all civilized peoples hold dear: freedom, democracy, human rights and the rule of law.

"We must never allow the crimes of the past to be repeated or forgotten. We are committed to ensure the lessons of the Holocaust are never forgotten."

Greenbaum also read a statement by Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty that addressed Holocaust survivors as "living witnesses to undaunted courage, unfailing strength and unwavering hope.

"Let us take this occasion to remember those who perished, those who were orphaned and displaced, as well as those who took a stand and made the choice to extend a helping hand," McGuinty's statement said.

Elsewhere in the city on Sunday, the Azrieli Foundation organized simultaneous book signings by Holocaust survivors who have published memoirs through the foundation's Holocaust Survivor Memoirs Program.

Rachel and Adam Shtibel, co-authors of The Violin/A Child's Testimony appeared at the Richmond Hill Indigo; Under the Yellow and Red Stars author Alex Levin was at the Yorkdale Indigo; From Generation to Generation author Agnes Tomasov appeared at Chapters in Bayview Village, and Renate Krakauer, author of But I Had a Happy Childhood, signed books at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre.

No one was fooled

To great fanfare and ostentatious fawning last week, Fatah, the largest faction in the PLO, led by Palestinian Authority (PA) leader Mahmoud Abbas and Gaza's Iranian-backed Hamas, led by Khaled Meshal, announced that their organizations had signed an interim agreement that was aimed at uniting the Palestinian people. The agreement was brokered by Egypt and signed in Cairo, the apparent culmination of secret tripartite contacts over the past few weeks.

According to Fatah negotiator Azzam al-Ahmed, the two sides had agreed "on all points of contention, including the make-up of the unity government, fixing a date for presidential and parliamentary elections, and restructuring the PLO."

According to Mahmoud Zahar, who was part of the Hamas negotiating team in Cairo, the plan "does not involve negotiations with Israel or recognizing it." To ensure his point was clear, Zahar added "It will be impossible for an interim government to take part in the peace process with Israel."

And so, once again, the leaders of the Palestinian people have acted unwisely and have chosen a path that steers them further away from independence. Unless and until Hamas irrefutably proves that it has abandoned its sanctified grisly mission of destroying the Jewish state, how can Israel be expected to sit down with a Palestinian government that has now accepted into its ranks the very individuals who champion the genocide of the Jewish people and the politicide of the Jewish state?

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu was concise and correct when he told his cabinet on Sunday that a future peace between Israel and the Palestinians will be created "only with those who want to be on our side, and not those who want our annihilation. Israel extends its hand in peace to all peoples of the region, to all of our neighbours that aspire to live alongside us in peace and will stand steadfast against whoever tries to attack us and endanger our existence."

Israel's president, Shimon Peres, who has been perhaps Israel's most ardent booster of the peace process with Abbas, was clearly taken aback by the agreement. "I call upon my friends in the leadership of Fatah: unite for peace. Don't make compromises. Don't permit a division that legitimizes destruction and hatred. We were for peace, we are for peace and we are committed to a two-state solution. The United Nations cannot accept or recognize a terrorist organization as a state in September. It is not too late. Let's take the road of peace. Let's not create an impossible situation – neither for the Palestinians, nor for us."

The Fatah – Hamas unity agreement makes an independent Palestinian state less, not more, imminent. No one was fooled by it, except perhaps Abbas.

He has opened his gates to Persia's very own Trojan horse.

Diaspora Jews fought with Israelis

The winds of time have resulted in a blockage of the memories of many Jews as to the very significant contribution of more than 4,400 young Jews hailing from the Diaspora, to the Israeli victory in its War of Independence. Among a large segment of young people, there is a remarkable lack of any knowledge of any aspect of the events of those days. More than 250 volunteers from Canada fought with Israeli forces, one of the most prominent being Col. Ben Dunkelman, a charismatic veteran of World War II who led the Israeli 7th Brigade in its important role of cleaning up the Galilee. Sadly, there were nine Canadians who fell in the midst of operations, of whom three were gentiles, veterans of the Royal Canadian Air Force. Among these was the top Canadian air ace of World War II, George (Buzz) Beurling, a colourful figure on the Canadian scene who had earned a great reputation for his combat victories. The other two gentiles were Leonard Fitchett and Fred Stevenson. Their memories are enshrined in the Roll of Honor at the Machal Memorial situated at Sha'ar V'gai in the Jerusalem hills.

This lacuna in our common knowledge has encouraged the World Machal Organization to embark on the inauguration of a website at www.machal.org.il, and it's calling on veterans and their survivors to submit vignettes relating to their experiences, and urging all Canadians to visit the site and refresh their memories.

Canadians gave their lives in 1948 war

This Yom Hazikaron, as we remember the thousands of members of the Israel Defence Forces who sacrificed their lives in defence of the State of Israel, and the victims of terror, perhaps we should also remember the 11 Canadian Machalniks who gave their lives in the 1948 war.

• George (Buzz) Beurling of Verdun, Que. Canada's top World War II fighter pilot, he was killed near Rome, May 20, 1948, in a crash of an airplane being readied for its ferry flight to Israel. Buried in Haifa Military Cemetery, non-Jewish section.

• Harvey Cohen and Ed Lugech, first cousins, of Toronto. Served in Palmach Yiftach Brigade and participated in battles of Nebi Yusha and Malkiyeh. Missing and believed waylaid by Arab irregulars near Sarafand in late June 1948. (Update from Maurice Moshe Sadeh: lost in the battle of Malkiyeh, on the Lebanese border, May 15,1948. Remains reinterred 2009.)

• Reuben Schiff of Toronto. Served on Aliya-Bet ship Paducah. Killed July 11, 1948, near Abu j'Ab while looking for his shipmate and Palmach comrade, Lou Ball. Buried in Nachlat Itzhak.

• Sidney Rubinoff of Toronto. Served with Palmach in battles of Nebi Yusha, Malkiyeh, Operation Danny, and capture of Lydda and Ramleh. Wounded at Latrun July 17, 1948, and died on way to hospital. Buried in Nachlat Itzhak.

• Sidney Leisure of Toronto. Served in 7th Brigade, 72nd Battalion. Killed Sept. 7, 1948, during Operation Hiram in battle for Tamra hill in the Galilee. Buried in Nahariya.

• Leonard Fitchett of Vancouver. Ex-Royal Canadian Air Force pilot. Served in 103 Squadron. Downed in his Beaufighter by anti-aircraft fire on Oct. 20, 1948, while attacking Egyptian-held Iraq el Sueidan police fortress. Buried in Haifa Military Cemetery, non-Jewish section.

• Wilfred Canter (pilot) of Toronto; Willy Fisher (navigator) of Winnipeg; Fred Stevenson (co-pilot) of Vancouver. The three RCAF veterans served in 103 Squadron. During a night supply run to Sdom on Oct. 24, 1948, their C-47 exploded in the air after an engine caught fire. Canter and Fisher are buried in Rehovot. Stevenson is buried in Haifa Military Cemetery, non-Jewish section.

• Ralph Moster (pilot) of Vancouver. Killed Dec. 7, 1948, with three others when their Grumman Widgeon crashed into the Sea of Galilee during a training flight. Buried in Nachlat Itzhak.

Searching for her brother

I am seeking assistance in determining the fate of my brother, Yisrael Joseph (Utchi) Baras, who lived in Montreal from 1948 to 1951. He moved to Toronto in 1952, after which we lost contact. It is possible that he may have left Canada for Detroit, Chicago, Philadelphia, New York or New Jersey. He was born in Tet, Hungary, on March 27, 1928, and survived Auschwitz, Dachau and other concentration camps. I would be extremely grateful for any assistance in tracing this long-lost brother.

The religious value of Yom Ha'atzmaut

Rabbi Mordechai Torczyner

Long before the United Nations' vote of November 1947 and David Ben-Gurion's declaration of the following May, much of the Torah-observant Jewish world was skeptical regarding the significance of a secular Jewish state. Could "secular Jewish" be anything other than an oxymoron? How would Judaism fare under a government composed of people who were often indifferent to religious law? And, as with every other entity in the known universe, the ultimate question was asked: would it be good for the Jews?

Even Rabbi Abraham Isaac HaCohen Kook, champion of religious-secular co-operation, insisted on the ultimate religious character of the state he envisioned. As an alternative to the Hatikvah anthem, with its hope "lihyot am chofshi b'artzeinu" – to be a free people in our land – Rav Kook composed HaEmunah, a song that dreamed "lashuv el eretz kodsheinu," to return to our holy land. Rav Kook believed that secular administration could contribute toward the ultimate rejuvenation of the Jewish nation in its land, but would be nothing more than an interim stage in the journey toward our national destiny.

This rejection of secular government has led some to argue that Yom Ha'atzmaut, the anniversary of the establishment of that secular government in Israel, is not to be accepted as a religious holiday. However, the weight of Jewish tradition insists that despite its secular character, the fact of independence – the ability of Jews to live in, develop and govern the land of Israel – is worthy of religious celebration and gratitude to God.

There are at least three reasons for this celebration.

First, we celebrate our independence for the safety it brings. Not for millenia has the viability of the Jewish nation seemed so strong. While the theory that the creation of a Jewish state would eliminate antisemitism has proved incorrect, Jews living on their own soil are still best suited to defend themselves. The pogroms of Kishinev, the Inquisitions of Europe and the Klansmen of North America are impotent ghosts to a country with a Jewish majority.

The sages of the Talmud (Rosh Hashanah 18b) saw religious meaning in this safety, ruling that most of the ritual fasts observed in our exile are suspended in "a time of peace." The 11th-century commentator Rashi explained that "a time of peace" refers to a time when "the hand of the nations has no power over Israel." (It's noteworthy that 13th-century Nachmanides understood this differently, arguing that "peace" refers to the time of the restoration of the Temple in Jerusalem.)

Rabbi Meshulam Roth, who emigrated from Romania to Israel in 1949, underscored the religious significance of our safety when he wrote of Israel's Independence Day (Responsa Kol Mevaser 1:21), "Here is redemption from slavery to freedom, in that we were redeemed from enslavement to become free, we achieved independent government, and we were saved from death into life, saved from the hands of enemies who stood against us to destroy us. We are obligated to establish a holiday!"

Second, we celebrate the opportunity to dwell within our own boundaries, as a majority, and so evolve a true Jewish identity as a community. As much as our globalized culture and economy have rendered borders porous, neither Internet meme nor multimedia fad can trump the card of physical proximity in shaping the independent identity of a community. A contiguous nation develops its own memes and fads, and on a deeper level its own morals and ideals, via the vectors of neighbourhood, school, workplace and shared experience.

The Torah itself declares the importance of physical separation for our evolution. One of the messages sent to the Jewish people via the prophet Balaam (Numbers 23) blessed them as "am l'vadad yishkon," a nation that dwells alone. The sages sought to encourage this separation, enacting dietary laws as well as Shabbat restrictions that would encourage Jews to occupy unique physical space.

This vision of separate community is not a philosophy of chauvinistic denigration of the other, or xenophobia, but a positive wish for physical and social space in which to evolve an identity of our own. As Asher Ginsberg, a.k.a. Achad Ha'am, wrote in 1909, "A complete national life involves two things: first, full play for the creative faculties of the nation in a specific national culture of its own, and, second, a system of education whereby the individual members of the nation will be thoroughly imbued with that culture, and so moulded by it that its imprint will be recognizable in all their way of life and thought, individual and social." Certainly, Ginsberg's vision of a "specific national culture" did not include religion – but the principle applies to any attempt to mould a nation's identity, and so the opportunity to occupy our own space and reap the religious benefits is cause for worshipful gratitude.

נֶפֶשׁ יְהוּדִי הוֹמִיָּה.
וּלְפַאֲתֵי מִזְרָח קָדִימָה

לִהְיוֹת עַם חָפְשִׁי בְּאַרְצֵנוּ,
אֶרֶץ צִיּוֹן וִירוּשָׁלַיִם.

Hatikvah, Israel's national anthem

Third, we celebrate the opportunity to develop the Land of Israel itself. Long before the legal and medical professions captured the imaginations of Jewish parents, tilling the soil, planting seeds and reaping a harvest were considered virtuous trades and the province of "nice Jewish boys."

God placed Adam in Eden "to work it and to protect it," and although the Sages have identified layers of meaning in the text, rabbis such as 11th-century writer Rabbeinu Bahya ibn Paquda insisted that the text also retains its literal meaning, that Adam was meant to work the soil of the Garden. Many of our biblical role models worked the land, and we were biblically blessed (Deuteronomy 11), "If you will listen to My commandments... you will gather your grain, wine and oil."

Certainly, farming the soil of our ancestral land involves explicit religious value as we fulfil the various commandments of tithing, gleaning and observing the Sabbatical cycle. Moreover, working the earth is praised as honest labour that carries inherent virtues. King David said (Psalms 128), "When you eat the labour of your hands, you are fortunate, and it is good for you."

Rabbi Eliezer Waldenberg, a leading Israeli authority in Jewish Law in the late 20th century, included agronomy as a religious factor in a long responsum encouraging aliyah to Israel (Tzitz Eliezer 7:48:12). He wrote, "There is also the mitzvah of working the land in Israel. The value of establishing settlement by working the land, for those who benefit from the labour of their hands, should not be light in anyone's eyes... If working the land, in general, is known as the choicest of labours and trades in that it is generally clean of elements of theft and harming others and similar improprieties, then in the Holy Land these actions of 'to work it and to protect it' are, themselves, mitzvah actions."

Certainly, we have many more reasons to be grateful for the return of Jews to Israel. Many thousands of Jews live Torah-observant lives, and even spend their days in Torah study (often funded by the Israeli government, the single-largest sponsor of Torah study in the world) in Israel. The Land of Israel provides an on-going resource for renewed Jewish identity for thousands of Jewish teens each year. Many mitzvot can be fulfilled only in Israel.

But regarding the specific question of whether a religious Jew can celebrate the founding of a secular state, these three reasons – safety, community and the opportunity to develop the Land of Israel – make Yom Ha'atzmaut, Israel's Independence Day, a day for every Torah-observant Jew to rejoice.

Rabbi Mordechai Torczyner is rosh beit midrash for the Yeshiva University Torah MiTzion Beit Midrash Zichron Dov in Toronto, a Torah centre in the religious Zionist tradition. He can be reached at torczyner@gmail.com.

Tears mingled with joy

In my last column, I wrote about the contrasts and similarities between the two holidays of Purim and Pesach. Once again, I wish to speak about two holidays that stand in close proximity: Yom Hazikaron and Yom Ha'atzmaut.

Placing Yom Hazikaron, the day of remembering, just before Independence Day, sets apart sombre remembrance from the celebratory mood of Israel's birthday.

Nearly 23,000 soldiers and fighters (many before the state was born) and 4,000 civilian victims of terror have died creating and protecting Israel. Their memory informs Yom Hazikaron and the two minutes of silence observed throughout Israel that, as Lawrence Durrell writes in another context, "commemorate an irremediable failure of the human will."It's a failure that has cost so many thousands of lives.

Jean M. Gerber

in Vancouver

Ther's another poignant quote mounted at the site of the 9/11 memorial in Washington, D.C., from Virgil's Aeneid (itself a book of bloodshed) that applies here: "No day shall erase you from the memory of time ."

How true is it that their memories will be daily on our minds? Sadly, probably not every day. Indeed, as we survey the prevalence of warfare in our world, we see how badly our human will to peace has failed.

But some days stand out.

Soon after the 1973 war, I was visiting a neighbour in Jerusalem. A knock came at the door, and two young (so young!) soldiers stood in the doorway. She graciously ushered them in, and they presented her with medals from the army honouring her oldest son, who had died in the Yom Kippur War. I was speechless. When they left, she pointed to another set on the shelf: her husband had died in the 1967 war.

What horrible failure had taken these two precious, unique lives? Yet she loved the state that they all had paid for so dearly.

That year, following the '73 war, we saw whole congregations rise when Yizkor was recited for the fallen: no family was untouched (another neighbour had also lost a son). There are no words.

Passing from Yom Hazikaron to Yom Ha'atzmaut brings us from tears to gladness and rejoicing. Can the human spirit pass so quickly from one state to another?

While we're not commanded to hasten from this mourning to joy, there are times when we're commanded to commit to an emotion: we're commanded to love God, even at times when it's the farthest thing from our minds. We're commanded to rejoice on Simchat Torah, a very difficult thing to do when destruction threatens.

So are we commanded to rejoice on Yom Ha'atzmaut? No, but we are expected to move from contemplating some of the darkest moments of our people and then, as sunset comes on the close of Yom Hazikaron, pass into joyous celebration of the rebirth of Israel after 2,000 years of exile. That's quite a feat of psychic legerdemain.

Centuries ago, the prophet was asked, "Can these bones live?" The answer then was yes. Despite destruction and exile, the bones, the People of Israel, returned to Zion and rebuilt not only the ruined Temple but their lives as well. A second destruction followed, but this time, no benevolent monarch allowed a second return.

Centuries later, Jews, reeling from the destruction of one-third of its people, still insisted "These bones shall live!" Today, they do once again.

What an incredible undertaking: to recreate a language restricted for centuries to scholarly commentaries while dozens of vernaculars were the daily speech of Jews across the globe. What an amazing resurrection, a knitting together of those dry bones, so that Israel can have police officers and thieves, athletes and preachers, scholars and dustmen.

The Israeli constitution leans very heavily on a prophetic mission.

"The State of Israel... will promote the development of the country for all its inhabitants; will be based on the precepts of liberty, justice and peace taught by the Hebrew prophets; will uphold the full social and political equality of all its citizens, without distinction of race, creed or sex; will guarantee full freedom of conscience, worship, education and culture."

It's a big task we as Jews have set ourselves, one that's often lost in the struggle for Israel's very existence.

But on these days, we remember together and celebrate together, tears mingled with joy.

Our glass is more than half full

This column is dedicated to all those pessimists who think the Jewish nation is frail and in danger from omnipresent enemies.

From my vantage point, things are looking good for the Jews, especially in terms of the North American Diaspora. I know we should bewail our exilic condition, especially in the season of Passover and Yom Ha'atzmaut, when we remember Zion. We ought to pine for Israel, but we live here and should admit that things are good and vibrant. Two examples should suffice.

In North America today, there are more Jews studying Judaic texts than ever before: more than in the time of Moses, more than in the time of Maimonides, and more than were studied in any yeshiva in Europe. This fact represents an incredible reality: a growth in text-based learning and commitment to Jewish knowledge in the modern Jewish world. It also represents an advance in Jewish communal development that belies any negative assessment. For the first time in history Jewish education has been democratized. Boys and girls, men and women, rich and poor, all have access to some form, some level, of Jewish learning. That unheralded fact points to our successful quiet revolution.

Some of these North American schools, programs and teachers are incredibly creative. There are new curricula and old-style Chumash and Rashi courses. Hebrew is being spoken, and so is Yiddish. Some even sing in Ladino. Jewish studies in the universities is blossoming, as is the publication of books on Jewish topics. Growth and creativity are normative.

On the other hand, there are, of course, problems, most notably the high cost of Jewish education. But problems don't efface the impact of this innovative moment.

Jewish growth and healthy adaptation to modernity is keenly seen in the world of kosher food. Sue Fishkoff's Kosher Nation opens an interesting window into the billion-dollar business of keeping Jews well fed. She reports that people who search for kosher food spend $12.5 billion per year, while across the United States, consumers spend approximately $200 billion on kosher food every year. Clearly that is a major investment and a significant one. To begin with, we must consider the incredible expansion and diversity of kosher food. Once the sole provenance of targeted companies such as Manishewitz, the industry now supports products as public as Hellman's mayonnaise and Heinz ketchup. There's a vast complex of companies, with more than 200 factories in China alone producing ingredients that go into final products, all of which must receive kosher certification. Crazy as it sounds to some of us, Oreos are kosher!

In order to support this vast economy, companies rely on product interest from Jews and non-Jews. Kashrut is no longer the domain only of kosher-seeking Orthodox Jews. Some seek it out because of allergies, while others believe it's healthier or in some ways cleaner or purer. But the point of this phenomenon is that North American Jews are increasingly factored into the food market economy: they represent a powerful consumer element. If the kosher consumer gets upset, companies listen, as Stella D'oro and Duncan Hines found out.

Norma Baumel Joseph

in Montreal

Thus, the eating practice that was initiated to separate Jews from their neighbours may now unite them or integrate them into North American praxis. Notably, kosher food is a growth industry on all counts and signifies good news, upending any prophecy of doom. We have eaten our way into Eden. There are more kosher products in stores than my grandmother could ever have imagined (or eaten). Kashrut is a vast and complex industry serving and reflecting a community that is intricate and diverse. We are a vibrant, healthy, well-fed "kosher nation." And our influence is expanding, not waning.

We may do things differently, but we're not dead. In 1964, Look magazine predicted the death of the American Jewish community by 2000. Others prophesied the demise of Orthodoxy. But Look magazine went bankrupt and Orthodoxy is an ever-growing and lively – if contentious – sector of the Jewish world.

It's time for prophets of doom to quit. I'm not advising turning a blind eye to enemies, but it's time to stop being afraid.

We have problems, but things are good and emergent. And then there's Israel: a thriving, resilient country, growing and strong. It has battles, internal and external, but Israel is our partner.

Let's eat and study together.

The Jewish Film Festival is back

The Toronto Jewish Film Festival, the single most important cultural event of the year in the Jewish community, is off and running again. This year's version runs from May 7 to 15 and features an astonishing variety of documentaries and feature films. I was particularly struck by four of the films, all dealing, directly or indirectly, with the Holocaust, an event seared into our consciousness.

Before Nazi death camps in Poland like Auschwitz, Treblinka and Sobibor began working furiously to exterminate European Jews, German paramilitary mobile killing squads, known as Einsatzgruppen, spearheaded Germany's diabolical campaign to consummate the Final Solution. They killed one million people in Russia, Ukraine, Belarus and the Baltic states. The victims were mainly Jews but also Roma and Soviet prisoners of war.

Einsatzgruppen: The Death Brigades (May 13 at 1 p.m. at the Bloor Cinema), a French documentary directed by Michael Prazan, is an exhaustive examination of the antecedents, ideology and lethal work of these cold-blooded killers, who were pressed into service in Germany's first organized attempt at mass murder. This shattering film, 180 minutes in length, consists of graphic file footage and interviews with witnesses, executioners and survivors.

Formed prior to the war under the direction of SS Obergruppenfuhrer Reinhard Heydrich, the Einsatzgruppen were unleashed after Germany's invasion of the Soviet Union in 1941. They were charged with the task of ethnic cleansing in what the Nazi leadership deemed as a war of annihilation against Jews and communism.

Deployed into four groups and attached to army units, they comprised 3,000 members from the SS, police forces, local volunteers and Soviet prisoners of war, all led and supervised by highly educated thugs like Otto Ohlendorf and Artur Nebe, who considered Jews sub-humans.

Fortified by extra rations of vodka, the murderers left a grisly trail of death in places such as the Ponary forest, Kaunas, Babi Yar and Minsk, inciting pogroms and shooting and gassing Jews. Although they robotically followed their orders to the letter, some of the killers fell into the slough of depression and quit. Still others, empowered by their duties, actually enjoyed the thrill of the hunt.

When the Einsatzgruppen were no longer required, having been rendered redundant by the network of extermination camps, they were ordered to erase the evidence at mass graves. Jewish prisoners exhumed and burned the corpses before they were killed themselves.

The clinical testimonies of the witnesses, executioners and survivors are nothing less than chilling. "They had to die," says a Lithuanian killer of the Jews. "They knew death was inescapable. They went bravely."

Adolf Eichmann, a high-ranking Gestapo functionary who symbolized the banality of evil during the Holocaust, is at the core of Raymond Ley's German-Israeli co-production, Eichmann's End: Love, Betrayal, Death (May 9 at 1:45 p.m. at the Al Green Theatre and May 10 at 4:30 p.m. at the Cineplex Odeon Sheppard Centre).

Jan Karski

Tasked with exterminating the Jews of Hungary, Eichmann slipped out of Germany after the war and found refuge in Argentina under the name of Ricardo Klement. The West German secret police was aware of his whereabouts but kept the information to itself.

The Mossad, Israel's external intelligence agency, stumbled upon his hiding place when Lothar Hermann, a German Holocaust survivor living in Buenos Aires, discovered that his daughter, Silvia, was dating Eichmann's son, Nick.

Hermann informed the German authorities and they, in turn, tipped off Israel. On May 21, 1960, a drugged Eichmann was smuggled aboard an El Al plane bound for Tel Aviv. In a show trial in Jerusalem, he was convicted of mass murder. After his execution, his ashes were scattered in the Mediterranean Sea.

Eichmann's End is a docudrama based on extensive interviews with Eichmann conducted by Willem Sassen, a pro-Nazi Dutch journalist, in Buenos Aires in 1957. Eichmann consented to the secret interviews, published in Life magazine three years later, because he wanted his version of events to colour the history of his role the war. Ley integrates the revealing interviews – in which Eichmann portrayed himself as an honourable man and a proud German nationalist ready to carry out any order – into Silvia's fairly brief relationship with Nick. To this he adds additional interviews. Rafi Eitan, the Mossad agent who had a hand in Eichmann's kidnapping, recalls the abduction. Gabriel Bach, the assistant prosecutor at the Eichmann trial, makes interesting observations.

It's a fine film, throbbing with deception, intrigue and vengeance.

In 1978, the French film director Claude Lanzmann interviewed Jan Karski, a courier for the Polish government-in-exile during World War II. Having visited the Warsaw Ghetto and the Belzec death camp, Karski was one of the first eyewitnesses to alert the Allies about the Holocaust. In The Karski Report (May 12 at 8 p.m. at the Al Green Theatre), a riveting film, this courageous and passionate Pole recalls memorable meetings with Franklin Roosevelt, the president of the United States, and with Felix Frankfurter, a U.S. Supreme Court justice.

Roosevelt, having heard Karski's account of the dire and deteriorating situation in Poland, promised to punish war criminals after the war. Soon afterward, Roosevelt asked Karski to pass on his report to Jewish community leaders and U.S. government officials. Strangely enough, Frankfurter did not believe that wholesale massacres of Jews were taking place in Poland. He simply could not wrap his head around the Holocaust.

Karski, a somewhat theatrical figure given to dramatic pauses and stares, admits that the Holocaust was incomprehensible and that its full implications cannot be grasped. He then falls into a reverie that is bound to leave viewers in an unsettled state of mind.

David De Jongh's Otto Frank, Father of Anne (May 10 at 1 p.m. at the Bloor Cinema and May 11 at 6:30 p.m. at the Cineplex Odeon Sheppard Centre) poignantly explores the painful and lengthy process in which Anne Frank's father – a German patriot and a German army officer in World War I – came to terms with her untimely death and turned her expressive diary into one of the most important documents of the Holocaust.

Returning to Amsterdam in 1945, Frank, a sad and solitary figure, read her diary and found it moving. A Dutch publisher then convinced him it was worthy of publication. The film charts the diary's publication into foreign languages, its transformation into a Broadway play and a Hollywood movie and Frank's decision to establish a foundation in Anne's honour to combat racism and prejudice.

Couple aids kids with neurological disorders

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Dana and Jared Florence weren't looking for recognition when they started their charity Three To Be. They were hoping to help find for a cure for cerebral palsy (CP), the neurological disorder that afflicts their triplets – Cole, Taylor and Brody.

Nevertheless, after three years of fundraising for research into the disorder, the Florences will receive the Canadian Friends of Meir Medical Center Israel's medal of merit at a gala next month, in honour of their work raising awareness about the disorder in children.

The Florence children were all diagnosed with CP at 10 months of age.

Israel's Meir Hospital serves about 800,000 people in and around Tel Aviv and is currently fundraising to expand its children's hospital and its pediatric health initiatives.

Since the birth of their children three years ago, the Florences have become passionate advocates for research into treatment and therapy for children's neurological disorders.

They've partnered with a team of medical doctors and researchers at two Toronto hospitals: SickKids and Holland Bloorview Kids Rehabilitation Hospital, and they hope to eventually benefit from the experience of doctors at Meir Hospital as well.

Arie Raif, president of the Canadian Friends of Meir Medical Center, said once he heard about the Florences from a friend, he knew he wanted his foundation to honour their achievements.

The medal of merit is given annually to "people, who, by their own contributions, help advance the cause of humanity," Raif said, adding that he couldn't think of more worthy recipients.

The Florence family from left, Taylor, Dana, Cole, Jared and Brody.

Facing a diagnosis that would have devastated other parents, the Florences instead used their experience to effect a positive change in the world, Raif said.

Since giving birth, Dana has become a stay-at-home mom, leaving a career as a day school teacher to focus on her children's needs. In the process, she's almost singlehandedly changed the landscape for parents caring for children with neurological disorders.

In addition to looking after the kids, she also handles the day-to-day operations of Three To Be, which is on the cusp of receiving charitable status from the Canada Revenue Agency, she said.

After her children were diagnosed, Dana, 29, said she and Jared only wanted to know what they could do to help their kids overcome their disorder.

"I wanted to know what was out there in terms of a cure," she said. "I noticed a lot of adult-oriented research [on CP], but not much for kids. Why? Because there was no money, no voice for kids suffering from neurological disorders."

That's when the Florences decided to become that voice. With Jared's background as an event producer, the couple decided to start planning an annual fundraising gala.

Their inaugural Stems of Hope fundraising event was held in September last year and was attended by more than 800 people.

It raised almost $500,000 and featured appearances by Global TV's Leslie Roberts and Anne Mroczkowski and TSN's Michael Landsberg among others.

Earlier this year, Three To Be held its Kids Care Fair to raise more funds. And Dana and Jared are planning their 2nd annual Stems of Hope event scheduled to take place Sept. 24 at the Koolhaus in Toronto.

The Florences are using funds raised to go toward the purchase of a Robotic Lokomat Pro for the Holland Bloorview Kids Rehabilitation Hospital. The Lokomat is a kind of repetitive walking machine that will be used to conduct a large, randomized cross-over research trial to evaluate improvements in walking in children with cerebral palsy who use robot-assisted gait training, the Florences said.

The Lokomat may also help children learn how to walk and gain independence, "the greatest gift for any child with motor impairment," according to the Three To Be Facebook site.

The Florences said the machine costs $500,000, and Holland Bloorview will need another $500,000 to staff and run the Lokomat program for a three-year term.

To date, the money raised from Three To Be's activities has also helped pay for SickKids to hire a team of six researchers to study children's neurological disorders.

Florences to receive Meir Medical Center's medal of merit

Dana and Jared have both gained perspective on what's important in life.

Their first advice for other parents raising children with neurological disorders, they said, is to never give up on the kids.

"No matter what prognoses the doctors give you, don't give up on them," Dana said, citing numerous sessions with doctors who said her kids would never reach various developmental milestones that they have all reached.

"Parents look at Three To Be as a symbol of hope and to remember not to give up. And they look at Dana as an ambassador for this cause," Jared said.

In the meantime, the Florences are modest about their Meir Medical Center award.

"We're not looking to get medals," Jared said.

Dana concurred, adding: "Being alongside [this year's other Medal of Merit award recipients], Liberal MP Joe Volpe and [orthopedic surgeon] Dr. Allan Gross, is such an honour. We're touched by it."

The Meir Hospital Israel Medal of Merit Awards ceremony will take place on June 29 at the Westin Prince Hotel. For more information, visit www.meirfriends.com.

Fatah-Hamas unity deal won't lead to peace

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Last Tuesday (April 27), when Fatah and Hamas made their surprise announcement about having reached a unity agreement in Cairo, Reuters initially reported the following: "Restoring Palestinian unity is seen as crucial to reviving any prospect for a Palestinian state based on peaceful coexistence alongside Israel. Fatah, the mainstream Palestinian movement until a 2006 election victory by Hamas, backs negotiated peace but the Islamists reject it."

What is also surprising is how thoroughly these two sentences contradict each other. But this is no mere slip of the pen. Rather, it's very revealing of a state of confusion, if not bewilderment, that has long affected key elements of the media whose primary task is to accurately describe events – in this case, about internal Palestinian affairs and ultimately the "peace process."

The passage above indicates that Palestinian statehood depends on both Palestinian unity and peace with Israel. Yet readers are then told that only one party to that unity, Fatah, supports peace while the other, Hamas, rejects it. What sort of "unity" is this? It makes no sense. Still, the effort to reconcile the irreconcilable, to make it appear that contradictions somehow cohere, is not all that rare a phenomenon.

At bottom, though, there's only one part of that passage that's true: the Islamists reject peace (negotiated or otherwise) with Israel. Mahmoud Zahar, the senior Hamas official who participated in the Cairo talks with Fatah, declared: "Our program does not include negotiations with Israel or recognizing it... It will not be possible for the interim national government to participate or bet on or work on the peace process with Israel."

Then again, Fatah, too, has been rejecting a negotiated peace with Israel, while trying to make Israel appear to be the recalcitrant party. Furthermore, contrary to what Reuters wrote, the "prospect" for a Palestinian state these days – foremost, having the UN General Assembly recognize such a state this September – is "based" not on peace with Israel, but on its absence, and in violation, let's not forget, of internationally accepted agreements.

So, indeed, the Reuters statement of "fact" is a total mess, but it's worth repeating that it nicely captures the utterly confused state of affairs that prevails today. Take just one other example, among many others: in "Hamas, Fatah, set to end rift," April 27, a cbc.ca report stated that "Restoring unity between the two sides is seen as a necessary precursor to any rapprochement between Palestinians and the State of Israel."

The CBC did then note Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's claim that "the Palestinian Authority must choose either peace with Israel or peace with Hamas. There is no possibility for peace with both." Nonetheless, it failed to explain how the Hamas-Fatah unity agreement can conceivably lead to "rapprochement" with Israel.

Netanyahu had been under increasing pressure, both domestically and internationally, to initiate a plan to try to pre-empt the Palestinians' statehood gambit at the UN. The Fatah-Hamas unity agreement may very well reduce, if not eliminate, the pressure. At least for some, that is. For those who fail or refuse to acknowledge the contradiction in this "unity," Netanyahu might still be expected to strike a "deal" with the Palestinians.

Aluf Benn, the highly respected editor-at-large for Ha'aretz who has become increasingly critical of Netanyahu for not seizing the initiative from Abbas, acknowledged in an April 28 column that a unity deal involving the rejectionist Hamas indeed removes the pressure on Netanyahu. "As for Netanyahu," Benn wrote, "the Palestinian reconciliation deal justifies his warnings that any territory vacated by Israel will fall into Hamas hands and become an Iranian terror base. It strikes any proposals for interim agreements and unilateral withdrawals, intended to appease the world, off the agenda."

Benn is far from pleased about this, but it's not something that Netanyahu alone maintains. Rather, the lethal Hamas-Iranian connection (along with Fatah's weakness in the West Bank) is an undeniable reality that the international community must finally wake up to.

Dentist committed to helping kids in Israel

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Toronto dentist Richard Nurgitz is an award-winning competitive amateur cyclist who has taken part in fundraising bike rides for the Canadian Cancer Society and Beit Halochem, among other organizations.

He's also a musician who plays viola with the York Region-based York Symphony Orchestra and once considered a professional career in music.

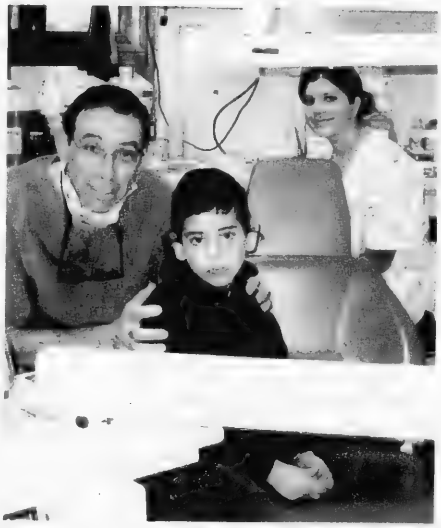
But the new chair of Canadian Dental Volunteers for Israel (DVI) says that relieving pain for young patients as a volunteer dentist at Jerusalem's Trudi Birger Dental Clinic, where the DVI program is housed, is "probably the most rewarding experience" he has ever had.

Nurgitz – a Winnipeg native who moved to Toronto with his family at 16 and graduated in dentistry from the University of Toronto in 1973 – visited the DVI clinic for the first time eight years ago. He and his wife, Naomi, were in Israel on a Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue mission at the time.

On a free day, he arranged to visit the clinic, and offered to help if they could use him. He spent the day working there, and was so taken by the experience that he decided to return annually to volunteer for two to three weeks at a stretch.

On a recent trip, Nurgitz treated a young girl who needed such extensive dental work, including multiple root canals, that he didn't think it could be completed in a timely manner by DVI volunteers.

"Her front teeth were so badly broken down that I felt unless she has teeth that look nice, how's she going to smile?" he said. "How's she going to feel good about herself?"



Richard Nurgitz, left, with a young patient at the DVI clinic.

He began to investigate whether it would be possible to bring her to Toronto for an extended stay, to have the work completed here. The logistics were daunting, and he was happy that a colleague in Israel took on her case instead.

But Nurgitz is still thinking about the possibility of extending the DVI program to Toronto for similar cases. In addition to helping kids, he said, it would give local dentists who can't travel to Israel an opportunity to help Israeli youngsters too.

Among his other ideas for DVI Canada are a charity bike ride and a dental lecture series that can double as a fundraiser and also raise awareness of the program.

DVI Canada is affiliated with the Jewish dental fraternity Alpha Omega (AO), in which Nurgitz has also been active. AO also organizes educational lectures, but is not part of DVI.

Nurgitz, who took over the chairmanship from Irv Petroff in March, said that DVI, together with AO, has raised between $50,000 and $60,000 a year for the clinic, which has an operating capital of $500,000 (US).

The budget is "pretty lean, considering they have 15 to 17 part-time employees and a pediatric dentist who's in charge," Nurgitz said.

A staff hygienist educates families about nutrition and oral care, while up to five dentists at a time work on patients. The dental equipment is modern and comparable to what you would find here, he added.

Volunteer dentists from more than 20 countries work at the clinic, which provides free dental care for children in the Jerusalem area whose families cannot afford treatment. The patients, who are referred by the city's social welfare service, range in age from 5 to 18, and come from a variety of religious and ethnic backgrounds.

Last year, just over a dozen of the dentists were from Canada.

"It's a wonderful program," said Nurgitz. "We need to promote it more."

Hoops provide hope for Israeli youth

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

More than $83,000 was raised at this year's Hoops 4 Israel, a basketball tournament created by young adults for young adults.

Since Hoops 4 Israel director Dave Goodman founded the event five years ago, almost $540,000 has been raised for the low-income and unemployed citizens of Bat Yam.

Sponsored by RioCan, the tournament took place April 24 at the HoopDome in Downsview Park.

More than 100 players, 12 organizing committee members and 70 volunteers helped make this year's tournament a success, Goodman said.

"Hoops demonstrates that young Jews in their 20s and early 30s are capable, and ready to take a more active role in leading our community, supporting Israel and influencing their peers to do so as well."

In Bat Yam, Israel's fastest-growing Ethiopian community, 60 per cent of men age 45 to 64 are unemployed, and 40 per cent of young people are considered at-risk. Many of the children are lacking language skills and basic education.

The money raised by Hoops 4 Israel helps fund strategic initiatives implemented by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto to support the citizens of Bat Yam.

"The funds will go toward before and after school programs, with components of sports, recreation and arts to keep kids off the streets and [will] provide them with supplemental meals," Goodman said.

"We are also trying to allocate some of our funds for vocational programs for Ethiopian adult immigrants, to make it easier for them to obtain work and provide for their families."

Hoops 4 Israel funds programs that teach leadership and teamwork skills to the young people enrolled, Goodman said. This leads to better grades in school and zero drop-out rates among high school students.

"We are hoping to enhance the overall family unit... in Bat Yam, and while the future of the community relies on the children, the present relies on the older siblings and adults," said Daniel Winberg, a Hoops 4 Israel volunteer chair.

"Hoops is an important event because we have found a way for young Jewish students and young professionals to support a great cause and at the same time enjoy doing it," Winberg said.

The tournament unites the Jewish community, Goodman said. "It makes a statement, not just in fundraising success, but in standing with the State of Israel. We have grown our volunteer organizing committee and have turned it into an efficient process. We have also fostered great relations with sponsoring companies and participants alike."

Winberg said sports and fundraising go well together. "Many hands make light work. The best teams, both on the fundraising and the overall achievement level, are those that utilize each member's maximum potential."

This year, Hoops 4 Israel invited high school students to participate in the tournament. "We believe that their involvement is crucial, moving forward. We really like the idea of students in Toronto supporting students in Bat Yam, as it's a cause that they can really relate to," Winberg said.

Goodman said Hoops 4 Israel is now operating at carbon neutral and creating great awareness of running a large scale event with strong environmental standards.

The Yizkor prayer

Rabbi Moshe Stern

Yizkor, which, in Hebrew, means remembrance, is a memorial prayer within Jewish liturgy. Believed to have originated as part of the prayer service during the period of the Crusades, its earliest mention can be found in Machzor Vitry, authorized by the 11th-century talmudist, Rabbi Simcha Ben Shmuel of Vitry (d. 1105).

Originally this prayer was recited only on Yom Kippur based on this sentence at the end of Parshat Shoftim: "Atone for Your people Israel, whom You have redeemed." Our sages teach that the first half of this sentence refers to the "living" and the second half to the "dead." The reference to the "dead" as being "redeemed" reminds us of the soul's immortality. Furthermore, it makes clear that part of our belief system includes the understanding of reward and punishment, in that reward is manifested in "closeness to HaShem" and punishment in "distance from HaShem."

The current custom is to recite the Yizkor prayer four times a year: on Yom Kippur, Sukkot (Shmini Atzeret), the last day of Passover and the second day of Shavuot.

Although the soul can no longer do good deeds after death, it can still receive great merit through the charity and good deeds of the living. Therefore, the Yizkor service includes a pledge to give to charity in memory of the soul for whom the prayer is being recited. It is important to act upon this pledge, or the words become meaningless and can have a detrimental effect on the soul of the deceased.

The following are some halachot (Jewish law) about the Yizkor service:

- Praying with the community is preferred and provides shared comfort in each other's loss.

Rabbinic Reflections

A minyan is not required and the Yizkor service may be recited in privacy by those unable to get to the synagogue.

- There is a custom in some congregations wherein those blessed with both parents leave the synagogue during the Yizkor service. There might be an element of superstition in this custom and thus it is not universally practised. Many congregations recite the memorial prayer (K'El Maleh Rachamim) for those murdered in the Shoah and for those who died in defence of Israel, with everyone present.
- There is a common misconception that during the first year of mourning, Yizkor is not recited and mourners leave the synagogue. It is true that during the first year, when the wounds are fresh and the loss felt intently, one might not be able to control oneself and might disturb the prayers of others. Perhaps such people might wish to leave the synagogue. Generally, however, Yizkor is recited the first year, for it serves as an atonement for the deceased, especially during the first year of judgment.
- Yizkor is usually recited for those we are obligated to recite Kaddish for: parents, spouse, siblings, children. However, one may say Yizkor for any relatives who have no one to recite Yizkor on their behalf.
- It is the custom when Yizkor is recited to light a yahrzeit candle in memory of the departed. If a candle is not available or permitted, an electric lamp may be used.

Rabbi Moshe Stern is the spiritual leader of Shaarei Tefillah Congregation in Toronto.

Two sides of the same coin

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

In watching the recent leadership debate, I was struck that, regardless of the question or issue being discussed, Prime Minister Stephen Harper would talk about the economy and Liberal leader Michael Ignatieff would talk about the moral obligation to respect Parliament.

Unfortunately, ethics and the economy were presented as two distinct issues. There are fewer more basic messages of the Torah than that of morality and the economy being two sides of the same coin. There are more mitzvot – approximately 130 out of 613 – on the topic of money than on any other subject. And this link pertains both on the level of private business and national economic policy.

True faith in God is demonstrated by our monetary dealings. A person who believes in God doesn't cut moral corners to accumulate wealth. It's not by chance that our rabbis equated faith with farming, the economic engine of the ancient world. The entire enterprise of farming is dependent on faith. Without faith that nature will cooperate and reward one's efforts, one would be silly to work so hard with no guaranteed return. This faith in nature must be matched by faith that honesty and integrity will produce the greatest of yields. "Man does not live by bread alone."

Similarly our national economic policies reflect the moral strength of a nation. It seems from what the pollsters tell us that Canadians have yet to fully grasp the link between economics and morality. Polls show that by a ratio of approximately two to one, Canadians are more concerned with economic issues than ethical ones relating to the running of Parliament. This is quite understandable as we struggle to recover from a severe economic downturn.

Yet, at the same time, such results should raise serious concerns, not just because it would seem – and I hope I'm incorrect in this inference – that too many show a greater concern for money over morality, but because too few see the link between the two.

I'd like to believe that many, though not all, of our policy disagreements are rooted in tactics, not goals. I would think that all our leaders want strong corporate growth, tax relief for families, better health care and for Canada to take a leadership role in the world. But, unfortunately, in the real world, not all can be done at the same time. In addition to setting priorities, often there are fundamental disagreements about the best way to reach the same goal. This is something we most readily see with the sharp disagreements regarding the Arab-Israeli conflict. Largely they reflect not who desires peace more – this supreme value is something that is axiomatic to Judaism and is shared by almost all – but rather what method will produce the best chance for peace.

Unfortunately, such moral focus is so often absent when others discuss the Mideast conflict. On this issue, there seems to be a very real moral divide among the political parties.

When the debating ends and the governing begins, it's crucial that the highest moral standards be the cornerstone of our economic policy. If that can happen, the Canadian people will be the true winners.

Sermons that can inspire us all

Martin Lockshin

Rabbi Norman Lamm has had an illustrious career over the past six decades as a thinker, writer and spokesman for what he calls centrist Orthodox Judaism. He served as the rabbi of two major Orthodox synagogues in New York City until 1976, when he became the president of Yeshiva University (YU). He left that position in 2003, but he remained at YU and today is its chancellor.

Rabbi Lamm's writings have touched many lives, including my own. He was the founding editor of Tradition magazine, which used to be seen as the leading (and for awhile the only) intellectual publication for American modern Orthodox thought. An essay that he published in Tradition in 1967, Faith and Doubt, was later expanded into an important book that was reprinted and revised twice, most recently in 2006. His small book, A Hedge of Roses: Jewish Insights Into Marriage (1977), defending and justifying the traditional Jewish rules of "family purity" (i.e. married couples abstaining from sexual activity at points in the wife's menstrual cycle), is a model for thoughtful, gentle apologetics.

Rabbi Lamm has now published his second volume of collected sermons. (A number of the sermons are also available for free on the web.) This latest volume, Festivals of Faith: Reflections on the Jewish Holidays, was edited with a thoughtful introduction by YU Prof. David Shatz, himself a leading centrist Orthodox writer and intellectual, a generation younger than Rabbi Lamm. A third collection of sermons is also planned.

Often, collections of sermons are of interest primarily to other rabbis, who have the difficult task of preaching every week and must find new insights into the week's Torah portion or into the celebration of a Jewish holy day. Indeed, rabbis (of any denomination) who consult this volume will find a rich source of inspiration. But this volume may be of interest to Jews outside of the rabbinate for several reasons.

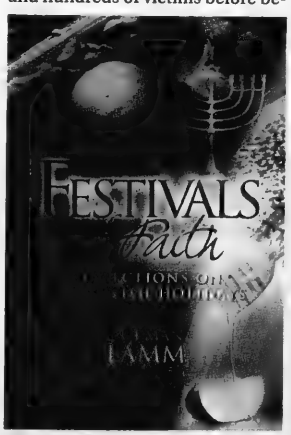
First, the book embodies the fine (and generally neglected) art of rhetoric, practised by a true professional. Shatz, who grew up in Rabbi Lamm's synagogue, notes in his introduction that the rabbi's "creativity and eloquence shaped my interests and perspectives from the time I was 13," as the sermons "opened for me and others the world of sophisticated Jewish ideas, both their power and their beauty."

While, of course, readers do not get the chance to appreciate Rabbi Lamm's famed delivery, I think they will still see why his congregants used to look forward to "sermon time," and why they sat transfixed as he spoke.

Secondly, the book has interest as a historical source about the United States of the 1950s and 1960s. Like any good rabbi, the author makes constant reference to events of the day. In 1963, he congratulated from the pulpit "the Negroes of our country" (using the language common then) for their political accomplishments on the civil rights front, and urged Jews to apply lessons learned from that model to spiritual issues.

I learned about a fascinating chapter of American history from Rabbi Lamm's 1954 sermon where he mocks Senator Homer Ferguson from Michigan who, at the urging of various right-wing groups, spearheaded a campaign (ultimately successful) to change the wording of the U.S. Pledge of Allegiance from "one nation, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all" to "one nation, under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all."

Decrying the campaign as hypocritical because these supposedly religious men had just recently engaged in the vicious and destructive witch hunt of McCarthyism, the young Rabbi Lamm preached: "What a pale victory for religion! What a desecration of everything holy to any religion to proclaim it so patriotically, to reduce religion to two words, but to wait two years and hundreds of victims before beginning to realize that McCarthyism is no good... The good senator just threw a kiss to God but we wonder whether God is going to throw one back."



Rabbi Lamm also did not shy away from criticizing presidents and vice-presidents of the United States from the pulpit for falling short morally (not just for allegedly failing to be sufficiently supportive of Israel, the type of criticism one generally hears from the centrist Orthodox pulpit today).

Lastly, readers who are open to it will find much that is inspiring and uplifting here. For reasons of space, I will mention only two ideas that appealed to me.

In one sermon (from 1962), Rabbi Lamm analyzes the reasons why modern people have lost their sense of shame: "It is not because we have a high opinion of ourselves. Quite the contrary, it is because we have too low an opinion of ourselves, because we have almost no... image of dignity to be jolted and hurt. Our sophisticated generation has been nurtured on Freud and weaned on Kinsey. We have been taught to expect the worst of ourselves... Our problem is that we have so contemptible a view of our own value, of our own moral worth and significance, that that which is mean and despicable seems to us to fit into the picture we have drawn of ourselves." Rabbi Lamm tried to inspire his congregants by teaching them that just as the Torah expects much from us, we should demand more of ourselves, too.

In another sermon (from 1965), Rabbi Lamm discusses the differences between contemporary rabbinic leaders and the prophets of old: "Oh, if I were a prophet! If I had the courage of an Isaiah or the fearlessness of a Jeremiah!... I would accuse – without concern for this or any other year's fundraising campaigns – many of our great national [Jewish] organizations of pious fraud for their myopic obsession with antisemitism... when the really great danger to Jewish existence is ignorance and assimilation."

Rabbi Lamm's sermons can inspire us, reminding us of the good old days before much of centrist Orthodox Judaism in the United States and in Canada began to align itself so vigorously with right-wing causes. It was not that long ago that a centrist Orthodox rabbi could support liberal causes and encourage young people, as Rabbi Lamm does in this book, to get involved in society, join picket lines, organize mass meetings, and show that they care about "economic justice or social progress or racial equality or political integrity."

INCLUSION WEEK: The Grade 1 class of teacher Lori Shapero-Press, left, at the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School lent a helping hand by putting up a wheelchair-accessible mezuzah at the front entrance of the Miles Nadal JCC recently. It was part of the class' activities for Shabbat Inclusion Week, working to make the building accessible to all.

The photo "Let's Play Ball" (April 28) should have indicated that the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School is celebrating its 13th anniversary, not its 30th as we stated. The CJN regrets the error.

'Canada and Israel remain tightly connected'

Miriam Ziv

On May 14, 1948, David Ben-Gurion stood before a hopeful crowd at Independence Hall in Tel Aviv and declared the establishment of the State of Israel in the ancient homeland of the Jewish people. With this announcement, the Jewish people ended their long, bitter exile and immediately began working to fulfil their broader mission: to establish a thriving, prosperous democracy where Jewish tradition and culture could flourish.

Guest Voice

This Yom Ha'atzmaut marks the 63rd anniversary of Ben-Gurion's momentous speech. In only 63 years, the State of Israel has evolved in extraordinary ways, going from a struggling agricultural society to an economic powerhouse that houses more startup companies, produces more patents, and generates more Nobel prizes than any other country in the world. Israel's accession to the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) in May 2010 is a testament to the international recognition of Israel's achievements as a vibrant democracy and to its ability to contribute to the global economy.

On the political and regional level, one cannot talk about the year that was without mentioning the dramatic changes that occurred in the Middle East. In Tunisia, Egypt, Libya, Syria and other Arab countries, millions of citizens flooded the streets, to protest their regimes and demand democratic reform. As the only true democracy in the Middle East, the State of Israel hopes for the realization of a stable reform process and democratic transition in these countries.

However, in the midst of these historic changes in the Middle East, changes that hold the promise of new freedom and democracy in our region, we are faced with the question that inevitably ensues: once the dust settles, will it be the moderates or the extremists who will prevail?

> The strength of our relationship with the Diaspora lies in our unity

Although this question is of major significance to the entire world, it is an immediate reality for Israel. Unfortunately, Israel continues to face the realities of extremism. However, despite the pain and outrage these realities cause, true peace remains our most desired goal. More than being a time for celebration, Yom Ha'atzmaut is a time for hope and an opportunity to dedicate ourselves to this very important objective. Israel remains steadfastly committed to the two-state solution and wholly dedicated to the principles of freedom, democracy and peace laid out by Ben-Gurion in our declaration of independence.

Canada and Israel have remained tightly connected by these principles and values that we share. We had the opportunity to celebrate these values when Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu visited Canada almost a year ago.

This visit prompted a rapid boost in our co-operation, especially in the field of innovation. Last November, the first Canada-Israel Technology Innovation Summit was held in Toronto, and the followup to the conference will be held in Israel in July. This promising initiative will allow Canada and Israel to go beyond co-operation on research and move toward collaborating on the commercialization of products that are developed as a result of our partnership.

Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty in Israel in 2010

Another noteworthy advancement in our relationship is the increased cooperation between Israel and the provinces. Premier Dalton McGuinty's announcement of the Ontario Brain Institute, whose first international partnership is set to be with Israel, is a good example. As well, Nova Scotia Premier Darrell Dexter will be leading a trade mission to Israel this year in an attempt to increase business and research ties between Israel and Nova Scotia.

The ground is fertile for co-operation between Israel and the different orders of government in Canada, as well as the academic world. In this respect, I have had the opportunity to meet with many university presidents across the country over the last year, and all those who I have met have shown a keen interest in working with Israeli academic institutions in different fields. Academic collaboration remains an important priority in the expansion of our relations.

The government of Israel has dedicated this 63rd birthday to celebrating the bond between Israelis and the Jews of the Diaspora. As ambassador of Israel to Canada, I have the unique opportunity to witness the engagement and the dedication that is put into strengthening ties between the Canadian Jewish community and the State of Israel. This past year, I have travelled across Canada and visited various communities from the East Coast to the West Coast, and have been consistently been touched by the warmth and the energy of the Canadian Jewish community. I consider myself very fortunate to work alongside such a generous, enthusiastic and creative group of people.

The strength of the Israel-Diaspora relationship lies in our unity. This Yom Ha'atzmaut is a perfect opportunity to take pride in our successes, to reflect on the challenges that lie ahead and to remind ourselves that together, there is nothing we can't achieve.

Kachol Lavan centre marks five-year anniversary

Sara Dobner
Special to The CJN

Since its founding in 2006, Kachol Lavan, the Centre for Hebrew and Israel Studies, has become the jewel in the crown of the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Israeli Forum.

Kachol Lavan was founded to fill an educational gap for the Canadian Israeli community and to help carry on our rich, unique and beloved Israeli culture, Hebrew language and Jewish heritage.

More than half the children of Israeli immigrants do not attend Hebrew school, nor do they participate in any Jewish educational programs. With every passing year, the risk that these children will lose their Jewish and Israeli identity, and their connection to the community, increases. To help these families, Kachol Lavan has been offering high quality, affordable educational programs for the last five years.

Kachol Lavan is a not-for-profit program of the Schwartz/Reisman Centre and funded by federation. The centre offers a variety of programs, including Sunday classes for junior kindergarten to Grade 8; extracurricular programs, including chess, Israeli folk dancing and student choir; bat/bar mitzvah program, and adult Hebrew class, adult choir and high school Hebrew credit programs.

From 70 students in its first year, Kachol Lavan has grown to an impressive supplementary Hebrew school with 300 young students and some 50 adult learners. To address the increasing demand, Kachol Lavan will open a third campus next year in Thornhill Woods, in addition to its current two campuses – in Toronto and in Thornhill.

A source of pride for Kachol Lavan is the increasing number of students from non-Hebrew-speaking families at the centre. Their number has doubled since Kachol Lavan's inception, and they now represent 21 per cent of its students.

Children at Kachol Lavan celebrate Purim.

"One of Kachol Lavan's goals is to bring the contemporary and vibrant Israeli culture to Canadian Jewish kids, and not only to Israeli kids," said Ariel Zaltzman, Kachol Lavan's managing director. "We are proud of bringing Israeli and Canadian Jewish kids together to share with them our rich culture and strengthen their Israeli Jewish identities.

"Kachol Lavan will continue to ensure that all the children in our community can afford to strengthen their connection to the State of Israel, the Hebrew language and their Jewish heritage."

Debbie and Robert Zober drive from Barrie every Sunday to take their three children to Kachol Lavan. Robert also drives one evening a week to attend a Hebrew adult class.

"At Kachol Lavan, the kids actually learn to speak Hebrew in an Israeli accent, and not only to read and write," Debbie Zober said. "Since they started Kachol Lavan this year, I can talk to them in Hebrew and they understand me."

She said that Kachol Lavan is unique among Jewish schools in the Toronto area, as it is run by Israelis who have an Israeli mentality, and the school connects the kids to Israeli culture. "The kids feel at home and enjoy learning Hebrew and learn about current events in Israel. The teachers are excellent and get to know the kids, and cater to the individual needs and level of the kids."

The teachers know the Zobers are planning to make aliyah next year, so they do their utmost to help so that the move to Israel will be easier for the family. "I love it when at Chanukah the kids sing Sevivon Sov Sov Sov, and not Dreidel Dreidel," Debbie said.

Yael and Meir Gluzberg send their two children to Kachol Lavan, because it's the only organization in the Toronto area that can pass on to their kids the Israeli spirit, atmosphere and culture that they try so hard to maintain at home. While they speak Hebrew at home, it's important for them that their children learn how to read and write Hebrew as well.

"It's a great experience for the kids to immerse once a week in the warm Israeli environment that Kachol Lavan has so successfully created," Yael said.

Following last year's first successful gala fundraiser, Kachol Lavan is gearing up for its second fundraising event, which will mark the centre's five-year anniversary. An Israeli party, the event will include three hours of Israeli music – old Eretz Yisrael songs and modern songs – featuring an electrifying performance by Israeli singer Einat Sarouf. A light dinner and wine will be served.

Amir Gissin, Israel's consul general for Ontario and Western Canada, and Ted Sokolsky, president and CEO of federation, both supporters of the centre, will attend the gala.

Kachol Lavan is "an experience... where a youth or a child feels like they are in Israel," Gissin said.

The gala is supported by a volunteer advisory board that includes representatives from the Israeli consulate, educators, parents and community leaders. It's hoped the event will raise the community's awareness of Kachol Lavan. Proceeds will go to expand the centre's programs.

The gala will be held May 15 at 7:30 p.m. at the Canadian Institute for the Blind, 1929 Bayview Ave. Tickets are $80 in advance or $100 at the door (with a tax receipt up to the maximum allowed). For more information, contact events@kachol-lavan.com or call 905-482-1818, ext. 208.

Kibbutz ulpan: my original Israel experience

Ruth Ladovsky
Special to The CJN

Forty years ago, I took a break from my university studies to travel to Israel and and live there for a year. Not unlike the younger generation of today, we gravitated to Israel for a meaningful Jewish experience. I would have loved a Taglit-Birthright Israel experience, but nothing quite like that existed yet.

Back then, our passport to the world of Jewish travel was a kibbutz ulpan program. For cross-cultural interactions, an informal education and some "tikkun olam," what could be better than a chance to live and volunteer for six months on a kibbutz? In addition to mornings spent picking oranges in the pardes or irrigating apple orchards, there were daily afternoon conversational Hebrew classes and dinner in the chadar ochel every night.

The kibbutz that I had the good fortune to live on, which still operates to this day, is Kibbutz GalEd, in northern Israel, in the region of Megiddo, close to Elyakim, the village founded by Yeminite Jews.

GalEd was established in 1945 by a a nucleus of German Habonim members formed in 1938. The land on which the kibbutz lies was purchased with money that Yitzhak Ochberg, a South African philanthropist had given to the Karen Hayesod. The kibbutz signpost reads Even Yitzhak (stone of Yitzhak) in his honour, as well as GalEd, (Hebrew for "monument"), in memory of the Habonim members killed in World War II.

Ruthie Ladovsky and nephews Jacob and Nathan overlook Lebanon in October 2010.

Like all kibbutzim, its membership consisted of a wide variety of interesting characters.

Two of the founding members of GalEd who made aliyah to Mandatory Palestine in 1938, Dr. Giora Yoseftal and his wife, Senetta, even went on to become members of the Israeli Knesset. Dr. Yoseftal held several ministerial portfolios in the late 1950s and early 1960s.

Kibbutz life was a perfect opportunity to meet the younger generation of Israelis. They demonstrated as much curiosity about our North American lives as we did about their Israeli ones. And, of course, many of our new friends were also serving in the army, coming home for Shabbat and returning to their bases early Sunday morning.

With our ulpan and new Israeli kibbutz friends, we had lots of opportunities to tour the land. I still recall the highlights: tiyulim (day trips) to Caesaria, Har Hermon, Beit Shean, the the Druze village of Daliyat El Carmel and a three day march (tza'ada) through the Judean Hills (hiking by day and camping at night), culminating with a march into Jerusalem.

Without Facebook or Twitter, we celebrated our new friendships.

I turned 21 while on Kibbutz GalEd, in the company of new friends.

Now fast-forward 40 years!

Travel to Israel has taken on many new dimensions. There are still kibbutz ulpanim (albeit not many), and there will always be the classic one- or two-week tours highlighting major cities and sites. But for travellers who have already experienced Israel a number of times, we can now combine our love of being in the country with a very specific, particular interest. This personalizes our connection to the land, to the people and to the adventure that awaits us. Whatever one's interest – study, hiking, bird watching, biking, volunteering, touring, or even a restful Shabbat – it can all happen in Israel.

There are several organized special interest trips each year, such as Hebrew University's Live and Learn, Beit Halochem's Courage in Motion, One Family Fund's Cross Israel Hike, Sar-El's army base volunteer program, Kolel's Food for Thought culinary tour, and UJA and JNF missions. The list is endless.

All of these experiences are open to travellers of all ages. The opportunities are also endless to create one's own unique adventure!

It's a perfect way to feel as though you're turning 21 again.

Ruth Ladovsky lives in Toronto, has been to Israel many times and is always eager for the next opportunity to go back.

We will never waver in our defence of freedom

Prime Minister Stephen Harper issued the following statement on the commemoration of Yom Hashoah:

"On Yom Hashoah, Canadians of all faiths will stand together to remember the suffering and murder of the millions of innocent men, women and children who were victims of the Holocaust.

Stephen Harper

"It is important that we take this opportunity to remember the victims of the Holocaust and their families. It helps keep strong the conviction in our hearts to do everything we can – through our actions and our words – to stand firm against the forces of intolerance and remain vigilant against genocide. Only through these continued efforts can we ensure that such atrocities never happen again.

"Our government remains vigilant, both at home and abroad, against all forms of racism and discrimination, including the malignant hatreds of Holocaust denial and antisemitism. We vigorously oppose and condemn antisemitism no matter where it is found and no matter what shape it takes. We will never waver in our commitment to defend religious freedom."

"The Holocaust stands alone in the annals of human history. It was not just a crime perpetrated against a specific group of people. It was a crime that challenged the fundamental values all civilized peoples hold dear: freedom, democracy, human rights and the rule of law. We will continue to stand against any forces that oppose these essential principles. We must never allow the crimes of the past to be repeated or forgotten. We are committed to ensure the lessons of the Holocaust are never forgotten."

We remember those who survived

Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty addressed Shaar Shalom Synagogue in Thornhill this past Shabbat, a day before Yom Hashoah. McGuinty was followed by Bernie Farber, CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, who gave the Yom Hashoah sermon at his home synagogue.

Rabbi Berman, distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen, friends.

Thank you for inviting me to share in this ceremony. It's a pleasure to be here today with Bernie Farber. I want to thank Bernie for all he's doing to build a more caring and always vigilant Ontario by doing things like contributing to the province's Hate Crimes Community Working Group and helping lead the Canadian Jewish Congress.

I also want to thank all of you for the very important work you do raising families, building careers, helping the vulnerable, strengthening your community and contributing to a stronger Ontario.

As we gather on the Sabbath before Yom Hashoah, we remember those who died.

Six million dead. A number as unfathomable as the hatred behind it. We remember those who survived, too, and all they have endured in the decades since.

As Eli Wiesel wrote in his memoir, Night: "Never shall I forget that night, the first night in camp, which has turned my life into one long night.

"Seven times cursed and seven times sealed. Never shall I forget that smoke.

"Never shall I forget the little faces of the children, whose bodies I saw turned into wreaths of smoke beneath a silent blue sky.

"Never shall I forget those flames, which consumed my faith forever. Never shall I forget that nocturnal silence, which deprived me, for all eternity, of the desire to live.

"Never shall I forget those moments, which murdered my God and my soul and turned my dreams to dust.

"Never shall I forget these things, even if I am condemned to live as long as God Himself. Never."

My friends, for those who survived, time has moved on more than half a century. But the memory remains fresh and powerful, so deeply etched into their lives, nothing can erase it. All of this, the lives lost and the lives forever changed, are what we remember today.

I have, together with my colleague Monte Kwinter, who is here today, visited Yad Vashem in Jerusalem. We laid a wreath there on behalf of Ontarians in the Hall of Remembrance.

I have also visited the Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington D.C. I brought my children with me.

And for seven years now, as premier, I have hosted a Yad Vashem ceremony at Queen's Park.

Each of these experiences has saddened me, frightened me and angered me. I'm always left with the same haunting question: how could we ever do this to each other?

So I can't even begin to imagine the depth of the impact of the Holocaust on those whose experience has been personal. I mean the survivors and their families. I feel I owe a great debt to survivors who shared their stories.

Because those of us who were not there need to be reminded, again and again, of the inhumanity that humanity is capable of – not only out of a duty to remember the past, but because we share a responsibility to build a better future, right here right now.

Dalton McGuinty

We live in a place – Ontario, Canada –where we invite everyone from every nation, race, religion and culture to come together, to accept each other, to support each other and when called upon to do so, to stand up for each other.

In no small measure, the success we have enjoyed in building our society is because those among us who survived the Holocaust, remembered and chose to believe, despite all they had seen, that love is stronger than hate.

Last night, when I was preparing these remarks, I came across a powerful text written in 2002. It's a letter to the world written by Holocaust survivors. They called it "Our Living Legacy: A Message From Holocaust Survivors For All Generations." Let me leave you with this passage from that letter:

"We who staggered through the Valley of Death, only to see how our families, our communities and our people were destroyed, did not descend into despondency and despair. Rather, we struggled to extract a message of meaning and renewed purpose for our people and for all people, namely a message of humanity, of human decency and of human dignity. The Holocaust, which established the standard for absolute evil, is the universal heritage of all civilized people.

"The lessons of the Holocaust must form the cultural code for education towards humane values, democracy, human rights, tolerance and patience, and opposition to racism and totalitarian ideologies."

Thank you.

TJFF screens movies by Israeli film school grads

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Toronto-area students hope that a three-day spotlight on Israeli films that are included in this year's Toronto Jewish Film Festival (TJFF) will expose Canadian audiences to different aspects of Israeli culture.

Ron Tal, a York University computer science graduate student, is one of 11 Jewish and non-Jewish students who teamed up with Hillel to present a spotlight on TJFF contributors who came out of Israeli film schools.

The committee has organized screenings of 10 Israeli films from May 10 to 12 that are directed by students and alumni of Israeli film schools, including the Sam Speigel Film School, Sapir College and Tel Aviv University.

Tal said the films were selected by the committee from a pool of more than 200 by directors who hail from Israeli film schools.

Tal, who saw all the films that will be screened in the spotlight, said his favourite one is Roads by Lior Geller.

"Roads is a sort of crime thriller that takes place in an Arab neighbourhood in the city of Lod, which is known for being a centre for the distribution of drugs... It focuses on the life of an Arab drug runner who wants to be a soccer player, but is caught in the reality of living in a slum under the thumbs of bigger drug dealers," Tal said.

He added that while this film has political undertones, most of the other films deal with issues such as culture, ethnicity, religion and sexuality.

Orit Yaakobi's film, The Third Generation, is about a 30-year-old woman named Galia who is irritated by her mother and grandmother who constantly nag her about getting married. In an attempt to solve her "problem," they force her to participate in religious and superstitious customs.

Yaakobi will take part in a question-and-answer session following the screening of her film on May 10 at the Bloor Cinema.

Seeds of Summer, by Hen Lasker, is a documentary that takes place seven years after she completed her Israel Defence Forces (IDF) training for female combat soldiers – when she fell in love with a woman who was her commanding officer. The film follows the teenage girls going through rigorous IDF combat training, while exploring identity, sexuality, femininity and the relationships that develop between girls.

Esther Siton's film, I'm Ready, is about a boy with Down syndrome who is cared for by his elderly father. His own struggle with Alzheimer's threatens the stability of their home.

Eliko, by Meni Yaish, follows a young man who spends each Shabbat surrounded by family and tradition, but his Thursday nights are filled with sex, drugs and violence. This film focuses on one Thursday night that gets out of control.

Shira, by Miryam Adler, who will answer questions about her film after the May 12 showing at Canada Square, is about the wife of an Orthodox rabbi in a religious Israeli community, who is a mother to five daughters under seven. Exhausted, she struggles with the expectation that she try to bear a son.

"I hope people will be exposed to another perspective of Israeli society – what life in Israel is like, what is on the minds of Israelis and hopefully they'll just have a good time and be open to seeing new things and be more aware that there are good things coming out of Israel," said Tal, who grew up in Israel.

"Most of the publicity that the country gets is due to political reasons, so it's always nice to get unrelated cultural reasons to look at Israel a little differently."

For more information about the Hillel spotlight on Israeli film schools and the screenings, visit www.tjff.com/list-films.php?filterby=4.

York president gets 5 more years

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Mamdouh Shoukri will serve another five-year term as president and vice-chancellor of York University, the school announced last week.

Since replacing former president Lorna Marsden in 2007, the Egyptian-born Shoukri – the first Muslim to be appointed to head a Canadian university – has led York through expansion and renovation, as well as the most successful fund-raising campaign in the school's history, which garnered $207 million.

Mamdouh Shoukri

But Shoukri's five-year term has also been marked by controversy and accusations of tolerating antisemitism at York, Canada's third largest university.

Over the years, the school has been the site of countless confrontations between anti-Israel and pro-Israel students, as well as antisemitic graffiti and a 2009 incident in which Jewish students were trapped inside the Hillel office by a group of students chanting anti-Israel slogans.

Despite Shoukri's repeated statements that "there is zero tolerance of any form of racism and zero tolerance of any form of antisemitism" at York, some members of the Jewish community have accused him of tolerating an atmosphere on campus that is unsafe for identifiably Jewish students.

Following the 2009 incident, Shoukri commissioned a task force to address the issue of student safety on campus in response to the growing hostilities between anti- and pro-Israel students, but Jewish students as well as members of the general Jewish community still criticized his administration for allowing intimidation and hostility against pro-Israel students to go unpunished.

Adir Dishy, Hasbara at York's immediate past president, said he hopes that in Shoukri's next term, York will "improve its stance in terms of Middle Eastern issues on campus.

"We also hope he will speak up next time the student government decides to use our funds to bring in supporters of terror against Israelis," Dishy said, referring to a lecture given last year at York by former British MP George Galloway, which was paid for in part by the York Federation of Students.

Shoukri, who holds a PhD in mechanical engineering from McMaster University, said he will continue to serve York until at least 2017.

"Our university is home to some of the world's most talented and dedicated students, faculty and staff, and I am proud to be a part of it," he said in a statement.

"Our solid reputation as one of Canada's leading comprehensive research and teaching universities is a result of the strength of our community, and together we will continue to push the boundaries and redefine the possible."

N.B. museum founder gets Jewish studies award

Joel Jacobson
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Like most volunteers, Marcia Koven sought no credit for starting the Saint John, N.B., Jewish Historical Museum 25 years ago and for fostering it into a model for small, effective museums across Canada.

Marcia Koven

"I did it because it was fun," she said, expressing awe and disbelief when told she was the 2011 recipient of the Louis Rosenberg Canadian Jewish Studies Distinguished Service Award.

Annually or from time to time, as may be appropriate, the Association for Canadian Jewish Studies presents an award honouring an individual, group or institution who has made a significant contribution to Canadian Jewish studies in one or more fields. The award will be presented in Fredericton, N.B., May 29 at the annual conference of the organization, just four days prior to the 25th anniversary dinner of the Saint John museum.

Koven, 84 and still active, is a retired teacher and was a volunteer leader of the museum for more than two decades. She said that she'd go to work every day at the museum "like it was a real job. It was my whole life for a long, long time."

In the early years, she worked from a tiny office before finding space in the basement of the local Jewish community centre, attached to Shaarei Zedek Synagogue in downtown Saint John.

Born and raised in the community, and a mature graduate in sociology from the University of New Brunswick–Saint John in her 50s, Koven collected photos and memorabilia and did oral histories with senior members of the community (since converted to video and now DVD).

With government grants for museum development and summer students – more than 100 have been employed through 25 years – the museum flourished from its opening in July 1986.

Between Koven, a couple of teachers in the Jewish community, and Katherine Biggs-Craft, the current curator and a summer student in the museum's first year, Holocaust education programs were developed for New Brunswick high school students, along with outreach programs for junior high teachers to present to their classes about Jewish holidays, life-cycle events and the Holocaust.

Today, Jewish heritage tours, focusing on cruise ship passengers, are conducted by community volunteers. Displays change annually, with Biggs-Craft currently preparing a panorama focusing on family Jewish life in early Saint John, and Jewish businesses, highlighting artifacts and clothing from the 1930s forward.

She estimates 88,000 people have visited the museum over the years, with the greatest coming in 2004 when 6,000 people came through the doors. Last year, more than 5,600 were tallied.

The museum operates full time from March through October (closed Saturdays, of course) and part time and by appointment through the winter months.

"I've enjoyed working with Marcia," Biggs-Craft said. "I've learned a lot about a culture not my own," she added, chuckling. "I think I know more about Saint John than some of our community folk. They've lived it by being here for decades, so I learn a lot from them, too."

Koven was first female to have bat mitzvah at shul

Koven, who in her 50s was the first female to be bat mitzvahed at Shaarei Zedek (which was originally Orthodox but changed to Conservative in the 1960s), described the ceremony as "my proudest moment."

Through the years, she served as president of the synagogue sisterhood, as well as president of the Saint John chapter and a member of the national executive of Hadassah-WIZO. She was also a New Brunswick representative on the Atlantic Jewish Council and head of the women's chevra kadisha in Saint John, and served in a variety of capacities with other organizations, such as the local Jewish seniors club and the AJC's Holocaust committee.

The Saint John Jewish Historical Museum has received awards from the American Association for State and Local History, (1987), the Church and Synagogue Library Association, (1996), and the province of New Brunswick, (2000).

Koven said she saw the museum as a preservation of the heritage of a diminishing Jewish community and a way to educate the wider population about Jewish traditions and history.

"I'm proud of everything that has been accomplished," she said.

Jewish identity subject of symposium

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — North American academics in the field of Jewish studies are coming to Concordia University for the Symposium on History, Memory, and Jewish Identity, May 9 to 11.

"By bringing together leading scholars of all eras of Jewish history, our symposium aims to re-evaluate the ways in which various Jewish groups throughout the history of Judaism have remembered and recorded the past and the relationship between these representations of the past and the construction of Jewish identity," said Ira Robinson, the event's co-chair, along with Concordia religion department professors Lorenzo DiTommaso and Naftali Cohn.

The objective is to look at the sweep of Jewish history, from the ancient world to the contemporary.

Among the papers to be presented are Dark Family Secrets in the Land of Eternal Happiness: Holocaust Memory in the Soviet Union in the 1950s-1980s by Anna Shternshis of the University of Toronto; Memory of the "Good Old Kaiser"and the Role of Habsburg Loyalty in the Identities of Austrian Jews in the 19th and 20th Centuries by Marsha Rozenblit of the University of Maryland; American Jewish Immigrants and the Invention of Europe by Beth Wenger of the University of Pennsylvania.

The symposium, Robinson said, "approaches the most complex issue in Jewish studies: Jewish identity. The interaction of these scholars over a period of three days will generate exciting new insights, with important repercussions for the field as a whole."

The event is funded by the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada, with support from the Canadian Society for Jewish Studies and Concordia.

All sessions will be open to the public. For more information, visit http://religion.concordia.ca/jewishid/.

Baking skills propelled Dufflet to gastronomic fame

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Thirty-six years ago, when she was only 20, Dufflet Rosenberg began baking desserts at home.

Not for herself or for her parents, Joe and Ruth, but for Torontonians who could not resist the sublime and heavenly taste of a scrumptious piece of cake that melts in your mouth.

A university dropout who grew up watching her mother bake, she sold these handcrafted confections – chocolate fudge cakes, apple tortes, cheese cakes and the like – to such cafés as the Cow Café and Just Desserts, both now defunct, and to a medley of restaurants.

Achieving instant success, she became one of Toronto's finest up-and-coming bakers. "I was surprised by the reaction," she said in a recent interview. Almost four decades on, Rosenberg presides over a mini-empire.

Her company, Dufflet, produces a dizzying array of cakes, pies, tortes, flans and cookies, as well as packaged nut-based candies coated in chocolate. She sells to supermarkets, gourmet food stores, restaurants, caterers and hotels.

Rosenberg's ascent to gastronomic fame has been spectacular. In 1980, she opened a bakery on Queen Street West, near her home. Two years later, it evolved into a café. Business boomed, and by 1985, she was working out of a 5,000-square-foot facility on Dovercourt Road.

Nine years ago, she opened another café on Yonge Street. In 2007, she launched her third café in the Beach neighbourhood. In 2009, she moved her headquarters to a 30,000-square-foot plant in Etobicoke.

"We're constantly expanding, but there's no big master plan" said Rosenberg, sipping a cup of coffee at her unadorned Queen Street West café. "We're growing all the time."

Citing examples, she mentioned her Small Indulgences line of chocolate crackles, morsels and "tumbles," and her Grab and Go frozen cakes, tarts and waffles.

Dufflet products are sold across Canada and in the United States. In the future, she hopes to expand to Europe, Asia and the Middle East. Although she had broadened her base, cakes and pies still account for the majority of sales. She is loathe to discuss dollars and cents – "we don't give out financial information" – but admits that sales figures have cracked the $1-million mark. A diminutive woman with greying red hair and a soft-spoken manner, she ascribes her success to several interrelated factors.

"I think we're very creative, and we never skimp on ingredients. We make everything from scratch, never from a mix. We do not use artificial flavours, colours or preservatives. Nor do we use hydrogenated fats and oils. We live up to our promise of pure and sweet."

To Rosenberg, product consistency is of the utmost importance. "You always get what you expect," she said.

Rosenberg regularly travels to food shows for new ideas. "We watch trends. We know what's going on out there."

Today, Dufflet produces about 100 different kinds of pastries, from strawberry cream cakes to classic New York-style cheese cakes. After more than three decades, her best-seller is still her signature carrot cake, a dense concoction of carrots, pineapples, coconuts and walnuts layered and iced with cream cheese and honey icing

The meringue cake, however, remains her all-time favourite dessert. "It's light, with lots of texture and flavour."

Though she loves the taste of baked goods, she is sufficiently disciplined to keep her weight down. "I watch what I eat," said Rosenberg, an avid cyclist and skier who exercises with a personal trainer.

For the past five years, she has administered Dufflet with Daniele Bertrand, who came on board as a partner. "The business was expanding and was too much for one person to manage," she explained. "Daniele comes from a corporate background and is very experienced."

Rosenberg, the CEO, is in charge of product development. "The focus is on coming out with the next great thing," said Rosenberg, who can sometimes be found baking in her spanking new test kitchen. "We launch 15 to 20 new products a year."

Rosenberg was brought up on home baking. "My mother was a good baker," she said. "I always liked to watch her. I liked sweets."

She began calling herself Dufflet when she was 15. She acquired the nickname from her brother, Duff, who was fond of chocolate and cherry combinations.

Rosenberg's father – a partner in Ideal Food Service Equipment, founded by her grandfather – also devoured desserts, especially banana cakes, butter tarts, apple pies and ice cream.

She baked her first dessert, a chocolate cake, at the age of 16. She took arts courses at the University of Toronto, but never finished. Drawn to the culinary world, she enrolled in a baking course at George Brown College. She enlarged her repertoire by attending a course in French pastry baking at the École LeNôtre in Paris. But much of what she knows today is self-taught, she noted.

Rosenberg's husband, Martin Kohn, an architect, has a sweet tooth, too, but he manages to control his intake of Dufflet's cornucopia of cakes, pies and cookies.

Chefs cook at fundraiser for Israeli soup kitchens

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

In 1997, Rabbi Abraham Israel helped a woman with multiple sclerosis cross the street. She walked with a cane and she was so unsteady on her feet, he accompanied her to her home, a bare one-room apartment in a run-down Jerusalem neighbourhood.

The retired American businessman, who had recently made aliyah, was shocked by the level of poverty he saw. The woman had no food in her house. When he learned there were many other people in her building who also went hungry, Rabbi Israel, 61, started a soup kitchen for 17 needy people.

This project grew into the Hazon Yeshaya Humanitarian Network, a volunteer-driven social service organization – Rabbi Israel is the unpaid director – that runs 60 soup kitchens in Israel, serving 400,000 hot, nutritious meals a month. Hazon Yeshaya also provides services that include free dentistry, vocational training, day care and after-school programs at centres in Rishon LeZion, Ashkelon and Jerusalem.

Through word-of-mouth, visitors come to Israel to volunteer at the Hazon Yeshaya soup kitchens, while others participate at charitable branches of the organization that have sprouted in the Diaspora. The Canadian organization started out with parlour meetings, but last summer the volunteer group decided to hold a major fundraiser.

The seeds were sown at the meetings for Soup with the Stars, Hazon Yeshaya Canada's first gala, held on March 28 at The Warehouse in Downsview Park.

The gala was co-chaired by Sarah Krauss, Sam Ifergan and Orna Serruya, and co-ordinated by event planners Karen Garscadden and Tobi Liederman.

"We had 400 tickets and we sold out a week before, Ifergan told The CJN.

In her speech at the event, Krauss said the organization was virtually unknown in Toronto, but a committee of dedicated volunteers had worked tirelessly through e-mails, letters and phone calls to publicize the event and the community responded.

Indeed, between ticket sales, donations and the silent auction, the gala brought in more than $300,000. There were so many silent-auction donations – about 100 businesses and artists contributed – that item tables had to be placed in the hallway.

Those people fortunate enough to attend were entertained by Jersey Nights, a tribute to the music of the Four Seasons, and singer Gad Elbaz as they enjoyed a sumptuous kosher dinner catered by PR Creative. The meal included soups prepared by some of the Toronto area's best-known chefs. Hence the gala name: Soup with the Stars, which was very apropos for an event raising money for soup kitchens.

The chefs were on site to serve their soups. Lifestyle guru Rose Reisman, looking elegant in an orange cocktail dress, doled out a low-fat and low-calorie bean soup. Eran Marom, executive chef at the Marron Bistro, offered a beet and horseradish soup, while Daniel Schick, executive chef at the King Edward Hotel's Le Méridien, had prepared a corn chowder.

Toben Kochman, executive chef at Toben Food by Design, served up Vietnamese chicken pho, and Arpi Magyar, executive chef and proprietor of Couture Cuisine, created a goulash (gulyas) soup with dumplings.

The day after the gala, The CJN was on hand for the tail end of a celebratory debriefing meeting at a suburban eatery with Rabbi Israel and event co-chairs Krauss and Ifergan.

They agreed that Soup with the Stars had been a huge success and one of the hottest tickets in town.

"In the end, we were turning people away," Krauss said, adding that people from across the Greater Toronto Area, from both the Ashkenazi and Sephardi communities, were represented. "We had people of every stripe and colour. From uptown to downtown, observant and non-observant."

[Eric Benchimol photo]

Hunger is a cause that resonates with the whole community, she said.

Rabbi Israel raved about the event. "It was great food. The entertainment was terrific."

But there was not a lot of time for him to savour the success of Soup with the Stars. He's not only the founding director of Hazon Yeshaya, he's also the organization's chief fundraiser. "I travel six months a year."

He was off to Ottawa that very day.

The rabbi, a father of seven, knows what it's like to be hungry. In 1956, his family fled to France from Egypt, leaving all their assets behind. They had to rely on a soup kitchen in Paris to survive. "It was the same soup kitchen that fed the refugees after the war," he recounted.

It took three years before the Israel family could immigrate to the United States. He became a chartered accountant and eventually started a successful shoe-importing business.

Today, it is the needs of the poor, among them children, abused women and Holocaust survivors, that drives him, Rabbi Israel said, explaining that mayors across Israel are asking him to set up centres in their communities. The next one will be in Karmiel.

"We started the centre in Ashkelon six years ago after seeing a news clip about child poverty. There were children without food for lunch. They were actually watching the other children eat their lunch."

DANI starts up catering venture

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

What started as a weekly kosher luncheon at DANI's Place has turned into an ongoing dairy/pareve catering venture.

DANI (Developing and Nurturing Independence) is an organization for young adults who are experiencing physical and/or cognitive challenges,

Susie Sokol, who co-founded DANI with Kathy Laszlo, said that when the group opened a house on McAllister Road, they decided to invite guests for lunch.

"We wanted people to meet our kids, and the kids were able to practise their kitchen skills."

Decked out in hair nets and gloves – they've ordered aprons and chef hats – the kids, under the guidance of a professional chef, set the table, prepare and serve the food, and clean up.

"These are important life skills, and everyone is involved to their ability," said Sokol.

She said the lunch always includes soup, such as squash or sweet potato, and a main course such as French toast or pasta with tofu.

They enjoyed what they were doing so much, she said, "that we decided to take it to the next level. We sent out menus to private homes and to offices, and we have had requests for meals. We're working on getting into some schools."

The venture, DANI Dairy Delights, is under the supervision of COR, and Sokol praised the Kashruth Council for "being supportive from the first moment we contacted them."

The menu includes "some amazing food such as grilled vegetables, veggie sandwiches, a tuna wrap and fantastic cinnamon buns."

"The kids are so proud of themselves when they see what they have accomplished, and they love to eat the leftovers. It's wonderful to watch them work. Everyone thinks that they have to do things for the kids, but our kids want to do for others. People now see them in a different light."

Their project had a ripple effect, she said. "My daughter, Talya, who is 26 and cognitively disabled, does a lot more at home now."

The following recipes are from Dani Delights, a cookbook that brings together recipes from parents, DANI kids and community "celebrities."

SWEET POTATO SOUP

2 tbsp. margarine/butter
2 onions, diced
2 sweet potatoes, peeled and diced
2 potatoes, peeled and diced
2 carrots
8 cups vegetable broth
2 tbsp. orange juice

In a large soup pot, melt margarine over low heat. Add onions and sauté until softened. Add rest of vegetables, broth and orange juice and bring to a boil. Cover and simmer for 30 minutes or until veggies are soft. Let cool. Purée in blender. Add extra stock or water to thin if needed.

BAKED FRENCH TOAST

1 loaf challah bread cut into cubes
7 eggs
2 1/2 cups milk
1 1/2 tsp. vanilla
1/2 cup melted butter
2 tbsp. maple syrup
1 cup brown sugar

Preheat oven to 350. Put cubed challah into a prepared 9 x 13 baking dish. In a mixing bowl combine eggs, milk, vanilla and pour over challah. Refrigerate overnight. Before baking, combine melted butter, syrup and sugar in a mixing bowl, and pour over challah cubes. Bake for about 40-45 minutes, until brown and puffy.

Bin Laden hit symbolic victory for U.S. and Obama

Avi Issacharoff and Amos Harel
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Despite the hours of celebration in the United States, the killing of Osama bin Laden is far from being a deathblow to Al Qaeda, nor will it end the activities of the myriad of groups operating under the global jihad umbrella.

Al Qaeda isn't an ordered, structured organization, and bin Laden wasn't the commander of the extremist Muslims operating in Yemen, Iraq or North Africa, and even not of those using his name in the Gaza Strip. He did not give those groups orders, and most of them were able to fund themselves without receiving assistance from the Tora Bora mountains or from Pakistan. Moreover, his death will serve as a catalyst to attempts by countless members of Muslim extremist groups to conduct revenge attacks against American and western targets.

But, and this is a big "but," his killing is nothing less than a triumph for American military deterrence. It is a symbolic victory in a war whose battlefield is public opinion, and where symbolism rules supreme.

Analysis

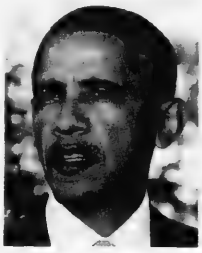
The fact that a team of U.S. soldiers can reach bin Laden's hideout and take him out, without any casualties on the American side, sends a message to all Al Qaeda supporters: the United States is no longer a paper tiger and it has the ability to reach anyone who tries to hurt it. Or, as Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan said, this is "a lesson to the whole world."

And perhaps one picture taken in Jenin clarifies more than anything the meaning of this killing for the entire Middle East: the image shows an Islamic jihad operative, wounded during the intifadah by Israel Defence Forces fire, holding bin Laden's picture and mourning his death.

It's hard not to admire the way in which U.S. intelligence managed to get to bin Laden – without drones or precision airstrikes. It was a ground operation that included a break-in at the house on the outskirts of Islamabad in which the Al Qaeda leader was hiding and shooting him in the head.

This kind of operation requires not only amazingly precise intelligence, but also a skilled force capable of making its way to the house undetected, and then breaking in. The lack of American casualties may also indicate how great was the Al Qaeda leader's surprise that the soldiers had reached him and his men. One can only hazard a guess as to how many times the story of the bin Laden operation will be retold, and even receive the Hollywood treatment, given that this was a man the United States intelligence had been trying to reach well before 9-11.

It probably won't hurt U.S. President Barack Obama ahead of an upcoming election year, with this significant achievement to be added to his credit, despite his utter lack of military experience.



U.S. President Barack Obama

Obama, who has been perceived as a weak figure desperately attempting to nudge closer to the Muslim world, succeeded where the former U.S. president George W. Bush failed. He managed to bring the head of the great Satan to the American public without embarking on two wars. And indeed Obama, who was so criticized for his foreign policy, for his misunderstanding of the Middle East and the Muslim world, reached such a symbolic victory: clean, quick, without casualties, and even almost without any casualties from among the civilians surrounding bin Laden during his final moments.

This operation, swift as it was, does quite a bit to alter Obama's image from that of a president who shies away from military confrontations or using force. But primarily it rehabilitates the image of the U.S. military, which, while making substantial gains in Afghanistan in recent years, has lacked the kind of symbols that would strike a chord with the Middle Eastern consciousness.

Despite the celebrations and achievements, the war against global jihad is like emptying the sea with a teaspoon, as former Shin Bet director Avi Dichter once said. This is highlighted by the raised level of alert at U.S. embassies across the world.

Bin Laden will probably be succeeded by an operational successor. It may be Ayman al-Zawahri – unless he was wounded in the attack – or perhaps a less familiar figure. But no successor would be able to recreate the kind of aura surrounding bin Laden. But from now on, any replacement or successor will know that he is living on borrowed time.

Hamas condemns bin Laden slaying

Jack Khoury
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The Palestinian Islamist group Hamas on Monday condemned the killing by U.S. forces of Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden and mourned him as an "Arab holy warrior."

"We regard this as a continuation of the American policy based on oppression and the shedding of Muslim and Arab blood," Ismail Haniyeh, head of the Hamas administration in Gaza, told reporters.

Though he noted doctrinal differences between bin Laden's Al Qaeda and Hamas, Haniyeh said: "We condemn the assassination and the killing of an Arab holy warrior. We ask God to offer him mercy with the true believers and the martyrs."

Haniyeh's comments came after an earlier remark by a Palestinian Authority spokesperson who said bin Laden's killing was "good for the cause of peace."

"Getting rid of bin Laden is good for the cause of peace worldwide, but what counts is to overcome the discourse and the methods – the violent methods – that were created and encouraged by bin Laden and others in the world," Ghassan Khatib said.

The PA's comments came after an announcement by U.S. President Barack Obama late Sunday that bin Laden, who masterminded the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on the United States had been killed and the U.S. had recovered his body, Hamas and Fatah announced last week their intention to reconcile, after a four-year-long bitter and at times violent rift that left Hamas administering Gaza and the West Bank under the control of the Fatah-dominated Palestinian Authority.

Palestinian officials said last Friday that Egypt invited Palestinian leaders to Cairo for the signing of the reconciliation agreement, which was scheduled to take place Wednesday.

IDF destroyed reactor: IAEA

Israel struck a nuclear reactor when it allegedly bombed a Syrian site in 2007, the head of the international nuclear watchdog said. Yukiya Amano, who heads the International Atomic Energy Agency, said the structure in the Syrian desert destroyed by Israeli warplanes was definitely a nuclear reactor, Associated Press reported. It marked the first time the UN agency has confirmed that a nuclear reactor was located at the site. Amano made his comments at a news conference on the fallout from Japan's Fukushima nuclear plant disaster. Syria denies it has ever developed a nuclear weapons program. Israel has never confirmed or denied the strike.

Egyptians would cancel treaty

More than half of Egyptians feel the peace treaty with Israel should be annulled, a new poll found. Some 54 per cent want to cancel the treaty, with 36 per cent saying it should be maintained. Some 10 per cent said they don't know, according to a nationwide survey by the Pew Research Center's Global Attitudes Project. Some 71 per cent of Egyptians said a democracy is preferable to any other type of government, up from 60 per cent last year.

How Osama bin Laden was taken out

Natasha Mozgovaya
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WASHINGTON — The question of who was living in the compound in Pakistan where Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden was hiding in recent months had become a source of concern for American intelligence officials, according to senior officials in the U.S. administration and the country's intelligence agencies.

U.S. President Barack Obama confirmed late Sunday that American forces had killed the Al Qaeda chief in a raid at the compound, and recovered his body. Four helicopters had swooped in and bin Laden was killed in the fiery American assault on his fortress-like compound in a town that is home to three army regiments.

American analysts had checked the information that piled up, "from every possible angle," and came to the conclusion that there was no one else who matched the profile of a potentially significant resident as well as bin Laden.

"We were confident there was a high-value target hidden in the compound," one official said.

"We tried to establish whether the terrorist who lives there is Osama Bin Laden," a senior administration official said in a briefing to reporters. "We tracked his personal couriers. One courier in particular got our attention, the protégé of Khaled Sheikh Mohamad, the mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks."

The official said that detainees also recognized this man as a courier for bin Laden. "Four years ago, we uncovered his identity. We identified the areas in Pakistan where they operated."

The official said the heavy security surrounding the compound aroused the suspicions of intelligence officials as far back as eight months ago. "In August 2010, we found the residence. It is an extraordinary, unique compound, eight times larger than the other homes in the town," the U.S. official added.

"In the last six years, some residential homes were built there. The security was extraordinary. Access to the compound was restricted by two security gates," the official continued. There was no Internet installed on the premises, and they could not ascertain the source of the wealth of the compound's owners.

"Our best assessment is that bin Laden was living there with several wives, including his youngest wife," the official said.

The house in the town of Abbottabad was, according to a U.S. official, custom built to hide someone of significance. Abbottabad is about 96 kilometres from the capital Islamabad, far from the remote mountain caves along the Pakistan-Afghanistan tribal border where most intelligence assessments had put bin Laden in recent years.

The house was close to the gate of the Kakul Military Academy, an army-run institution where top officers train.

An American administration official said the compound was built in 2005 at the end of a narrow dirt road with extraordinary security measures. He said it had 12- to 18-feet walls topped with barbed wire, as well as the two security gates and lack of access by telephone or Internet.

A Pakistan intelligence official said the property was 3,000 square feet. Discovery of the location raised pointed questions about whether Pakistani authorities had known the whereabouts of the world's most wanted man.

Critics have long accused some elements of Pakistan's security establishment of protecting bin Laden, though Islamabad has always denied this. Ties between the United States and Pakistan have reached a low point in recent months over the future of Afghanistan, and any hint of possible Pakistani collusion with bin Laden could make things worse, despite the jubilation over getting America's No. 1 enemy.

One Pakistani official said the choppers took off from a Pakistani air base, suggesting there was some co-operation on the raid. But U.S. President Barack Obama did not thank Pakistan in his statement on bin Laden's death.

Pakistan's foreign office hailed the death as a breakthrough in the international campaign against militancy, and noted Al-Qaeda had declared war on Pakistan and killed thousands of Pakistani civilians and security officers.

It stressed that the operation to kill bin Laden was an American one, and did not address any concerns about whether Pakistani officials may have been protecting bin Laden in some way. Domestically, the government may yet face criticism by political opponents and Islamists for allowing U.S. forces to kill bin Laden on its soil.

Pakistani officials said a son of bin Laden and three other people were killed. Other unidentified males were taken away from the scene by helicopter, while four children and two women were arrested and left in an ambulance, the official said.

A witness and a Pakistani official said bin Laden's guards opened fire from the roof of the compound in the small northwestern town of Abbottabad, and one of the choppers crashed. However U.S. officials said no Americans were hurt in the operation. The sound of at least two explosions rocked Abbottabad as the fighting raged.

It was not known how long bin Laden had been in Abbottabad, which is less than half a day's drive from the border region with Afghanistan.

Salman Riaz, a film actor, said that five months ago, he and a crew tried to do some filming next to the house, but were told to stop by two men who came out. "They told me that this is haram [forbidden in Islam]," he said.

'Sober satisfaction' at the news

But I hope they can find some comfort in the fact that justice has been done.

"At the State Department, we've been working to forge worldwide anti-terrorist co-operation," Clinton said. "Continued co-operation will be just as important in the days ahead. Because the battle to stop Al Qaeda won't stop with the death of bin Laden, we must redouble our efforts."

Bin Laden was for years sheltered by the Taliban in Afghanistan, leading to a U.S. invasion that toppled the Taliban regime there in late 2001 and ushering in a nearly decade-long war between U.S.-led forces and the Islamist group.

The American Jewish Committee hailed the news of bin Laden's death.

"We express our heartfelt admiration and appreciation to the United States government for the relentless pursuit of bin Laden, who had the blood of thousands on his hands," said executive director David Harris.

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Canadian Council for Jewish and Israel Advocacy (CIJA) and of the Canada-Israel Committee, said the Canadian Jewish community felt "sober satisfaction" at the news of bin Laden's death and that the terrorist mastermind had "met his appropriate end.

"However, we would exercise extreme caution and warn against complacency with respect to the continuing threat posed by Islamic extremism. The fact that Osama bin Laden is no longer on the scene does not diminish the very real threat, not only of its continuation, but of its expansion in the time ahead," Fogel said.

Former Montrealers killed in Marrakech

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

A Jewish woman who grew up and married in Montreal and her Moroccan-born husband were among the victims in the April 28 terror bombing of a café in Marrakech, Morocco, that reportedly killed at least 16 people.

Twenty-eight-year-old Michal Zekry-Wizman, who was five months pregnant with a second child, and her husband, Messod Wizman, 30, were in a café waiting for their nearby hotel room to be readied when the attack, reportedly linked to Al Qaeda, occurred.

The couple was in Morocco to visit Messod's family, who were taking care of the couple's two-year-old son, David, in Casablanca, at the time of the attack.

Zekry-Wizman and her husband had moved to Shanghai, China, four years ago after their marriage in Montreal. Last Friday, Michal's parents, Jacques and Simone Zekry, were preparing to depart Montreal for the couple's May 2 burial in Israel, Michal's birthplace. The Zekry family had moved from Israel to Montreal when Michal was a child.

According to a friend who spoke with The CJN, Zekry-Wizman attended École Maïmonide and graduated from the Université de Montréal.

Rabbi Shalom Greenberg, the Chabad rabbi in Shanghai, was quoted as being shocked at the murders and described the couple as, "special people, generous, with pure souls."

Evidence collected from the explosion last Thursday in the Moroccan city confirmed it was a bomb attack, the country's interior ministry said.

"Analysis of the early evidence collected at the site of the blast that occurred on Thursday at a cafe in Marrakech confirms the theory of an attack," the ministry said in a statement carried by the country's official MAP news agency.

The blast ripped through the second story of the Cafe Argana, which overlooks Marrakech's Jamaa el-Fnaa square, a spot usually bustling with tourists and local vendors.

Officials didn't say if they suspected the involvement of Islamist terror groups. The groups' last major attacks came in a series of suicide bombings in Morocco's commercial capital, Casablanca, in 2003, that killed more than 45 people.

Two people in Marrakech told Reuters the explosion was the work of a suicide bomber, but there was no immediate confirmation of this.

"I heard a massive blast. The first and second floors of the building were destroyed," said one local woman, who didn't want to be identified. "Some witnesses said they have seen a man carrying a bag entering the cafe before the blast occurred."

The roof over the restaurant's upstairs terrace was ripped off by the force of the explosion, and pieces of plaster and electrical wires hung from the ceiling.

The interior ministry issued a statement saying the explosion killed 14 people, including an undisclosed number of foreigners, and injured another 20 people.

Moroccan TV later issued a statement saying that 10 of those killed in the explosion were foreigners, six of whom were French.

The blast is likely to hurt Morocco's tourism trade – a major source of revenue – which is already struggling to recover from the effects of the global downturn.

"Marrakech is the main tourist destination in Morocco, and Argana Cafe has been one of the most popular cafes in the square," said a Frenchman who owns a restaurant in the city.

Hamas, Fatah agree to unite

JTA

JERUSALEM — Hamas leader Khaled Meshaal arrived in Cairo on Sunday to sign an Egyptian-brokered deal to end a rift between his Palestinian group and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' rival Fatah, Egypt's state news agency reported.

Egypt has invited Palestinian leaders, including Meshaal, to Cairo for the signing ceremony, due later this week.

It is the first trip by the Damascus-based Hamas leader to Cairo since a popular uprising toppled Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak from power in February.

The reconciliation accord, which was initialled by senior Hamas and Fatah officials in Cairo last week, calls for setting up a unity government that would run the West Bank and Gaza Strip and prepare for Palestinian elections within a year.

Khaled Meshaal

Israeli leaders condemned the accord and said that Abbas must choose between reconciliation with Hamas or peace with Israel.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu told his cabinet Sunday that a recent unity agreement between long-warring Palestinian factions Hamas and Fatah should be a cause for concern for "all those in the world who aspire to see peace between us and our Palestinian neighbours." A future peace between Israel and the Palestinians will be created "only with those who want to be on our side, and not those who want our annihilation," Netanyahu said.

It was not immediately clear if Meshaal would meet Egypt's military ruler, Field Marshall Mohammed Hussein Tantawi, but any meeting between the Hamas leader and Egypt's top political leaders would have been unthinkable when Mubarak was in power.

The Palestinians will continue to handle any peace negotiations with Israel despite the Fatah-Hamas unity agreement, Abbas said.

He told reporters last Thursday that the Palestine Liberation Organization, which he heads, will continue to be responsible for handling negotiations, Ha'aretz reported. Hamas, which is designated as a terrorist organization by Israel, the United States and the European Union, is not a member of the PLO.

The new unity government "has nothing to do with politics," Abbas said.

Israel has said that it will not negotiate with Hamas, which does not recognize the Jewish state and calls for its destruction. The new unity government also poses a dilemma for the U.S. administration, which has funnelled hundreds of millions of dollars to the Fatah-led PA but has pledged not to support or deal with a government comprising Hamas. That would only change if Hamas renounced violence, pledged to uphold existing agreements with Israel and recognized Israel's right to exist, U.S. officials have said.

Last Thursday, top Hamas official Mahmoud al-Zahar said his organization would not participate in peace talks with Israel, Ynet reported. But, Zahar said, Hamas will not stop its partners from talking to Israel. "If Fatah wants to negotiate with Israel over trivialities, they can," he reportedly said.

Hamas and Fatah has been at odds since Hamas violently ousted Fatah from the Gaza Strip in 2007, about a year after Hamas surpassed Fatah in legislative elections.

In a statement issued last week Wednesday, Netanyahu said the reconciliation "shows the weakness of the Palestinian Authority and causes one to wonder if Hamas will seize control of Judea and Samaria, like it seized control of the Gaza Strip."

'Artisan' kitchen produces grain-free foods

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Back in 2002, Jodi Bager walked into a health food store on Yonge Street that sold gluten-free products. She had been baking grain-free – and hence, gluten-free – items in her own kitchen for some time after she had developed ulcerative colitis during her first pregnancy.

Family and friends agreed her muffins and biscotti were tasty and easy on the system. Baked with almond flour, they went even further than the gluten-free items marketed by the store for people with various food sensitivities.

Armed with that knowledge, she pressed her case with the store manager, who, after a tasting, agreed the pastries were delicious and asked if she could supply several dozen.

Back at home, Bager started baking large quantities. "That's how it started," said her husband, Steven.

From that humble beginning, the Bagers expanded their business from their basement kitchen to a commercial facility in North York. Although they now employ five people, including their former nanny, Lougie, who is the head baker, it's still an artisan-style of production with hand-mixing and baking. Sales, however, are counted in the high six figures.

Incorporated a few years ago, today Grain-Free JK Gourmet produces muffins and biscotti for dozens of stores across the GTA and ships them as far as Victoria and Prince Edward Island.

Although baked goods formed the foundation for their business, in recent years the enterprise has expanded big time with the addition of five flavours of grain-free granola, as well as granola bars. They also are the exclusive Canadian distributors of a brand of almond flour that is a fine and powdery, unlike the coarser variety more commonly found. These now account for 90 per cent of their business, Steven said.

The granolas and baked goods are a premium product and are priced accordingly, said Steven, the company's head of marketing and sales.

Appealing to a niche market, JK Gourmet is growing by 20 to 25 per cent per year. The company's products are available in the GTA in specialty food stores such as The Big Carrot, Bruno's Fine Foods, Chapman's Essential Foods, Daiter's Fresh Market, Noah's Natural Foods, Nortown Foods, and Pusateri's, as well as Whole Foods and even one Shopper's outlet.

Steven said "our brand is well known in a small community. We love our customers, and they seem to love us. We have relationships with our customers. We have no third-party distributors."

The products are already fairly pricey – a 350-gram bag of granola sells for $9.99 – and "a middleman would mark it up and it would become unaffordable," he said.

All the granola is still hand-mixed based on recipes designed by Jodi, he continued.

Based on an informal taste tasting by discerning consumers at The CJN, the granola recipes are a big hit. And given that so many people in the Jewish community suffer from various digestive issues, Steven believes this is still a largely untapped market.

About 18 months ago, the firm receive a KSA kashrut certification, enabling it to expand into a market with many who are sensitive to gluten products.

Jodi believes her experience is one shared by many others.

Eleven years ago, when she was struck with colitis, she embarked on the standard medically approved treatments. She was prescribed various powerful medications, including prednisone, but she was concerned about all the side effects that came with it.

"Jodi was convinced that what she ate would affect how she felt, so she tried several diets," Steven said. Some did not help, while others were too bland or boring to maintain for any length of time.

Then she read a book by Elaine Gottschall called Breaking the Vicious Cycle, which directed her to the "specific carbohydrate diet (SCD)." It called for the elimination of all complex carbohydrates, such as breads, pasta and potatoes, as well as refined sugar and processed foods.

"Honey is your only sweetener," Steven said.

Jodi found that the diet worked. "She started feeling better within two to three months. There was a marked improvement in her condition."

She joined the online SCD community, even becoming "a guru and mentor" to other people, her husband said.

She was baking for herself and her stepfather, who suffers from celiac disease, using almond flour and even bringing desserts into restaurants in her "magic bag."

When she started supplying the health food store on Yonge, which is now defunct, it turned out many people who were looking for a gluten and grain-free alternative were impressed.

Jodi and Steven Bager

News of the products "travelled by word of mouth" and as demand increased, Jodi gave up a career as a teacher to devote herself to her growing business, while Steven left his job in management and marketing.

After they launched their website (www.jkgourmet.com), they began receiving orders from across the country and from the United States. They even have one customer who lives in Hong Kong and picks up his package of JK treats at a U.S. address.

In 2005 Jodi and Jenny Lass co-authored Grain-Free Gourmet: Delicious Recipes for Health Living and followed that up in 2008 with Everyday Grain-Free Gourmet: Breakfast, Lunch and Dinner. Both are Canadian bestsellers.

As for Jodi, she's in remission and drug-free. "It is this journey to health through diet that inspired Grain-Free JK Gourmet's delicious, nutritious products," she said.

First-time novelist inspired by Venice's old ghetto

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Roberta Rich, a former family law lawyer who has been writing since high school, has written her first novel, The Midwife of Venice (Doubleday Canada), which was published recently.

A historical novel taking place in 16th-century Venice and Malta and focusing on a Jewish woman who risks execution by delivering a Christian woman's baby, it was inspired by a trip to Italy.

Four years ago, she and her husband, Ken, were touring Venice when inspiration struck.

"We were on a walking tour of the Jewish ghetto, which, if you haven't seen it for yourself, is like a movie set of narrow, dark buildings and several synagogues, tucked away on second and third floors, out of view," she said.

"Walking up the staircases and through musty passages and narrow streets strung with drying laundry, I began to wonder what life must have been for Jews who flocked to the ghetto as one of the few safe havens available at the time," she added.

With these ideas racing through her mind, Rich thought she had the makings of a novel. "I started thinking about my characters and a plot almost immediately after visiting the ghetto," she recalled. "Within a few weeks, I had a pretty good sense of the character and how I wanted the plot to progress."

Hannah Levi, the character of her imagination, is an extremely skilled midwife whose services are desperately required by a Catholic nobleman, Paolo de Padovani.

His wife has been in labour for two days and three nights, yet the child will not be born. He is at his wit's end.

Levi, a compassionate person, is touched, but she knows it is illegal and punishable by death for a Jew to render medical assistance to a Christian. Nonetheless, she decides to assist the count. Her altruism is skin-deep. She wants to help her husband, Isaac, a captive slave on the island of Malta.

Before writing her first novel, Rich, not much of a history buff until then, immersed herself in that era by reading. "An historical novelist needs to know the people of a particular period," she explained. "What they ate. How they entertained themselves. How they had sex. How they lit their homes. All of this is fairly easy to find in books."

Harder to ascertain, she added, was how "ordinary people" related to the world and themselves, and how they regarded marriage and children.

To find out, she read books such as Private Lives in Renaissance Venice, The Ghetto of Venice, Women and Men in Renaissance Venice and Venice: Lion City. "I also read Justine, Court Midwife, a very gruesome book about midwifery in the 1700s, and Cecil Roth's History of the Jews in Venice, which is wonderful."

A friend, Rhoda Friedricks, a professor of early modern history, was helpful, too. "She set me straight on a number of things," said Rich.

In delving into 16th-century Venice, she was especially fascinated by its development as a mercantile hub.

"It was a commercial centre par excellence, thanks in part to the role that Jewish merchants played in opening Venice to Middle East trade routes. City fathers often protected Venetian Jews, while the Vatican wanted to expel them. It was an interesting and delicate dynamic."

As well, Rich was drawn to the theme of Jewish captives in Malta. "Jews were highly prized as captives because it was well-known that even if a Jew was poor, there was a Jewish community somewhere that would pay handsomely for his release."

And as she noted, there was yet another element in the mix. "Jewish traders in Venice levied a cargo tax on all ships leaving the port carrying goods belonging to Jewish merchants. The tax was designed to ransom Jews who had been captured by the Knights of Jerusalem or pirates."

Having completed her research, Rich sat down to write.

"Plotting was always the greatest challenge. The story unfolds from two points of views, Hannah in Venice and Isaac in Malta. But in early drafts, I had a much stronger plot revolving around Hannah. It was not until I came up with Isaac as a character that his portion of the book started to take shape."

Having once been riveted by a speech on the creative process delivered by the American novelist Barbara Kingsolver, she likened the genesis of The Midwife of Venice to the growth of a forest.

Roberta Rich

"A variety of acorns, pine cones and maple seedlings drop to the ground," she said. "Some are carried away in a stream, some are eaten by wild pigs, some never sprout, some grow into saplings, and some mature into trees."

Much to her fortune, Rich's manuscript was immediately accepted by a publisher. "Despite the unhappy state of the publishing industry today, my editor fell in love with it and helped me immeasurably to revise it into a publishable state."

Rich, born in Buffalo, N.Y., began writing when she was a student in high school. "I wrote what I considered very witty plays about two-dimensional girls."

After taking a BA degree in English and anthropology, she studied law at the University of British Columbia.

In 1976, she opened a family law practice with a friend in Vancouver. She enjoyed it, but sold her share in 1999. "Practising law taught me nothing about good writing, although a few judges said that my legal briefs sounded more like novels than legal arguments."

In retrospect, she said, her days as a lawyer proved to be of value when she turned to writing.

As she put it, "Family law is replete with interesting stories and teaches you a lot about the relationship between men and women and the frailties of the human heart."

Rich, who divides her time between Vancouver and the town of Colima in Mexico, is already working on a sequel.

"I'm very excited about it. My Venetian characters, Hannah and Isaac, are living happily in Constantinople when Isaac's sister-in-law arrives and shatters their lives in an unexpected way."

Rags-to-riches careers in the cosmetics industry

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

The paths of Helena Rubinstein and Eugene Schueller never crossed as they pursued their rags-to-riches careers. But they were cut from the same cloth. Both were titans in the multi-billion-dollar international cosmetics industry.

Rubinstein shot to fame with an all-purpose facial cream. Schueller concocted the first safe artificial hair dye and founded the L'Oreal empire.

Long after they died, their worlds collided when L'Oreal bought Rubinstein's company. Given their respective backgrounds, L'Oreal's acquisition was supremely ironic. Rubinstein, a Polish Jew from Krakow, lost relatives in the Holocaust. Schueller, a Catholic from Paris, supported the pro-German Vichy regime during Germany's occupation of France.

Ruth Brandon, a British historian and novelist, explores their lives in a fascinating and thoughtful book, Ugly Beauty: Helena Rubinstein, L'Oreal, and the Blemished History of Looking Good (McClelland & Stewart).

Although they shared many traits, Rubinstein and Schueller could not have been more different.

Described by Brandon as "the first woman tycoon" and "the first self-made female millionaire," Rubinstein was a myth maker. In her two memoirs, she created a self-serving illusion about her early days in Poland.

She claimed that she and her family lived in the lap of luxury and that her father was a prosperous wholesale food broker who collected books and fine furniture. Further embroidering this tall tale, she claimed that she had once been a medical student.

The truth was more prosaic.

The Rubinsteins were poor Jews who resided in Kazimierz, a dingy neighbourhood that has since been gentrified for the benefit of Polish and foreign tourists. Her father was a struggling kerosene dealer who supplemented his income by selling eggs. She studied at a local Jewish school rather than at a medical school.

Eugene Schueller

Despite her flights of fancy, Rubinstein was an impressive woman. Having started her first beauty salon in Australia, she cracked open markets in London, Paris and New York, trading on her intelligence, astuteness, hard work and lucky timing.

"But what made her (and her competitors) so very rich, so fast, was the markup: the difference between cheap raw materials and the astounding prices charged for the finished product," Brandon writes.

A keen analyst of human behaviour, Rubinstein quickly discovered that high prices did not deter sales. If a line failed, she would typically raise the price, and sales would rise. Rubinstein also courted the press, realizing that newspaper articles were not only free, but more effective than expensive advertisements.

As her business grew, she stumbled upon another timeless truth. It is better to sell four different facial creams for four different purposes than one cream for one purpose.

Devoted to her family, Rubinstein employed all but one of her eight sisters. She married a Polish Jew, Edward Titus, but loved her business more. Her second husband, a sweet-tempered Georgian prince 23 years her junior who supposedly slept with her only once and had a roving eye, was content to be Mr. Helena Rubinstein.

Helena Rubinstein at the age of 16

Although she moved in elite circles, she was not immune to anti-Semitism. When she tried to buy a 26-room triplex in Manhattan, she was refused. As was common during that racist era, the building had a no-Jews policy. Enraged, she purchased the building. Yet Rubinstein was a snob. She declined to live in New York City's Upper West Side because it was "too Jewish."

And she could be cold and unfeeling. When the painter Marc Chagall asked her for a loan to help relatives escape from Nazi Germany, she told him to try elsewhere. After the war, she was an ardent supporter of Israel.

Upon Rubinstein's death, her company declined. Her children, nephews and nieces were not up to the task of running the business. In 1988, L'Oreal acquired it.

Like Rubinstein, Schueller was not to the manor born. A chemist, he was industrious and ambitious, a visionary who catered to every women's dread of gray hairs and wrinkles.

A social reformer, Schueller was a conservative authoritarian philosophically. His decision to throw in his lot with Vichy France and the Germans, Brandon says, was governed less by doctrine than by pragmatism.

Only collaboration with the powers-that-be ensured L'Oreal's access to scarce raw materials. As a result, its profits quadrupled between 1940 and 1944.

Though he consorted with antisemites and belonged to an anti-Jewish organization, Schueller claimed he helped Jews and hated racism. The French authorities believed him. After the war, he was twice acquitted of industrial collaboration. Had he been found guilty, his business would have been nationalized.

Ugly Beauty takes on a darker tone when Brandon examines the postwar period, during which L'Oreal acquired Rubinstein's company.

The L'Oreal executive who instigated the deal, Jacques Correze, was a wartime fascist and Jew-baiter.

"He had even the chutzpah to visit Israel... to negotiate the sale of Helena Rubinstein's Israeli branch and the closure of its manufacturing operation there," she notes, adding that L'Oreal divested itself of it to appease Arab governments and wriggle off the Arab economic boycott.

To add insult to injury, L'Oreal's vice-president, Andre Bettencourt, was tainted, too. A man who once compared Jews to vomit, he was a former diplomat and cabinet minister who was received by Israeli prime minister Golda Meir and was France's official representative at the funeral of prime minister David Ben-Gurion.

When Bettencourt resigned in disgrace in 1994, he was replaced by his son-in-law, Jean-Pierre Meyers, a Jew whose grandfather was murdered in Auschwitz.

Such ironies abound in Ugly Beauty, a book that at once glorifies and diminishes Rubinstein and Schueller.

Festival presents an eclectic selection of films

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

As usual, this year's edition of the Toronto Jewish Film Festival is immaculately eclectic, satisfying virtually all tastes.

David Kaufman's Song of the Lodz Ghetto (May 8 at 9 p.m. at the Cineplex Odeon Sheppard Centre)is a hybrid in the best sense of the word. An excellent historical survey of the first sealed Nazi ghetto in Poland, it unfolds to the barbed lyrics of street troubadour Yankele Herszcowicz, who spoke to the fears, anguish, hopes and resentments of its doomed inhabitants and who, miraculously, survived the Holocaust and went back to Lodz after the war.

The accomplished klezmer band Brave Old World recreates his melodies with panache. Graphic file footage of Germany's invasion of Poland and of everyday life in the ghetto are counterpoints to Herszcowicz's edgy songs. Eyewitnesses, experts and survivors offer vivid accounts of Herszcowicz and of Nazi brutalities and deportations.

Kaufman's appraisal of ghetto elder Chaim Rumkowski is nuanced. On the one hand, Rumkowski was an egoist who revelled in a twisted cult of personality. On the other hand, his rescue-through-work strategy, though deeply flawed, saved some lives.

Leonard Cohen: Bird on a Wire (May 10 at 7 p.m. at the TIFF Bell Lighthouse) catches Canada's famous poet and composer/singer on a 20-city tour of Europe and the Middle East in 1972 that began in Dublin and ended in Jerusalem.

Cohen, then 37, is in a pensive and playful mood as he travels from one concert to the next, belting out soulful hits and making pithy observations. In one comment, he says that cantorial music forms an integral component of his style. In Tony Palmer's road movie, Cohen is all over the map, engaging fans seeking autographs and flirting with an attractive woman he probably intends to seduce.

Shimon Peres, Self-Portrait (May 10 at 6:30 p.m. at the Cineplex Odeon Sheppard Centre), a documentary from France, is a biopic of Israel's current president, a deeply committed Zionist who has filled virtually every pivotal post in the Israeli government.

This hagiographic film finds Peres in a mellow mood as he recalls his childhood in a shtetl without electricity, his immigration to Palestine ("I was waiting all my life to leave for the place of my dreams") and his stint as a shepherd on a kibbutz.

Peres hoped to become a poet or an architect, but with a war looming, David Ben-Gurion, Israel's first prime minister, summoned his protégé to the Haganah. Charged with breaking the arms embargo against the newly created State of Israel, Peres proved adept, convincing his bosses that he was "essential" rather than merely "important."

Appointed deputy defence minister following the 1948 war, Peres played an integral role in the formation

Life is Too Long* is a bittersweet comedy.

Children in the Lodz ghetto of Israel's alliance with France and in Israel's decision to build a nuclear reactor in Dimona. Eventually, he succeeded Yitzhak Rabin as prime minister. The film glosses over Peres' bumpy road to the prime minister's office, but gives him ample room to reflect on leaders he knew (Anwar Sadat and Yasser Arafat), on the nature of politics and on the prospect for peace.

Arab Labor (May 11 at 5:15 p.m. at the Al Green Theatre and May 15 at 1 p.m. at Silver City Richmond Hill) is the title of an uproarious Israeli television comedy that gently satirizes the fraught relationship between Jews and Arabs in Israel. The central character, Amjad Elian, is an upwardly mobile Israeli Arab journalist who seeks a ticket of admission to mainstream Israeli society while preserving his Arab identity.

In several episodes from Arab Labor's second season, Elian stumbles upon the hard facts of life in Israel after buying a flat in a Jewish neighbourhood in Jerusalem. As he prepares to move, a Jewish friend advises him that grievances can best be resolved through vocal agitation, while an Arab mover tries to extort extra payments from him.

Meanwhile, Amjad's fussy wife, Bushra, discovers that proper water pressure in a shower stall trumps Arabic identity, and Amjad is stereotypically mistaken for a janitor. Realizing her appalling error, Amjad's new Jewish neighbour, a neurotic woman with leftist political sympathies, tries in hilarious fashion to make amends.

Pnina Feiler: A Communist Nurse (May 8 at 1 p.m. at the Al Green Theatre) is about a feisty 85-year-old kibbutznik and pacifist who crosses into the West Bank regularly to work as a volunteer in an Arab clinic. An opponent of Israel's occupation of the West Bank, she was born in Poland, where she was drawn to communism. Immigrating to Palestine in 1938, she settled on Yad Hannah, a unique kibbutz. This is a portrait of an idealist who identifies with the underdog.

Life Is Too Long (May 8 at 6:30 p.m. at the Al Green Theatre), a bittersweet comedy from Germany by Dani Levy, turns on Alfred Seliger, a coke-sniffing contemporary Jewish filmmaker whose marriage and career are spinning out of control. To add to his woes, Seliger's investment portfolio has taken a heavy hit, his daughter considers him an embarrassment and his wife is having an affair.

When his latest project – a satire on Mohammed – flounders, Seliger accepts an offer to direct four episodes of a successful TV show. Here, too, he runs into trouble.

Although the humour can be juvenile, the film is mildly entertaining.

Fracture (May 8 at 8:30 p.m. at the Cineplex Odeon Sheppard Centre), directed by Alain Tasma, is a French feature film set in an Arab-populated corner of Paris where ethnic resentments burn brightly. Anna Kagan, a Jewish history teacher with liberal inclinations, is thrown into that seething cauldron when she accepts a job at a school with a high proportion of discontented and unmotivated North African Muslim students.

Being idealistic, Anna attempts to help an Arab student whose wrist has been damaged in a botched medical procedure performed by a Jewish doctor. The plot thickens when the student exacts revenge on the physician and Anna's other students vent political views that unnerve her. A fine film dealing with topical issues.

Ingelore (May 8 at 6 p.m. at the Cineplex Odeon Sheppard Centre and May 12 at 6 p.m. at the Silver City Richmond Hill) revolves around Ingelore Herz Honigstein, a German-Jewish woman who faced persecution and sexual violence in Nazi Germany after struggling with deafness. Having immigrated to the United States in 1940, she finally found contentment. This film, made by her son, conveys both horror and happiness.

Swinging in the Dark (May 11 at 12 p.m. at the Al Green Theatre), starring the singing sensation Moishe Oysher and released in 1956, was one of the first American movies to deal with the Holocaust. Oysher portrays a European Holocaust survivor who is preyed upon by a sleazy nightclub performer. All in all, corny.

From Shtetl To Swing: A Musical Odyssey (May 10 at 6 p.m. at Silver City Richmond Hill) skilfully documents the enormous effect that Jewish immigration had on the tone and substance of American music.

The Yiddish work songs, protest songs and love songs that the migrants brought to the United States from the late 19th century onward influenced Americans such as Irving Berlin, George Gershwin, Al Jolson and Benny Goodman and left a deep impression on American culture.

From Madoff to Mendelssohn at Jewish Film Festival

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

The Toronto Jewish Film Festival kicks off its 19th season on May 7 with more than 100 movies from 21 countries.

A sampler:

The Bernard Madoff affair, the greatest financial scandal in American history, is the subject of Jeff Prosserman's hard-hitting documentary, Chasing Madoff (May 10, 5:30 p.m., at the Bloor Cinema).

A villain and a hero dominate this movie. Madoff, a wealth management adviser, solemnly promised to safeguard his clients' funds. Instead, in a $50-billion Ponzi scheme, he shamlessly swindled them, leaving some destitute. Harry Markopolos, an independent fraud investigator, was not fooled by Madoff. "The figures were too good to be true," he says.

Prosserman charts Markopolos' valiant but vain efforts to expose Madoff. Markopolos sent incriminating data to Forbes magazine, but inexplicably, it did not publish a story. He convinced the Wall Street Journal to run a piece on Madoff, but the article was ignored. Worse still, the Security & Exchange Commission, a U.S. government body, failed to investigate Madoff. Meanwhile, a host of feeder funds, which grew rich on Madoff's commissions, had no interest in exposing the scoundrel. Prosserman suggests that it took the 2009 recession to finally expose Madoff.

Mendelssohn, the Nazis and Me (May 11, 1 p.m., at the Bloor Cinema) explores the phenomenon of assimilation within the framework of Nazi antisemitism.

Sheila Hayman's intriguing film examines the lives of three descendants of Mendelssohn, the Nazis and Me

Felix Mendelssohn, the famous German composer whose parents converted to Christianity in the early 19th century. One of the descendants is her father, a mathematician who was raised as a Lutheran. Although Mendelssohn's descendants were thoroughly Christians, the Nazi authorities classified them as Jews, causing untold confusion and trauma in a family that had left its Jewish ancestry behind.

Apart from probing this issue at length, the film demonstrates how Mendelssohn incorporated Christianity into his music.

I Was There in Color (May 8, 6 pm., at the Cineplex Odeon Sheppard Centre and May 10, 12 p.m., at the Al Green Theatre) celebrates the home movies of Fred Monosson, an American Zionist who left an invaluable celluloid archive of Israel, before and after its birth in 1948.

A Boston garment manufacturer whose Zionist sympathies were stirred by a visit to a DP camp in Germany in 1945, he was a ubiquitous photographer. Always wearing a suit with a carnation in his lapel, he filmed Israeli leaders such as David Ben-Gurion, Levi Eshkol, Shimon Peres and Moshe Dayan, British soldiers in Tel Aviv and new Jewish immigrants debarking in Haifa.

He also filmed doomed settlers in Kfar Etzion, a folk music festival on a kibbutz, tractors ploughing a field, Israelis enjoying café life in Tel Aviv amid the 1948 war, Israel's first military parade after hostilities ended, Yemenite Jews arriving at Lod Airport, president Chaim Weizmann's funeral and the outbreak of the Six Day War in Jerusalem.

The director, Avishai Kfir, does a fine job in assembling Monosson's movie clips into a historically important and interesting film.

Dan Wolman's sensitive Hebrew-language feature film, Gei-Oni (May 9, 7:30 p.m., at the Bloor Cinema and May 11, 6 p.m., at Silver City Richmond Hill), unfolds in a barren, sun-baked Palestine at the close of the 19th century.

Fanya, a young Russian immigrant, arrives in Jaffa with her baby, brother and uncle. Having experienced a pogrom, they want to start a new life in a Zionist colony in the Galilee. Shortly after meeting Yechiel, a farmer and a widower with two children, Fanya agrees to marry him. It is clearly a marriage of convenience, but love blooms after hardships turning on food scarcities and disputes with local Bedouins over water rights and land ownership.

In concise and powerful strokes, Wolman recreates the making of a new Jewish society in an old land.

Gil Karni's muckraking documentary, The Invisible (May 9, 12 p.m., at the Al Green Theatre), highlights the plight of about 800 Israeli Bedouins whose unrecognized village in the Galilee is a jumble of tin huts without electricity, running water or paved roads. Having been expelled from their village in the 1950s, they must struggle to gain access to amenities that many Israelis take for granted. Their leader, Nahim Fahim, a veteran of the Israeli army, launches a campaign to acquire basic services, but he soon realizes he needs the help of Jewish politicians.

The Invisible underscores the government's short-sighted neglect of the Arab minority in Israel.

World Class Kids (May 11, 2 p.m., at the Al Green Theatre), by Netta Loevy, takes place over a year in a Grade 2 class in Tel Aviv's Tel Nordau Elementary School, where several foreign students are enrolled.

Meirav, a young and well-meaning teacher, tries hard to make these Chinese, Filipino, Arab and Russian students feel at ease. They are fluent in Hebrew and are treated equally, but the Chanukah holiday, a biblical story and an inappropriate comment by a Russian girl about Arabs make the foreign students feel like outsiders.

Loevy's fly-on-the-wall film picks up on these unsettling moments.

Yes, Miss Commander! (May 8, 5 p.m., at the Bloor Cinema) zeroes in on an Israeli army basic-training camp where male recruits from troubled backgrounds are whipped into shape by young women of their age.

The female trainers are tough enough, but they are up against argumentative and insubordinate men who do not like getting out of bed in the morning, refuse to obey orders and are loath to carry a weapon.

They are hardly the stuff of which good soldiers are made, but their trainers do not want to fail. Sparks fly as moveable objects meet irresistible forces.

Names in the News: Canadian Stage is about to present The Post Office, a play by the famous Bengali poet-playwright Rabindranath Tagore about a dying Hindu boy. The Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation has noted the following connection of the play to Jewish history.

After Janusz Korczak, an eminent Jewish doctor, became director of an orphanage within the Warsaw Ghetto, he decided that the children should stage The Post Office as "a creative unconscious means to prepare them for imminent death." Later, as Korczak and some 200 orphans were being deported to Treblinka, an SS officer offered to help him escape. Korczak refused to leave the children and was never heard from again. There is a monument of him with the children at Yad Vashem.

Musical revue celebrates Jewish life cycle

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

To Life, a new musical revue celebrating the Jewish life cycle, is having its world première this month in Toronto at the Jane Mallett Theatre: St. Lawrence Centre for the Arts.

The latest offering from the Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company, To Life is the brainchild of co-artistic director Avery Saltzman and the show's choreographer, Tim French.

The cast features a who's who of Canadian musical theatre talent that includes Patrick Cook, Gabi Epstein, Charlotte Moore and Shawn Wright. The cast will be accompanied by two pianists, musical director Mark Camilleri and Jeffrey Huard.

"It is two shows in one," Saltzman says. "The first act celebrates beautiful, iconic Jewish lives from birth to bar mitzvah and from marriage to death. It focuses on the great Jewish vaudevillians Eddie Cantor, Fanny Brice, Al Jolson and Sophie Tucker. We are not imitating these performers – we are just celebrating the essence of their lives."

The second act focuses on the time when Jewish vaudeville stars and composers left New York's Lower East Side for Broadway. The cast raises a glass to life in song, from popular Jewish-themed musicals including Fiddler on the Roof, The Rothschilds, Funny Girl, Falsettos, I Can Get It For You Wholesale, The Grand Tour and Cabaret, in addition to songs from lesser-known Jewish-themed musicals.

"Who doesn't like musicals?" asks Saltzman rhetorically. "Our audiences were asking for it, because they loved our musical fundraising event, One Night Only. So, we thought, how can we come up with a great musical? It is so onerous these days to produce or bring in a full-fledged musical with a large cast and band, especially for a not-for-profit. We decided on the musical-revue format. Believe it or not, there hasn't been a new revue in this city for such a long time. What better way to celebrate Jewish life, so we called it To Life."

Avery Saltzman

Saltzman and French have been working on the revue for more than a year, painstakingly choosing just the right music. Saltzman says that musical revue is not fluff, but rather a very difficult medium when trying to find just the right material and adding elements of surprise to keep audiences entertained.

Saltzman, a respected actor and musical theatre veteran, is a co-artistic director of the Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company, along with David Eisner. This is the first time Saltzman has created a brand-new work, and that it's specifically for the HGJTC makes him proud. Saltzman hopes To Life has a life afterward – touring North America.

"I want people to be moved and to come away with a great evening of song in celebration of the Jewish life cycle," he says. "It is not your standard four-chair revue. There is a lot of me in To Life, especially in the material I have chosen. It has a lot of heart, sentiment and spirituality. We try to move through life with grace and humour, and that is what I think I bring to the piece. So, it comes full circle from me to our audience."

The show runs from May 13 to 29. Opening night is May 17. For tickets, call 416-366-7723, or online at www.stlc.com. For group rates, call 416-932-9995, ext. 224. Visit www.hgjewishtheatre.com for more information.

Winnipeg wrestler wins national championship

Harvey Rosen
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — Wrestling dynamo Caleb Rutner added to his medal and trophy collection with a championship performance at the recently concluded Canadian National Wrestling Championships in Windsor, Ont.

Fighting in the 66-kilogram division, Rutner, 16, was also named the tournament's most outstanding wrestler, ahead of 500 other participants aged 15 to 17.

For Rutner, it wasn't necessarily a slam dunk that he would attain such recognition.

"It was a huge surprise to me. I really didn't think I was going to get it. I thought it would be nice, but I didn't expect it," he said.

The Grade 10 St. Paul's High School student also recently completed his third perfect unbeaten season as Manitoba high school champion and was named Manitoba's most outstanding wrestler. He led St. Paul's to the provincial team championship, and earlier this year, he added to his collection the gold medal in the 2011 Cadet National Championships, along with another most outstanding wrestler award.

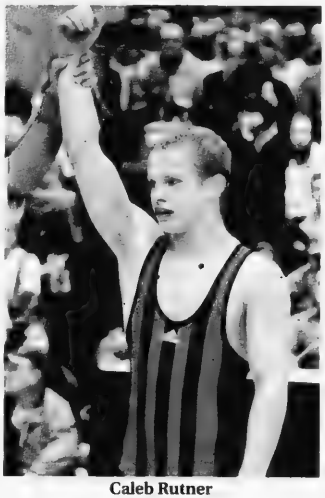
Despite his penchant for winning, Rutner doesn't always take it for granted that he is going to come out on top, even though he's been grappling with Grade 12s ever since he was in Grade 8.

"It really depends upon the event," he explained matter-of-factly. "If it's just a Manitoba or local tournament, it doesn't surprise me. If it's a national one, then yes, it does give me a surprise."

Rutner, born in Winnipeg, possesses dual citizenship and competes in national championships in the United States as a member of the North Dakota team.

"They made an exception [due to his status], and I attend a lot of tournaments in Grand Forks and I got to know a lot of people well. Training in the United States is much superior," he said.

His sporting pedigree is rich in that his dad, Toby, a local psychologist, was born in the Bronx and was himself a wrestler in his college days. He attended Nebraska State on a scholarship.



Caleb Rutner

It follows, then, that his father, would play a major role in Caleb's passion. "My dad is one of my coaches. Mike Watson is my coach at St. Paul's, but when the high school season is over, I go to the Winnipeg Wrestling Club. There is a main coach there ... and my dad is the assistant coach. Ever since I started wrestling, my dad has coached me. He's played a really big role," he said.

As well, Toby's dad, Milton "Mickey" Rutner, played major league baseball briefly with the old Philadelphia Athletics as a third baseman, and at the AAA level in Canada with the old Toronto Maple Leafs.

As for his own sport, Caleb said the amateur wrestling he excels at bears little resemblance to the pro variety on TV. That's "fake stuff," he said.

Amateur wrestling, he added, is pure sport and almost gentlemanly. "I've never really seen somebody lose their temper and just punch a person. I have seen where after a match a person is upset and is a poor sport about it and just doesn't shake the opponent's hand, but nothing extreme," he said.

As for how a winner is determined, Rutner said that "most bouts end in a decision on points, but it's better to always pin your opponent, [although] that's hard to do. The majority of bouts end in a technical fall, where you're ahead of your opponent by six points in two rounds straight in the match."

As in the game of chess, Rutner said wrestlers need to think several moves ahead of their opponent. "It's my mental strength. It is my ability to overcome adversity and also I have a very good feel for it. I always know where my body is. Some people think like they're on railroad tracks. That's very linear. I'm able to think a couple moves ahead and it really helps," he said.

As to how prevalent injuries are in amateur wrestling, he said they're "nothing major."

"They really crack down on potentially dangerous moves, so you rarely see an arm break or anything like that. I don't think I've ever seen a concussion – maybe once, but it's very rare."

Like many kids his age, Rutner isn't certain where he'll continue his education after high school. He does know, however, that he wants to continue in his sport. "I'm going to wrestle in university for sure, but I'm not sure of which one [in the United States or Canada]. The University of Manitoba has no wrestling [program]. They are trying to start one at the University of Winnipeg, but it'll take a while for it to develop into a really good one."

Not to worry. Wrestling scholarships are available south of the border, and many of those strangers in the stands at tournaments are scouts for U.S. schools.

Folk choir presents its 85th annual concert

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

The Toronto Jewish Folk Choir, Canada's longest continuing Jewish performance group, will be presenting its 85th annual spring concert May 15, 3 p.m., at the Posluns Auditorium at Baycrest.

Formed in 1925, primarily by immigrant garment workers, the choir has put on a concert every year without a break since 1926, said Linda Litwack, who joined 25 years ago for its 60th concert, and is chair of the program committee.

The concert is presented with the assistance of the Toronto Arts Council and is conducted by Alexander Veprinsky, who is in his ninth season with the choir, and accompanied by pianist Lina Zemelman, who is completing her 35th season.

"We do have some professional support singers, but many singers learn by ear and by taping the songs, not by reading music. Mostly, they just have to want to sing," she said.

To commemorate the anniversary, the concert features the choir and special guests Beyond the Pale performing In Amerike, by Winnipeg composer Sid Robinovitch. The work captures the immigrant experience.

"The six movements include a portrayal of the boat rocking as the immigrants come over, a movement describing the bright lights and noise in Montreal, another about the clanging and banging of a factory, and a slower movement about Shabbat with family. The songs are in a mix of Yiddish, Hebrew, English and more," Zemelman said.

"A lot of people at Baycrest are immigrants, and the work should really mean something to them. Many are the same age as the choir, and some are past members."

Litwack, whose husband, Charlie Sise, is also a choir member, said that the group enjoys singing together, "but also enjoy each other. We support each other, we work hard, and we laugh a lot.

"Many have been here for a number of years, and they come from Poland, Lithuania, Russia, Turkey, Holland, Belgium, South Africa, North Africa, and even Canada," she said, laughing.

Over the years, two choir members met and married, "and another two newer members recognized each from an Israeli choir from 20 years ago," she said.

Posluns Auditorium, which is wheelchair accessible, is located at the north entrance of Baycrest, second floor. General admission is $25; seniors and students, $20; children 12 and under, free. For information and tickets, call 416-789-5502 or e-mail tjfolkchoir@sympatico.ca.

Free Jewish dating site attracts 1,000 GTA singles

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

Yosi Leiba is a management consultant by day and a frequent dater by night. As the founder of MatzoDate, a new free Jewish dating website, Leiba hopes to help his fellow singles find love more easily.

While 35-year-old Leiba has been on various dating sites since 1997, he said he's never felt right about paying for the services.

"It should always be free in my opinion. There are a few adequate free dating sites out there, but none of them really cater to the Jewish community. Many of these free sites are slow, poorly designed and have a ton of advertising popping up," Leiba said.

After years of online disappointment, Leiba decided to take charge. He found some programmers and created his own free online dating site that he launched in February.

"I had the time and I had the desire because one of my close friends has always been very pro-Jewish and ended up getting engaged to someone outside of the Jewish faith.

"I figured there's a lot of people out there who don't want to pay the $30 or $40 a month for membership. So it made sense for me to help the Jewish community out and build a premium quality dating site entirely for free."

The Massachusetts Institute of Technology graduate said MatzoDate is more of a hobby than a money-maker. In fact, he's not profiting from his site.

"It's actually costing me some money to support it, but I don't mind. I'm connecting Jews with Jews and hoping to bring down that assimilation rate," said Leiba, who lives in Toronto.

Leiba estimated that about 35 per cent of Jews in Canada are marrying outside of their faith, so he sees his website as a great service to people who want to meet Jews online, without the financial obligation.

"The more people that join the better. You will never be asked for a credit card or forced into reading annoying ads. All I hope for is that I bring some Jewish couples together and they have an awesome time," he said.

As a self-proclaimed professional dater, Leiba knew exactly how he wanted MatzoDate to look.

"I didn't want to be bombarded with advertisements. I wanted everything to be simple. I also wanted a really good chat feature.

"We built a lightweight chat module with code from all over the world, and in a couple of months, we put together MatzoDate."

There are other free Jewish dating sites, including Supertova and JsoulMate.com, but Leiba said he thinks his site is newer and fresher and offers users features that include being able to "block an annoying user" and get notifications to "get into a live instant-message chat session."

At first, MatzoDate wasn't attracting many users, so Leiba decided to put together a volunteer network to spread the word. He now has 30 people from across Canada and the United States who are actively involved in promoting the site.

"With these volunteers and with our social media launch at the beginning of March, we quickly jumped to about 1,000 users in the Greater Toronto Area alone. We've had an explosive growth. People are telling people. The growth is beyond my initial forecast."

There are about 3,000 active paying members in Toronto on Jewish dating sites, Leiba said.

Across Canada, there are just under 6,000. The fact that MatzoDate attracted 1,000 members in about a month is "quite encouraging," Leiba said.

Yosi Leiba

Mike Greenspoon, a MatzoDate user, joined the site in hopes of meeting someone special. He is also a member of JDate and eHarmony, but he said MatzoDate is "much easier and more compact to use and a much faster site in general."

Greenspoon said it's not easy meeting new people without the help of online dating sites.

"People are really shy in person, but very easygoing when they are talking to a computer screen."

Leiba said he's gotten excellent response from other members as well. "We have one person, believe it or not, who found the love of his life on MatzoDate. The one and only thing I ask for in return is that if any marriages develop from this site, please send me an invitation!"

כשהייתי בת 17 קיבלו אותי לשחק בסרט בפעם השנייה בחיי (הייתי בת 12, כשהשתתפתי בסרט הראשון שלי). האודישנים נערכו לפני בחינות הבגרות, והצילומים היו אמורים להתחיל כעבור חצי שנה. באותה חצי שנה של התכוננות מלחיצה ומפרכת לבחינות, שמנתי 12 קילו(!), וגם, בתהליך של מרד, חימצנתי את השיער, ונותרתי כמעט קירחת. כשהגיע הטלפון שבישר את תחילת הצילומים, התביישתי להגיע. המלהקים הרי בחרו בי כשאני יפה, רזה וארוכת שיער, ועכשיו הייתי קציצה קצוצה... מובן שלא רציתי שהם יראו אותי כך, לכן אמרתי למלהקת, ומאוחר יותר לבמאי, שאני לא יכולה להשתתף. שניהם היו בהלם. תבינו, יותר מעשרת אלפי בני נוער עשו אודישנים, רק עשרה ילדים נבחרו, והפרינצסה לא מוכנה להופיע! היא בטח שווה שווה, הם חשבו לעצמם, וביום למחרת הסירוב המלכותי, קיבלתי טלפון. הבטיחו לי מוניות מביתי בתל-אביב לחדרה (שם צולם הסרט). סירבתי. ביום שאחרי, כבר דיברו איתי על כסף (מובן שלא היינו אמורים לקבל שכר, רק לנסוע את רגלי הבמאי על ההזדמנות...). כעברו שבוע הבטיחו הרבה יותר כסף, ואני, עם השיער השרוף והגוף השמן, נאלצתי שוב ושוב לסרב בעיקשות. מאותו רגע הבנתי כלל חשוב: בתעשיית הקולנוע, אתה לא רק חייב לשחק את התפקיד, אלא גם (ובעיקר), לשחק את המשחק...

הסרטים יוצגו בין ה-7-15 למאי, בתיאטראות אל גרין, סילבר סיטי ובלור-סינמה, במשך שעות היום והערב. מחירים: 8-13 דולר. לפרטים נוספים בקרו באתר: www.tjff.com

Drunk with sorrow, high on happiness

Yom Hazikaron. Yom Ha'atzmaut.

Look how the Jewish people juxtapose, switch around, mix up and celebrate our holidays. Consider that on May 2, Yom Hashoah, we remembered the six million holy spirits killed in the Holocaust. Seven day later, we celebrate Yom Hazikaron, the day of remembrance for the Israeli soldiers killed in the country's wars. The very next day, May 10, we throw away our ashes and rented tunics and dance in the street, raising a cup to the establishment of the State of Israel.

Are we a bipolar people, perhaps confused, drunk with sorrow one second then high with laughter and felicity the next? How exactly does our calendar work? What is it predicated on? Better yet, what are the emotion and intellect behind these dates that motivate us to schedule, back-to-back, holidays remembering the near genocide of our people and then the celebration of the rebirth of Israel?

Bipolar? I think not. Human? Yes.

It seems that there's a drive in life to be happy. The Torah reminds us: "You shall be glad with all the goodness that HaShem, your God, has given you,and your household." (Deuteronomy, 26:11) But my feeling is that we would remember regardless.

One only needs to look at Auschwitz to see that there, in the nastiest cauldron of humiliating degradation, men and women fought to love one another. Romances existed behind those barbs, and the soft spot within the Jewish soul was never extinguished. Many of those same people survived, came to Israel, fought for its survival and won. Today, after all that, they lead us in the remembrance of Yom Hashoah, fertile moment grafted from the side of the weeded and boggy garden.

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

Human beings crave happiness. Hence Yom Ha'atzmaut. However, we are also aware of the grave tragedies that occur within us and around us. Hence Yom Hazikaron.

The synthesis of these two – sadness, then joy – is played out very clearly in Israel during these days.

On Yom Hazikaron, Israelis observe the day with memorial services and by visiting the gravesites of our boys and girls. In Israel – and if you've ever been there on Yom Hazikaron, you'll appreciate the power behind this – on this day, a two-minute siren is blasted throughout the country in memoriam. Everything stops – traffic, business, pedestrians, as we remember the courageous Jews and non-Jews who fought for our freedom. We remember when, in 1998, a school bus with 36 students was attacked by a Palestinian terrorist trying to crash into it with his car, full of explosives and a 19-year-old Haifa resident and new immigrant, Alexei Nikon, driving an Israel Defence Forces jeep, cut off the terrorist and died saving all the students. Yehiye zichrono l'brachah, may Alexei's memory be blessed.

On Yom Ha'atzmaut, the very next day, we put away our mourning and sad memories and find a bonfire started by Israelis somewhere here in Toronto. We walk and talk about freedom. We praise God for our little State of Israel that gives all of us the ability to be freer as Jews most places in the world. This is a collective celebration, and an individual one. Israel sets us free. Those who deny this reality should remember what it was once like.

My sister Chavi told me: "Life is about duality – missing and longing, enjoying and gratitude, sadness and happiness." She is so right.

Yom Hazikaron and then Yom Ha'atzmaut – truly a reflection of life. Sadness then happiness.

Canadians march and remember

Montreal survivors lead the delegation on this year's March of the Living on Yom Hashoah, on May 2. The march from Auschwitz to Birkenau departed from under the infamous "Arbeit Macht Frei" sign. Some 7,000 students, adults and survivors from around the world took part in the 2011 march. Ilan Ramon's legacy lives on

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

When the space shuttle Endeavour finally lifts off on NASA's penultimate shuttle flight later this month, for many Israelis, it will symbolize the continuing journey of astronaut Ilan Ramon.

The Endeavour is tentatively scheduled to launch no earlier than May 16, according to NASA.

Ramon, the first Israeli astronaut, perished along with the rest of the space shuttle Columbia crew when the craft exploded on re-entry from orbit on Feb. 1, 2003.

On a visit to Toronto last week, Asaf Agmon, CEO of Israel's Fisher Brothers Institute for Air & Space Strategic Studies – a non-profit organization that receives funding from the Israeli Ministry of Science and works with NASA to bring Israeli experiments into space – said the Endeavour mission will carry two Israeli bio-medical experiments into space, one of which is a "legacy project" from Ramon's Columbia mission.

"There were more than 400 experiments on the Columbia. Only nine survived the explosion, and one of those was a microbiotics experiment that Ilan had brought with him," said Agmon, who is a family friend of Ramon's and a reserve brigadier general in the Israeli Air Force.

He called NASA's allowing of the Israeli experiments on board the Endeavour a "generous gesture."

The findings will provide data for research into the overall effects of space flight on the human body.

Silence Observed

QUEBEC CITY —The Quebec National Assembly observed a minute of silence May 3 in observance of Yom Hashoah. The gesture followed a motion tabled by Liberal MNA Lawrence Bergman, PQ MNA Louise Beaudoin, François Bonnardel of the Action Démocratique, and indepen-dent Eric Caire. In 1999, Quebec adopted a law officially proclaiming an annual Holocaust remembrance day. In an address to MNAs, Bergman said the attempted extermination of the Jews was unique, but that other genocides have occurred since 1945 and there are other crimes against humanity occurring today and signs of more to come.

WORLD

Degree Nixed

NEW YORK — City University of New York voted May 2 not to honour playwright Tony Kushner with an honorary degree at its commencement after Jewish board member Jeffrey Wiesenfeld objected, citing the Pulitzer Prize winner's anti-Israel statements. The decision could be the first time in CUNY's history that a candidate for an honorary degree has been vetoed, the New York Jewish Week reported. Kushner has endorsed the boycott, divestments and sanctions campaign against Israel and written that Israel was "founded in a program that... was ethnic cleansing." He's also said that "it would have been better" if Israel hadn't been created.

Brit Ban Challenged

OSLO — The umbrella group for Norwegian Jews is opposing a proposed amendment that would ban ritual circumcision on boys under 15. The Mosaic Religious Community has sent a letter to Norwegian Foreign Minister Jonas Gahr Store and Justice Minister Knut Storberget outlining its opposition to the amendment proposed by the country's state ombudsman for children. The age limit would be part of a proposed change in the law that would allow ritual circumcision in public hospitals, which is currently banned. Under the proposed change, parents could either have only a doctor present or have religious circumcisers present to carry out the procedure under the observation of medical professionals.

Chair Endowed

DENVER — The University of Colorado at Boulder is establishing a $2-million endowed chair in Jewish history. The gift was made by two sisters, who are school alumnae, in honour of their late father. The Louis P. Singer Endowed Chair in Jewish History makes CU-Boulder the sixth U.S. public university to establish a chair in Jewish history. Seventeen U.S. universities in total have them. It will support a senior faculty position in the school's four-year-old Jewish studies program.

Nazi Hunter Acquitted of Libel

BUDAPEST — Nazi hunter Efraim Zuroff was acquitted by a Budapest court of libel charges against him from an accused Hungarian Nazi war criminal.

Efraim Zuroff

Zuroff, head of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, was acquitted May 3, two days before his accuser, Sandor Kepiro, was to go on trial in Budapest. Kepiro is charged with being involved in the murder of more than1,200 Jews, Serbs and Gypsies during a raid by the wartime Hungarian Gendarmerie at Novi Sad in 1942.

Kepiro, 97, filed suit after Zuroff, the head of the Israel office of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, submitted documents to the Hungarian courts in 2006 regarding Kepiro's alleged role in the murders of 1,246 civilians in Novi Sad. Most of the victims were taken to the Danube River and shot in January 1943.

Kepiro was found guilty of involvement twice – once by the pre-Nazi Hungarian courts, and again after the war, in 1946. By then he had fled via Austria to Argentina. He returned to Budapest in 1996, and Zuroff, who searches for Nazi war criminals under the Wiesenthal Center's Operation Last Chance program, found him.

In his verdict, the judge said Zuroff had acted in good faith by first contacting the Hungarian prosecutors after discovering that Kepiro had returned to Hungary from Argentina before notifying the media.

"Needless to say, I am relieved to have been acquitted, but the most important issue is Kepiro's guilt, which will be hopefully established by a criminal court in his trial," Zuroff said.

Markham condemns term 'Israeli apartheid'

'We have a moral right and obligation to stand up to threats of antisemitism and unfounded attacks against Israel'

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

The Town of Markham has officially condemned the use of the term "Israeli apartheid."

In a May 3 meeting, council voted 12 to 1 to adopt an amended motion put forward by Ward 2 Councillor Howard Shore.

Shore, who is Jewish, originally introduced the motion in March. It initially called on council to denounce Israeli Apartheid Week at York University.

"We have a moral right and obligation to stand up to threats of antisemitism and unfounded attacks against the State of Israel," Shore, a York alumnus, said in a March 21 statement.

At the time, council deferred the motion, and Mayor Frank Scarpitti said he wanted more time to consider its wording, as he did not want to jeopardize the "terrific and amazing" relationship Markham has with the university by singling it out.

The town and the university had recently became partners in a life-sciences business incubator project known as the Markham Convergence Centre.

In amending Shore's motion, council gutted references to York, focusing instead on condemning the use of the offending term in general.

Numerous groups and individuals made statements to council at last Tuesday's meeting, both in support of the motion and against it. Among them were deputations from Canadian Jewish Congress and the Faculty for Palestine, a Toronto-based group run under the auspices of the Coalition Against Israeli Apartheid (CAIA).

Howard Shore

After the vote, on his website, Shore said Markham "made history" with his motion.

"This sends a loud and clear message rejecting the inflammatory language which labels supporters of Israel as racists and can lead to divisiveness, intimidation, intolerance and an atmosphere of hostility on some university and college campuses in Ontario and across Canada," he said

"We must, absolutely must, continue to be vigilant, but it is my hope that our young people who look to their university or college campus as a safe environment to learn and grow, will know they are not alone when confronted by this type of bullying and hate."

Representatives from Markham – including Shore and fellow councilor Carolina Moretti – in collaboration with the Regional Municipality of York, York University and the law firm Miller Thomson, will be part of a delegation of councillors and business leaders attending the Israel Life Science Industry Biomed conference in Tel Aviv from May 20 to 29.

From Israel on Yom Hazikaron

Lasting about 40 minutes, the official state ceremony at the Western Wall in Jerusalem on Sunday night, which ushered in Yom Hazikaron (Memorial Day), was deeply moving and typically Israeli. It was short on speeches and long on symbol, poignancy, mood and emotion.

The 10-part program began precisely at 8 p.m. with a countrywide sounding of a wailing siren. For an entire minute, cars stopped in mid-drive on the roads. People in the streets stood calmly and quietly at attention.

We in Canada have never seen such a thing. Of course, not since 1812 has war been fought on the soil of Canada. It is a powerfully compelling yet eerie sight. Movement gives way to memory. Space yields for a long brief moment to fragments of time.

From the editor's desk...

Immediately after the wail of the siren, President Shimon Peres, in the company of a widow of one of Israel's fallen, lit the memorial candle.

In the backdrop, seemingly aglow from the reflection of the lights above in the large, unsmooth surfaces, were the stones of the Kotel. In the foreground were hundreds of members of families who have lost loved ones in defence of Israel. Standing to the side, was the Israel Defence Forces honour guard, comprised of young soldiers.

After the candle was lit, Peres spoke to the assembly. He spoke in his familiar sonorous, baritone voice, but with surprising emotion especially at the beginning of his brief remarks and toward their end.

After the president, the IDF chief of staff, Benny Gantz, spoke.

Both the president and the chief of staff spoke of the sanctity of the very place at which the ceremony was being held. Both retold of the heroism of the soldiers who recaptured the Kotel. Both spoke of the pre-eminence of the values of the IDF as principles that continue to motivate and inspire and strengthen the nation as well as the young men and women who defend Israel.

The president and the chief of staff were the only ones to give speeches. After their remarks, a poem was read titled (and aimed at) The Dear Families.

After the poetry, the chief rabbi of the IDF, Rafi Peretz and the rabbi of the Kotel, Shmuele Rabinovitz, each read a short prayer. A father who had lost a son to war recited the Kaddish. An army cantor chanted the traditional prayer for the dead, K'el Maleh Rachamim.

And then the ceremony concluded with a dignified, controlled singing of Hatikvah. The assembly dispersed. The solemnity hovered. A period of 24 hours of national mourning had commenced.

Israel's Foreign Ministry website describes the country as "long and narrow in shape." One can concede the use of the term "narrow" but "long" is rather boastfully excessive, or perhaps naive. Israel is about 290 miles or 470 kilometres long. By contrast, the distance between Toronto and Montreal is 313 miles or some 500 kilometres. If the Jewish state were stretched head to toe between Toronto and Montreal, there would be still be nearly 12 miles to spare at either end.

And yet, a great many people have given their lives in defence of this "long and narrow" country.

According to the government, "a total of 22,867 men and women have been killed defending the land of Israel since 1860, the year that the first Jewish settlers left the secure walls of Jerusalem to build new Jewish neighbourhoods.

"Since the end of the War of Independence, 2,443 people have been killed in Israel in terror attacks – 13 in the past year.

"In the past year, since Remembrance Day 2010, 183 members of the security forces – police, IDF, Border Police, Israel Security Agency and other organizations – have been killed in the service of the state."

When asked where he was born, a taxi driver in Jerusalem answered, "In northern Persia. You could call it Kurdistan. There was no future for us after Khomeini came in."

When asked the same question, a taxi driver in Tel Aviv told The CJN, "In Iraq. We left for Israel a short time after the founding of the state. It got very bad for us in Iraq," he added. "Where else could we go?"

And in those simple five words, plainly, unpretentiously, non-rhetorically offered, the taxi driver summed up the essence of modern Jewish history. Where else, but to Israel, could the Jews go?

These words were written Sunday night in Jerusalem. It is a sombre time here. On Monday, families will travel the length and breadth of the "long and narrow" land to visit the graves of their sons and daughters, husbands and wives and friends. Some will plant a flower nearby, place a wreath or leave a stone as if tenderly setting down the piece of their heart torn away forever.

And on Monday night, with the setting of the sun, mourning will give way to celebration. For then it will be Yom Ha'atzmaut. The blue-red-pink flame of the Yizkor candle will transform into the blue and white flutter of the flag of Israel.

Congress CEO to run for Liberals: reports

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Longtime Canadian Jewish Congress CEO Bernie Farber will run as the Liberal candidate for Thornhill in the upcoming provincial election, according to reports published last week.

Stories in both the Toronto Star and the Thornhill Liberal named Farber as Premier Dalton McGuinty's star candidate in the riding, which has the highest proportion of Jewish voters in the province.

The election is scheduled for Oct. 6, and McGuinty's Liberals are trailing Tim Hudak's Progressive Conservatives badly in the polls.

Farber, who has been with Congress since 1984 and its CEO since 2005, was unavailable for comment on the reports at The CJN's deadline.

Bernie Farber

Peter Shurman

However, Conservative Thornhill MPP Peter Shurman told The CJN he has known about Farber's intent to run against him for some time now.

Shurman said he had heard rumours about Farber's potential political turn as early as two months ago and had a chance to ask Congress' CEO about it at an event that they both attended a few weeks back.

"Word travels fast, and when we spoke about six weeks ago, Bernie told me he was 'considering' it. He told me 'If I decide to do it, we'll have fun.' That's what he said to me. I said, 'Great. Well good luck.'"

Farber's move into partisan politics comes amid ongoing plans to restructure the landscape of Jewish advocacy and consolidate all of its parts into one unified entity, leaving the future of the 90-year-old Congress unclear.

At a Dec. 8 board meeting of the umbrella group Canadian Council for Jewish and Israel Advocacy (CIJA), Canada-Israel Committee CEO Shimon Fogel was picked to head the new centralized entity, which has yet to be named.

Fogel was unavailable for comment on the reports of Farber's candidacy by The CJN's deadline

Shurman said having Farber as a potential rival doesn't concern him "in the slightest."

Calling Farber a "good guy," Shurman said that while the two would likely have lively and intelligent debates, Farber "should be aware that the questions to be discussed in the coming election have no more or less to do with Thornhill than with the rest of the province.

"Bernie will be on uncharted territory for him as a non-partisan spokesperson for Jewish people, including me. Now that he's decided to enter the partisan world, he's going to find out that it's not so easy."

The riding has gone back and forth between Liberals and Conservatives in recent provincial elections, with small margins separating the two parties.

Shurman beat incumbent Liberal MP Mario Racco by fewer than 2,000 votes in 2007, but Racco beat Tory incumbent Tina Molinari by less than 1,000 votes in 2003. Molinari herself won the newly created seat in 1999 by less than 300 votes over Liberal Dan Ronen.

Federally, Environment Minister Peter Kent was re-elected in the riding for the Conservatives in this month's national election with 61 per cent of the vote.

He easily beat former B'nai Brith Canada official Karen Mock, the Liberal candidate, as a number of local, formerly Liberal ridings with significant numbers of Jewish voters elected Tory candidates in what many commentators saw as an endorsement of the Harper government's strong support for Israel over the past five years.

Our new Parliament

Not even overtime in the seventh game of the Stanley Cup final can match the drama of election night. By the time the seventh game rolls around, no surprises are left. There is only one possible outcome. But there are always surprises in a nationwide election, and there are 308 distinct outcomes.

Seldom has there been a more dramatic election night in Canada than the one last week. When the vote was called some two months ago, no one would have predicted the results.

Having garnered 39.6 per cent of the total vote, the Conservatives of Stephen Harper will govern the next four years with a majority in the House of Commons, with 167 MPs. For the first time in Canadian history, the NDP will form the official Opposition. NDP Leader Jack Layton and his team won 102 seats with 30.6 per cent of the vote. The Liberals fell far down into an unfamiliar valley, winning merely 18.9 per cent of the popular vote and 34 seats in the House of Commons. Quebecers essentially turned their backs on the Bloc Québécois by returning only four members. Elizabeth May will sit as a single-member Green Party.

Michael Ignatieff and Gilles Duceppe have already announced their resignations as leaders of their parties.

We congratulate the prime minister for his decisive victory. We congratulate all the newly elected and re-elected members of Parliament. In addition, we commend and congratulate and thank every candidate in the election. We insufficiently acknowledge how difficult it must be to so openly expose oneself to unremitting public criticism, disparagement and scorn. Nor do we adequately acknowledge the effort and labours of the countless volunteers without whom very few candidates could make their case to the public whose votes they seek. Our democracy – indeed, all democracy – is nourished by broad citizen participation and involvement. There is no doubt that Canada's democracy is well nourished.

Many capable and caring individuals will be going to Ottawa for the first time. Many will be leaving. Hakarat hatov, the principle long enshrined in Jewish tradition of honouring the good others have done for us, compels us to single out four such individuals who were especially generous and accomplished in their service to the Jewish community in particular and to the wider Canadian community in general: Liberal MPs Joe Volpe in Eglinton-Lawrence, Ken Dryden in York-Centre and Anita Neville in Winnipeg South Centre, and Tory MP Lawrence Cannon in Pontiac.

An American journalist once wisecracked that "people who want to understand democracy should spend less time in the library with Aristotle and more time on the buses and on the subway." The constantly renewing truth of democracy, of course, is that it works best when it includes Aristotle and the people on the buses – that is, all of us. Our vast hopes and best wishes for our new Parliament are that it govern well for the benefit of all.

Weak attack on PA's negotiation stance

The April 21 editorial, "PA's real game: duplicity," is a weak attack on the Palestinian Authority's negotiation stance. The recently published Palestine papers show that the PA negotiated, in good faith, with prime minister Ehud Olmert and foreign minister Tzipi Livni in 2007-08. It was after they were replaced with the most intransigent, pro-settlement government in Israel's recent history that negotiations bogged down. Indeed, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu was excoriated by German Chancellor Angela Merkel for not having taken "a single step to advance peace." Her sentiments, coming from the most pro-Israel nation in Europe, have been echoed by leaders around the world. You should be helping your readers to understand, rather than retreat into the stale attacks on the PA, which may have been appropriate when PA president Yasser Arafat ruled.

The PA refusal to negotiate while settlement expansion takes place is a response to the many Arab and non-Arab sources that excoriated the major compromises offered by President Mahmoud Abbas in 2007-08. A PA government that again sat down to protracted negotiations, while seeing its patrimony nibbled away, could not withstand the storm from its own people.

It is far more important for all of us in the Jewish community to understand that the burden is now on Israel to demonstrate its good faith. Netanyahu will have the opportunity this month, before a joint session of the U.S. Congress, to either offer a real peace plan, or the world will demonstrate its displeasure at the September meetings of the UN General Assembly, when the Palestinians seek recognition. Help your readers to understand that the growing criticism of Israel is not the result of clever and duplicitous Palestinians or a rising tide of antisemitism in the world. It is the Netanyahu-Lieberman coalition that is alienating world sympathy for Israel.

'Step up to the plate'

In "A monument of good deeds" (Perspectives, April 28), Eli Rubenstein is right to remind us that while so many "humans" acted with brutal cruelty and indifference during the Holocaust, there were others who were so innately good that they tested themselves to the point of risking their own lives as well as the lives of those most precious to them. We all share this human potential. It is incumbent upon each and every human being to make what we know in our hearts to be the right choice. If we do, we shall live up to that potential and will fulfil God's expectations of us.

In her diary, 12-year-old Donia Rosen requested that in response to the Holocaust, we build a commemorative monument of good deeds. I suggest we now go one step further to lay a foundation for our continued success in the quest to reach the heights of that figurative pinnacle. Every time we recognize, appreciate, remember and honour the altruism of the past's Righteous Gentile heroes, we all – Jew or gentile – "step up to the plate" in our present time and well into the future. What a legacy it would be for this generation to commemorate the enduring human potential for goodness that dwells somewhere in every human being.

Men's club's program was fair

The April 21 letter, "Men's club fails grade on democracy," by Alberto Quiroz, deserves a response. The writer approached me at the conclusion of our federal candidates' debate and apologized for writing the letter to The CJN. He said that Beth Tzedec Congregation's Men's Club had indeed presented a fair and inclusive program.

The fact that the club did not include the lesser parties in the debate did not result in those parties from being excluded from providing both a visual and oral presentation of their respective platforms. The club invited the Green party to present their candidate and platform, but the Greens chose not to attend.

Beth Tzedec Men's Club has for more than 22 years won the acclaim of the major parties for providing an exemplary service to the community. We stand by our decision to include in our debates only the political parties that were featured on the nationally televised debates.

Chairman, Beth Tzedec Congregation's Men's Club

Educating the next generation about Israel

Rabbi Harvey Meirovich

There is an alarming and growing disenchantment with Israel among Jews aged 40 and under, and by a cadre of younger rabbis from across the religious spectrum. In the 2010 book, Jewish Theology in our Time, 22 of 24 influential rabbis, teachers and scholars consciously downplay the centrality of Israel, Jewish peoplehood and other markers of Jewish particularism from their spiritual agendas. My experience as former dean of the Conservative movement's Schechter Rabbinical Seminary in Jerusalem confirms this attitudinal shift. On one occasion, an American rabbi-in-training announced to me that she could never expose her future congregation to Israel's challenges, complexities and the fact that, like human beings, Israel is fallible. When I asked why not she shot back: "I do not want to upset my congregation!"

This seismic shift in attitudes toward Israel was echoed recently by Rabbi Daniel Gordis, a respected observer of the Israeli scene. Anecdotally, he notes the case of a rabbi-in-training buying a new tallit on condition it was not made in Israel, while another student declared that lamentations on Tisha b'Av include mourning the creation of the State of Israel.

Gordis singles out, at the same time, pro-Israel rabbis-in-the-making, describing them as well-read and deeply decent human beings who do not subscribe to the bravado that "everything Israel does is right." Nor are they morally insensitive to the human suffering of Palestinians. They struggle with Israel's strategic and moral dilemmas, and while they may not love the settlements, they're too sophisticated, in Gordis' opinion, to believe that settlements are the reason that Israel has no peace with the Palestinians.

It is not the settlements, per se. Rabbis-in-training, rather, are specifically vexed and distraught over Israel's military jurisdiction over the Palestinian population in the administered territories of Judea and Samaria. Their contention is that Israel has placed a political albatross around its neck since 1967 by controlling the lives of 1-1/2 million people through military domination. This reality increasingly takes its toll not only on soldiers, but on rank-and-file Jewish-Israeli citizens.

Israel is sinking deeper into a political quagmire. Military authority is slowly suffocating the morale of more and more segments of Israel's Jewish population. As these students see it, Israel's military domination of the Palestinian population siphons off more and more emotional energy from many Israelis.

This attitude, of course, is not felt by those who see Israel's right to biblical land in Judea and Samaria as biblically mandated and, in some cases, as being quintessential to the bringing of the Messiah. To this approach these rabbis-in-the-making pose the question: does Israel's historical rights to biblical land supersede its military rule and treatment, humane as it might be, of the 1-1/2 million Palestinians living over the Green Line? Furthermore, they ask, what is the long term psychological toll of Israeli military rule on Palestinian youth who have only known the Israel Defence Forces' military presence in their lives? Also, what is the psychological "fallout" on Israel's self-image, being preoccupied with keeping Palestinians under constant surveillance?

It is useless to debate whether or not successive Israeli governments should or should not have held on to the administered territories. We know that in the aftermath of the Six Day War, a furious debate raged between Israeli political giants David Ben-Gurion and Moshe Dayan. Ben-Gurion favoured returning all the conquered territories apart from Jerusalem, the Golan Heights and Mount Hebron. Dayan, on the other hand, authored a secret memo in 1968 proposing massive settlement beyond the Green Line.

There are Jews who vividly recall Israel's precarious rebirth in 1948 and those who remember Israel's standing at the precipice in June 1967 who would label these future rabbis as naïve and misguided.

Such labelling would be unwise, for these rabbis-in-the-making are joined in their opinions by significant segments of Jewish citizens inside Israel who vote in the centre and to the left of centre.

In addition, it is prudent to remember that all efforts to resolve Israel's political quagmire have evaded every one of Israel's elected coalitions over the past four decades. It seems extremely unlikely that positive attitudes toward Israel will emerge among the next generation of rabbis until the Knesset can arrive at a more tranquil modus operandi with Palestinians in Judea and Samaria.

At the same time, I believe there are two steps that can help make a dent in the armour of disillusionment: First, Israel must vastly improve its PR mechanism. It is getting better, but it still has a long way to go. Israeli spokespeople now speak flawless English, and there is growing recognition among Israelis that world opinion is of paramount importance.

In co-ordination with the Diaspora, Israel needs to ramp up its transmission of fact to counter various fictions. The message needs to go forth ad nauseam that Israel has tried on several occasions to relinquish land for peace, only to be rebuffed from the Palestinian side. Let the message be restated again and again that Israel is the only democratic country in the region and is one of the only countries in the Middle East that protects gay rights. Also, Israel's rambunctious and obnoxious parliamentary system is stable when tethered to its justice system and ultimately to its Supreme Court, to ensure women's rights, free speech and to prosecute corruption and abuse. Where else in the Middle East except in Israel can one imagine convicting a former president of the country on charges of sexual misconduct?

Let the message be disseminated better that Israel follows international law while fighting terrorists when the terrorists themselves do not adhere to the rules of engagement. Israel is a civilized state, and Israeli soldiers are not the same as Palestinian terrorists. The IDF does not intentionally shoot at civilians, or murder women and children, and it does not put bombs on buses. Let the message go forth that every resident beyond the Green Line has the right to petition Israel's Supreme Court. This is unique and unprecedented in the rules of international law. In many cases, the court has accepted these petitions.

Israel must explain better that international law does not say that unintended collateral damage and injury to civilians is forbidden. What is forbidden is killing civilians, which is what Hamas does when it shoots at kibbutzim, towns and cities in Israel from Gaza.

Israel's moral stance is in contrast to the political terrorism practised by Hamas against its own population. Israel must better inform the world of its legal efforts to safeguard basic human rights in Judea, Samaria and Gaza. Recently, two IDF soldiers were tried and court-martialed for asking a nine-year-old to check a bag that they suspected might contain explosives. The child obeyed their orders and nothing happened, as there were no explosives in the bag, but the soldiers' actions violated international humanitarian law, because soldiers are not allowed to use local civilians to help themselves on the battlefield.

The West needs to hear the bristling tenet of Israel's former chief justice, Aharon Barak: "It is the fate of democracy that not all means are permitted, and to whom not all the methods used by its enemies are open. At times, democracy fights with one hand tied behind its back. Despite that, democracy has the upper hand, since preserving the rule of law and recognition of individual liberties constitute an important component of its security. At the end of the day, they strengthen its spirit and allow it to overcome its difficulties."

A second strategy to promote positive feelings about Israel aimed at Jews in their 20s and 30s is to invest increasing sums of money to bring them to Israel so they can learn to distinguish between two different Israels. Our federations and synagogues need to go beyond applauding Birthright's 10-day introduction to "Israel 101." A page should be taken from the Jewish Foundation of Cincinnati, the only body in North America that, having sold its Jewish hospital for a windfall of $67 million, now awards Israel grants to high schoolers ages 16 to 18 of up to $6,500 and post-high school students up to age 26 of up to $5,000 to spend quality time in Israel, ranging from several weeks to several months.

Young Jewish adults need to see beyond Israel-in-crisis. There is a second Israel, hardly known to Diaspora Jews, whose nerve pathways get crammed with Israel's political woes. They need to become familiar with "average," decent Israelis who live lives that are routine and mundane: raising families, making a living, going to the beach and the theatre, taking kids to music and tennis lessons, making time for spiritual fervour such as meditation on a Tel Aviv beach or going to synagogue in Jerusalem, and making time for friends. In short, living lives not all that different from middle-class Diaspora families.

This "second" Israel must not get buried in the face of security, settlements and future borders. While threats of terror are not far from their consciousness, Israelis do much in getting on with fashioning order and good times, not permitting the enemy to dictate how they shape reality. As an Israeli citizen, I suspect most Israelis' wherewithal for getting on with life is not about "sticking" it to the enemy, of turning up collective noses at those who wish the State of Israel ill. Rather, it has to do with a collective way to frame reality, ensuring that chaos does not trump the wonder of having returned home after two millennia. Spending quality time in the country will enable this positive mindset to penetrate the minds and hearts of the next generation of Diaspora Jews.

Why speaking publicly matters

Although it was immediately overshadowed by U.S. President Barack Obama's momentous announcement of the taking of terrorist mastermind Osama bin Laden, the televised interview with Lara Logan haunted my dreams. Logan is the CBS journalist who survived a brutal sexual assault in February of this year while covering the Egyptian uprising in Tahrir Square.

After more than two months of public silence about that horrible day, Logan agreed to what she indicated would be her only public interview about the event. Her account was graphic, yet dignified and restrained; her speaking before an audience of millions, courageous.

Logan focused not only on her battle for her life in a frenzied crowd of attackers, but on the plight of women journalists more broadly. She spoke of breaking the code of silence about the sexual assaults of women reporters in various locales, perpetrated either as a deliberate attempt to intimidate them, or as a consequence of a local ethos regarding the treatment of women.

Women can't help but identify with Logan, whose story exemplifies the vulnerability of women across cultures. As a Jewish woman, I felt the identification even more strongly. While Logan is not Jewish, those attacking her believed that she was, further fuelling their frenzy and giving them perverse "justification" for their attack.

Logan's decision to speak openly about the horror in Tahrir Square exemplifies a far-reaching change in attitudes about the public discourse on sexual assault. Not so long ago, there was a consensus that when reporting sexual assault, news media would not identify victims by name. Underlying this practice was the assumption that naming the victim would subject her to an unwanted public exposure that would extend the humiliation of the original violation. Keeping her identity secret, it was felt, would restore her dignity, because – apart from a small circle of people – no would know, no one would imagine.

While some women welcomed this anonymity of victimhood, others did not. They saw in this convention of secrecy not a protection of their privacy and preservation of their dignity, but the imposition of shame. We keep secret, they observed, that which we find shameful. Too often, they noted, victims of sexual assault feel disgraced, shamed by what was done to them. As a result, they keep silent, often contending alone with feelings of abasement and trauma. But the silence results in cutting off support from others.

To counter this dynamic of isolation and shame, some women began pushing against the convention of anonymity. In a mood shift that gained force in the last decade of the 20th century, many victims of sexual assault began to insist that newspapers and other media identify them by name. The shame was not theirs, they stressed. The perpetrators had behaved shamefully.

Sara R. Horowitz

It took courage for victims of rape to come forward publicly during an era that insisted on masking them for their own good. But they viewed their openness about what they had endured not merely as a path to their own healing, but – more importantly – as a way of signalling to other victims that they need not go through it alone, and that they need not blame themselves.

As we've come to understand, rape is not a crime of sexual passion but a criminal tool of domination, humiliation and control. Women are not its only victims, but they represent the majority of victims and are the most vulnerable to this type of attack. In societies where women have limited rights and lowered status, the threat and reality of sexual assault is a powerful way of enforcing repressive norms and keeping women in their place.

In Jewish circles, the acknowledgment that victims of sexual assault should not bear the shame or the blame for what has been done to them has opened up new and compassionate paths for Judaism to address their experience. Religious rituals have been developed to bring the sacred more palpably into the realm of healing and moving ahead. Former victims and their (mostly female) rabbis have taken an active role in creating new rituals where none existed before: using the living waters of mikvaot, or ritual baths; synagogue liturgy, and home-based women's study groups.

It's a body of ritual whose need, I pray, will diminish over time and some day disappear.

Thinking American

It started last year with Peter Beinart's widely discussed essay in the New York Review of Books that described the growing alienation of American Jews from Israel. It continued more recently with David Remnick, who argued in the New Yorker that the United States should promote its own Israeli-Palestinian peace plan, whether or not the government of Israel likes it.

Many young American Jews seem to agree with both writers. Israel's political leaders can no longer take the automatic endorsement of their policies for granted. U.S. Jews have been reared in liberal values and want to judge Israel by them, too. They insist they're Americans first and that the United States should act according to America's progressive traditions also in relation to Israel, not to hurt it but to help it live up to its commitment to democracy and peace.

Rabbi Dow Marmur

in Toronto

In a recent column in the Jerusalem Post, Daniel Gordis wrote that nowadays, even rabbinic students in many American institutions seem to distance themselves from Israel. They spend at least a year of their studies in Jerusalem, but, instead of being imbued with unquestioning loyalty to the Jewish state, they often return home more critical than when they came.

After graduation, they preach to congregations and thus influence the Jew in the pew. Even if older worshippers with Republican leanings reject their views, many of the young are likely to share them.

U.S. Jewry is vitally important to Israel. The fact it's less prepared to support whatever government Israelis elect than in the past has alarmed many. But accusing critics of self-hatred and destructive assimilation will only widen the gap. Constructive criticism by the young may be more beneficial to Israel than mindless support by their parents.

Writers such as Beinart and Remnick insist they aren't turning their backs on Israel but advocating a relationship between equals. They expect Israelis to respect American Jewry for what it is.

This includes J-Street, the new left-of-centre critical pro-Israel lobby. Instead of seeing it as a danger to Israel, Jewish leaders are called on to accept it as an opportunity to harness liberal forces in American Jewry, supporting Israel, albeit critically, in the joint endeavour to live in peace with the Palestinians. It's much more wholesome than, for example, the unholy alliance between Israeli Jews and American evangelicals.

American Jewry isn't on the verge of extinction. It's a self-confident and equal partner in shaping the Judaism of tomorrow. Israelis must accept that America isn't exile, but as much a home for Jews in the United States as Israel is for Jews in the Jewish state.

Being fully integrated into the life of the United States has given Jews enormous opportunities in terms of resources and influence, both often deployed to Israel's advantage. But it has also led to what some see as alienation and assimilation, for the integration has come with a high percentage of intermarriage and a concomitant weaker link to the Jewish people in general, and Israel in particular.

To the extent that young non-Orthodox Jews affiliate, it's more likely to be with Reform congregations, because they're seen as most open to all. The intermarried and their offspring, as well as gay and lesbians, say they feel most at home in Reform Judaism.

As a result, the Union for Reform Judaism is today the largest denomination in American Jewry. Its president-elect, Rabbi Rick Jacobs, is an ardent Zionist who holds leadership positions in J-Street and the New Israel Fund, both frequently vilified by the obscurantist right. His emergence as one of the foremost leaders of the next generation of American Jewry points to its future direction. Being alarmed by it won't do Israel any good. Re-thinking old attitudes will.

Canadian Jews are physically and culturally much closer to the United States than to Israel, yet they tend to see American Jews through conventional Israeli eyes. As Americans are fond of saying, Canadian Jewry is one or two generations behind.

So far, this "backwardness" has served us well. But things are changing here, too. Instead of embracing the future, we're in danger of getting stuck in the past by smugly continuing to mouth the old clichés. As difficult as it may be for Canadians, the time has come to think more the way American Jews do.

Pakistan plays a double game

Almost 10 years after he masterminded the bloodiest attack on American soil since Pearl Harbor, the arch terrorist Osama bin Laden was gunned down in a hail of bullets by U.S. special forces on May 1 in a walled compound in Pakistan.

For about the past five years, bin Laden, the leader of Al Qaeda and America's most wanted fugitive, had been living in Abbottabad, a suburb of Islamabad, Pakistan's capital, rather than in some spartan cave in Pakistan's wild tribal area, where he was presumed to have been hiding. Indeed, his fortified house was only several hundred metres from a military academy, Pakistan's version of West Point, and an army base.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The location of bin Laden's lair lent credence to the theory that he had a support system in Pakistan and that the Pakistani government may have had an inkling of his whereabouts. Working on the assumption that Pakistan – a mercurial U.S. ally in the war against terrorism and a recipient of generous American aid packages – is not sufficiently trustworthy, the Obama administration did not give it advance notice of the raid. Leon Panetta, the director of the Central Intelligence Agency, has admitted that Pakistan might have jeopardized the daring operation had it been given advance warning.

Osama bin Laden

Pakistan, a nuclear-armed state that is well on its way toward becoming the world's most populous Muslim nation, seethes with anti-American and anti-western sentiment. Carved out of India in 1947 amid intense and widespread sectarian violence, Pakistan was established as a tolerant Muslim state by its founding father, Mohammed Ali Jinnah. He hoped that Pakistan would be a bastion of secular, liberal and multicultural values. But due to the Islamic revolution in Iran, the Soviet Union's invasion of Afghanistan and a proclivity by Pakistani leaders to cater to obscurantist Muslim forces, Pakistan began drifting into Islamic fervency about two decades ago. Though Islamic political parties have had a marginal place in Pakistani politics, they exert a disproportionate influence on Pakistan, which has been ruled by cliques of generals for nearly half its existence.

Muslim fundamentalism is deeply entrenched in Pakistan thanks to a network of Saudi-financed Islamic schools, or madrasas, and deep-seated poverty and endemic corruption. Dominated by a self-serving elite with an endless appetite for conspicuous consumption, Pakistan has provided few basic services to the masses.

Pakistan was thrust into the war on terrorism on Sept. 11, 2001, after Al Qaeda destroyed the World Trade Center and attacked the Pentagon, the twin symbols of American financial and military supremacy. Since these assaults were conceived and planned in Taliban-controlled Afghanistan, which tolerated an Al Qaeda presence, the United States invaded Afghanistan. The invasion prompted the leadership of both Al Qaeda and the Taliban to flee into the lawless northeast corner of neighbouring Pakistan.

Determined to bring the planners of 9-11 to justice, the Americans formed a strategic alliance with Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharaff, and began pouring billions of dollars' worth of military and economic assistance into Pakistan. Musharaff, a foe of Islamic radicalism whom extremists tried to assassinate, seemed like a reliable ally.

In the wake of 9-11, the United States and Pakistan carried out joint operations on Pakistani territory that netted two high-profile Al Qaeda operatives, Khalid Shaikh Mohammed and Abu Zubaydah, but not Al Qaeda's second-in-command, Ayman al-Zawahiri.

These operations notwithstanding, the Americans have been less than satisfied with the level of Pakistan's co-operation in the war against terrorism.

To win the war in Afghanistan, to which the Obama administration has committed 100,000 troops, the United States must wipe out Taliban and Al Qaeda sanctuaries in Pakistan and deal devastating blows to their allies, Lashkar-e-Taiba and the Haqqani group. Without Pakistan's help, these goals simply cannot be accomplished.

These jihadist organizations have wreaked a trail of death and destruction, having taken credit for the gruesome murder of the American Jewish journalist Daniel Pearl, the killing of tourists in Bali, Morocco, Egypt and Jordan and the shooting of Indian nationals and foreigners in Mumbai, India.

Under U.S. pressure, the Pakistani army has launched anti-terrorist campaigns in Swat and South Waziristan, having deployed close to 150,000 troops there since 9-11. But much to the consternation of the United States, Pakistan has declined to send its army into another terrorist enclave, North Waziristan. Nor has the Pakistani government permitted U.S. troops to carry out covert missions in Pakistan.

Asif Ali Zardari

Worse still, from Washington's point of view, Pakistan has strenuously objected to U.S. drone strikes, which, though extremely effective in eliminating Al Qaeda and Taliban operatives, are generally regarded as a blatant infringement of Pakistani sovereignty.

Beyond these grievances, the United States suspects that Pakistan, through its internal intelligence agency, the ISI, is playing a duplicitous game. Pakistan, on the one hand, has pursued terrorists and channelled intelligence data to the United States. On the other hand, there is a perception that Pakistan coddles and protects Washington's enemies. A case in point: Lashkar-e-Taiba, though officially banned, reportedly operates openly in Pakistan. A group that has vowed to "plant a flag" in Washington and Tel Aviv, it has been used by Pakistan as a proxy against its regional rival, India.

Admiral Mike Mullen, the outgoing chairman of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff, has described Lashkar-e-Taiba as a "global threat." Last week, he accused Pakistan of maintaining operational ties with Lashkar-e-Taiba's clone, the Haqqani group, the largest terrorist organization in Pakistan and Afghanistan.

Mullen's accusation has been heard before. In his memoirs, At the Center of the Storm: My Years in the CIA, the CIA's former director, George Tenet, scathingly wrote, "The Pakistanis always knew more than they shared with us. They did not co-operate with us in the war against Al Qaeda."

Pakistan's policy, though outwardly murky, is quite clear upon further examination.

Although Pakistan fears jihadist terrorism and has been continually victimized by it in a succession of suicide bombings, Pakistan's leaders regard India rather than the Taliban as the main enemy.

Pakistan, therefore, cultivates relations with the Taliban and like-minded groups so as to keep India, its arch enemy, at bay.

"The Pakistani establishment is providing support to terrorist groups while keeping the denial process in play," Uday Bhaskar, the former director of New Delhi-based Institute of Defence Studies and Analyses, said last week in a Reuters interview.

Pakistan's current president, Asif Ali Zardari, whose wife, Benazir Bhutto, was killed in a terrorist incident, has vowed to fight Islamic militancy in the interests of preserving "a modern, moderate Pakistan."

High-flown rhetoric, however, will not save Pakistan from the scourge of Islamic fundamentalism. Judging by last week's event in Abbottabad, Pakistan has yet to prove its wholehearted commitment to eradicating extremism in its midst.

Cantors Assembly to welcome 200 at convention

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Some 200 cantors will gather in Toronto for the 64th annual Cantors Assembly convention from May 22 to 26, the first time the event is being held in Canada.

Cantor Steven Stoehr

The CA, which is affiliated with the Conservative movement but also has members from other denominations, is the largest cantors organization in the world.

With just under 600 members, the assembly is the "largest, most powerful and most influential organization of cantors," according to Beny Maissner, cantor at Holy Blossom Temple and co-chair of the convention with fellow cantors Simon Spiro of Toronto's Beth Tzedec Congregation and Steven Stoehr of Congregation Beth Shalom in Chicago.

Stoehr, a former CA president, told The CJN last week that one of the biggest issues facing cantors in recent years is a need to reinvent themselves.

Twenty or 30 years ago, he said, it was often enough to be an inspiring liturgist. But now, in addition to that, synagogues look for cantors whose skills may include fundraising, nursing home visits and teaching, and who may need to meet higher standards of devoutness than in the past.

One indication of changing times – not only in the role of cantors but in society in general – is a session Stoehr is leading on the chevra kadisha and transgendered adults. Stoehr, who runs a chevra kadisha in Chicago, said participants will study rabbinic tshuvot so they will become more knowledgeable about and sensitive to the issues.

Sessions like that help cantors become "better partners to our rabbinic colleagues, and a better resource to our communities."

Another session will be set aside for female cantors, who have been ordained in the Conservative movement only since the late 1980s. Facilitators will be Toronto social worker Beth Feffer, and Cantor Erica Lippitz, of New Jersey. Equal pay to their male counterparts and an "uphill climb" to acceptance are issues that are particular to female cantors, Stoehr said.

He said the convention serves as "a safe haven" to discuss pressures of the cantorate and a way for participants to expand their horizons. "We all come back feeling rejuvenated, and serve our congregations better."

Spiro is particularly excited about the convention's tie-in with Jewish Music Week, which is being held for the first time in Toronto to coincide with the convention and extends to May 29.

"For me the main thing is that it's not a closed-door convention," Spiro said. "It's really very spectacularly exciting."

Spiro's wife Aliza – who is also a cantor but now works as a singer and songwriter – spearheaded the organization of Jewish Music Week. The two events have some joint programs that are open to the public, including a concert the first night of the convention featuring music of Canadian Jewish composers, which will include a tribute to Cantor Louis Danto of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, who died last year.

There will also be a memorial tribute to Jewish songwriter Debbie Friedman, who died in January, as well as a performance of the Shinonome Chorus of Japan, singing in Yiddish and Hebrew, which will be part of Holy Blossom Temple's musical series. The latter event will also honour Toronto composer Ben Steinberg.

As well, there will be informal late-night concerts that have typically been for convention participants only. "That's when the cantors let their hair down – metaphorically speaking," Spiro said

For the Monday night concert, on May 23, the CA will bestow its highest honour, the Kavod Award, on award-winning composer Marvin Hamlisch, who has written a new Shehechiyanu (which is the theme of the convention) for the event.

The convention is being held at the Marriott Eaton Centre, with some evening events being held at different locations. Further information about events that are open to the public can be found at jewishmusicweek.com/schedule.

Lecturers to compare talmudic, secular law

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

In at least one way, the practice of law and the study of Talmud bear a resemblance to each other: both require continuing education.

As of Jan.1, the Law Society of Upper Canada, the governing body for the profession in Ontario, has mandated that lawyers must put in at least three hours of study as part of its Continuing Professional Development requirement.

To help lawyers meet the requirement, Chabad Lubavitch of York Mills is teaming up with a group of attorneys to sponsor a program that focuses on professional responsibility, ethics and practice management – with a talmudic twist. The program was to be held May 9 at the downtown law offices of Fraser Milner Casgrain, said Rabbi Levi Gansburg, director of the Chabad program at Bayview Avenue and York Mills Road.

The program, titled Law Conference, Comparing Modern and Talmudic Legal Systems, has received advanced accreditation by the Law Society and was expected to attract about 100 lawyers, Rabbi Gansburg said. They will participate in back to back sessions that will focus on "reporting misconduct – a talmudic and secular law comparison," and "encouraging alternative dispute resolution where appropriate – two models."

Presenters include retired judge Harvey Spiegel, lawyers Tanya Goldberg, Leah Price and Barry Leon, as well as Rabbi Shlomo Yaffe, scholar in residence at Harvard University.

Rabbi Gansburg said the idea for the conference came from a couple of lawyers who take part in some of the programs offered by Chabad. After the Law Society approved the topics, Chabad sent out a mass e-mail to hundreds of Jewish lawyers, and "our response was overwhelming," Rabbi Gansburg said. "Many said, 'I've been waiting to do this, to study Talmud in a comparative law setting.'"

Rabbi Gansburg, who worked in New York for 10 years before returning to Toronto, said continuing education legal programs with a Judaic content are "very big" in the United States. Not only do they permit Jewish lawyers to get in touch with talmudic legal reasoning, they facilitate professional networking in a Jewish setting.

Rabbi Yaffe, who is dean of the Institute of American and Talmudic Law in New York, has participated in many similar programs in the United States, even holding discussions on the two legal systems with Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia, Rabbi Gansburg said.

The Talmud, he continued enthusiastically, "is brilliant. It sharpens the mind. It's one of the most ancient forms of law. It comprises thousands of pages of dialogue dissecting the law and that's what lawyers do. They analyze, and the Talmud is known for that."

Participating in the program expands Chabad's profile in the community and brings attention to its other programs. "We're here to build the future of Jewish life for the Bayview community," he said.

Chabad of York Mills offers a preschool program for 10 children, a Sunday Hebrew school for 60 kids, Shabbat services that attract 50 to 60 people, a monthly Jewish women's circle with about 80 participants, adult education programs, social events, and a bar and bat mitzvah club, among other activities. About 350 families have participated in at least one Chabad program at the facility, Rabbi Gansburg said.

"After many months of struggling with this, I realized that I needed to move on with my life.

I eventually went to Beit Halochem in Tel Aviv. It was here that I found a place where I could spend time with other disabled veterans, who encouraged and supported me in my rehabilitation."

Danny was married in 1986 and attended university, where he successfully completed a Master's Degree in Social Work.

After living 25 years in darkness, Danny underwent a miraculous operation that would grant him sight in one eye and the joy of seeing his wife and four children for the first time.

Regrettably the operation turned out to be a mixed blessing for Danny. Six months later he went completely blind again. It was a shattering experience that he managed to overcome with the support of his loving family and Beit Halochem.

Today, Danny works for Beit Halochem and visits wounded soldiers in the hospital, giving them encouragement and letting them know that Beit Halochem will be there to help them forever.

Cycling has become one of the most popular sports offered at our Beit Halochem Centres. Danny regularly cycles tandem and will be joining THE COURAGE IN MOTION BIKE RIDE in Israel Oct. 30-Nov. 3, 2011.

No single way to love Israel, NIF CEO says

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

There is no monolithic way of expressing solidarity with Israel, says the chief executive officer of the New Israel Fund (NIF), Daniel Sokatch.

In an interview ahead of an appearance in Toronto next week on behalf of NIF's Canadian chapter, Sokatch said he rejects the "Israel right-or-wrong" or "Israel-is-always-wrong" models of engagement with the Jewish state.

"This is a false dichotomy," he said. "This is wrong."

Many Jews, particularly young liberal ones, refuse to choose between these stark alternatives, said Sokatch, who is scheduled to deliver a speech titled "Loving Israel in Complicated Times" on May 16 at 7:30 p.m. at Congregation Habonim.

Jews can express their love for Israel by supporting causes that reflect the democratic and pluralistic values of Israel's 1948 Declaration of Independence, he said.

Daniel Sokatch

The New Israel Fund, he noted, reflects such values.

Dedicated to equality, human rights and democracy for all Israelis regardless of their religion, the New Israel Fund works for social justice through a variety of advocacy and hands-on assistance programs.

Referring to an article written by Peter Beinart in the New York Review of Books last year, Sokatch said a new generation of American Jews bristles at the thought that their liberalism must be checked at the door when Israel is on the agenda.

In fact, they need not embrace such thinking. "There is an Israel predicated on liberal values that could be attractive to younger Jews," he said. "There is an Israel to fall in love with, and it needs you."

In the meantime, he added, a rapidly increasing number of young American liberal Jews feel disconnected and disengaged from Israel.

To this segment of the Jewish population, Israel no longer looks like "an embattled David," Sokatch said, even as mainstream Jewish groups try to portray Israel in the simplistic terms outlined by the author Leon Uris in the novel Exodus.

Young liberal Jews regard Israel's military occupation of the West Bank as "morally complicated" and tend to think that the current Israeli government isn't prepared to make meaningful concessions to advance peace with the Palestinians.

Charging that some U.S. Jewish leaders merely pay lip service to dissent while really trying to stifle or quash debate by playing on fears of Israel's security, Sokatch said that "new means of engagement" with Israel must be found.

As he put it, "You can love your country and be dedicated to improving it."

In the meantime, Sokatch detects a "widening gulf" between American Jewish leaders and liberal Jews.

Turning to a related topic, he warned that civil society in Israel faces unprecedented challenges due to efforts by right-wing Knesset members from the Yisrael Beiteinu party to pass legislation to curtail freedom of speech and religion and thereby "alter the face of the Israel we love."

Yisrael Beiteinu, headed by Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman, is backing two bills that concern Sokatch.

The first would strip Reform and Conservative rabbis of the right to perform conversions in Israel and thus further empower the Orthodox rabbinate.

The second, taking the form of a loyalty oath, would require non-Jews seeking Israeli citizenship to pledge allegiance to Israel as a Jewish and democratic state.

Sokatch said the Knesset is now in the process of considering 19 other bills he finds objectionable.

Israel's future hinges not only on its relations with its Arab neighbours but on its ability to maintain peace and harmony within Israel, he said.

Bialik launches celebrations to mark 50 years

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Bialik Hebrew Day School is launching a year of celebration for its 50th anniversary with a May 26 dinner at Events on the Park.

Dinner chair Elana Waldman told The CJN, "We're looking to focus on the Bialik community." Dinner entertainment will feature current parents and alumni, including mezzo-soprano Ramona Carmelly and comedian Simon Rakoff. A video tribute will focus on the school's founding families and longtime staff members.

Organizers want to balance respect for the school's history with acknowledgment of the future and the idea of moving forward, said Waldman. The evening's tongue-in-cheek name – "Oy! The Places We Will Go" – reflects their focus on the future.

The school – which started with 43 children in nursery, kindergarten and Grade 1 – has grown to more than 800 students. A second branch is expected to open on the Lebovic community campus in Vaughan in September 2013, with a junior kindergarten, senior kindergarten and Grade 1 class.

"We're very excited about being able to bring that kind of endeavour to the Lebovic campus," school president Mark Nightingale told The CJN, adding that the branch will grow to include all the years through Grade 8.

Former board member Anne Sokoloff, whose husband, Julius, was one of Bialik's founders, recalls that it was Moshe Menachovsky, principal of the Borochov evening school, who approached her husband and businessman Victor Topper about the idea of setting up a day school.

Three others eventually joined them as founders, and Menachovsky served as the school's first principal until ill health prevented him from continuing, Sokoloff said.

She recalls that her husband, a Toronto-born pharmacist, was motivated to start the school because no other day school offered Yiddish language or European Jewish history, or emphasized the ties with Israel the way he envisioned.

The school held its first classes in the Farband Labour Zionist building at 12 Viewmount Ave., and the organization eventually left the building to the school.

Pearl Mekler's Bialik roots go even further back. Her father was a founder of Bialik's precursor, the Farband Jewish Folk Shule, in the 1920s, and her daughter was in the first Grade 1 class of Bialik.

Elana Waldman

A former local and national president of Na'amat Canada, which is part of the Labour Zionist Alliance, Mekler has represented Na'amat on the Bialik board since 1961.

"I was involved because I was interested in Jewish education," Mekler added. "I think we have remained true to the core values of the Labour Zionist philosophy. Certainly there is an emphasis and a very strong connection with Israel.

"Now, through the Internet, the kids feel they're actually there."

Nightingale, who attended Bialik in the 1970s, said that when he enrolled his oldest son in the school, his biggest concern was that it was so much bigger than he remembered. He was delighted to discover that it was still "that heimish place."

However, he added, current students receive a more sophisticated education about Israel and Zionism.

Nightingale said the school gave him "a gift – academically, and in terms of understanding we all have a role to play in this world, and in our community.

Head of school Shana Harris attributed Bialik's growth in numbers not only to building expansions in recent years, but to a "focused effort" to meet the needs of all kinds of learners.

"We've increased the amount of resource support – what used to be called remedial – to students in both general and Jewish studies."

As well, she added, the school has made "a huge investment in technology," and has much more of a focus on experiential education, particularly in teaching about Israel.

Harris said the school is still strongly connected to its Labour Zionist roots through Na'amat, "but the Labour Zionist philosophy in the school today focuses less on the labour and strongly on the Zionist."

For more information about the dinner or to reserve, call Michal Daskalo at 416-783-3346, ext. 223, or go to launchinto50.bialik.ca. Tickets start at $200 per person.

Do-it-yourself chupahs, Part 2

Your special date is set, the ketubah is being designed and you've chosen the perfect music. Although most synagogues would be happy to rent you a chupah, you'd like something a bit more personal. The web is the perfect place for inspiration in creating your own or to find someone who will lend a hand.

Elsa Wachs asked friends and family to contribute personal items to be incorporated into her son's chupah. The groom contributed a red plastic elephant-shaped key, a token of his childhood. His bride chose a necklace he had given her. "Other relatives sent pieces of fur, gloves – even a tallit. Wachs herself contributed two scarves: her parents had given her one when she was 16; a cousin had brought the other back from his honeymoon. That cousin had introduced Wachs and her husband, and Wachs, in turn, introduced the cousin to his wife." That chupah has become a family heirloom and has been used at the weddings of Wachs' three sons, two cousins and other relatives. [http://bit.ly/chupah8]

Or you could use a tallit as the canopy for your chupah. As mytalit.com writes, "the practice of using the tallit itself in the wedding is an iconic practice in Judaism... The chupah tallit should remind the couple of their commitment to God as a couple, the same the tallit, tallis or prayer shawl remains the Jews of the commitment to the mitzvah." [http://bit.ly/chupah10]

Looking for more inspiration? The Jewish Wedding Network has created a slide show of more than 50 chupahs that are bound to impress you. When you see something you like, click on the photo and you'll find contact information for the person who uploaded the photo. [http://bit.ly/chupah9]

Richard Caro has some interesting credentials if you are looking for professional assistance. Caro is a direct descendant of Yosef Caro, the 16th-century kabbalist of Safed. The contemporary Caro feels that he has a special responsibility to create the right chupah. "I see myself as a builder, and a chupah is a spiritual representation of a couple's first house. When a couple decides to make a chupah, or have one made for them, they are creating something that they will have in their lives forever." [http://bit.ly/chupah12] Oh, and I love the name of his blog, "deus ex (sewing) machina." [http://bit.ly/chupah13]

Carin Davis spoke to Joan and Joel Schrier, who helped their daughter and son-in-law produce a patchwork chupah. The Schriers sent 36 fabric squares to wedding guests and asked them to decorate them with meaningful illustrations. Their daughter, Kimberly, hopes to continue the custom when she has children of her own. "I'd love if they got married under our quilt chupah, but with an added a perimeter of squares made just for them." [http://bit.ly/chupah14]

To celebrate, mourn or remember?

I first learned about the killing of Osama bin Laden on Facebook. A former student of mine, now attending a university in New York, posted that he was at Ground Zero singing the Star Spangled Banner with a crowd of fellow celebrants. He wrote, "Went to Ground Zero!! It was amazing." When I logged into Facebook and read his status, a dozen people had already "liked" his post. At Ground Zero, outside the White House and in centres around the world, similar crowds gathered to celebrate the death of bin Laden.

Class Act

Daniel Held

Like my student, I feel an inner contentment knowing that bin Laden is dead. I feel safer and I believe that justice has been served. I think of those who lost loved ones on 9/11 or at war fighting Al Qaeda and hope they, too, feel a sense of justice and closure.

Proverbs 11:10 states, "When the wicked perish, there is song." Last week, that song was the American anthem sung at the deathbed of the thousands murdered on 9/11.

This is our modus operandi on Purim. After the hanging of Haman, the Jews were given reprieve to defend themselves, "so the Jews struck at their enemies with the sword, slaying and destroying, they wreaked their will upon their enemies."(Esther, 9:5) In the wake of defensive killing of tens of thousands, Mordechai commanded celebration. On the day "which had been transformed for from one of grief and mourning to one of festive joy they were to observe days of feasting and merrymaking." (9:22)

At the same time, I feel discomfort in celebrating death. While recognizing the terror and suffering that bin Laden has wrought, which can never be forgiven or forgotten, and while acknowledging the future evil his death has spared us from, how can we celebrate and sing when one of God's creations is killed?

Passover reflects such sentiment. While we celebrate the Exodus and God's mighty miracles, we also take pause to recognize the suffering of the Egyptians. Though we are thankful for the plagues that freed our ancestors from slavery, we spill wine from our glasses to remember the suffering wrought on the Egyptians. Though we sing the praise of Hallel with gusto, our liturgy truncates its full singing. How can we sing when God's creations were swept away and drowned in the Red Sea?

Proverbs offers a counter-balance to its earlier saying. "Do not rejoice in the downfall of your enemy, and do not let your head be glad when he stumbles." (Prov. 24:16) The 13th-century Spanish commentator Rabenu Yona adds that "it is a weighty matter upon which many people fall into error. One should not rejoice in one's enemy's misfortune, even if that enemy is an evil person."

I wrote this column the morning after bin Laden's death, when my frame of reference still lay in Purim and Pesach.

While inwardly my heart is thankful for an end to this chapter and hopeful for the peace and security it may bring, I'm not ready to outwardly celebrate and sing. By the time this column is published, I will have endured the emotional roller-coaster of Yom Hashoah, Yom Hazikaron and Yom Ha'atzamut, commemorations and celebrations that will surely shed new light and new thinking on today's events.

A place for Jewish students

Students who are far from home are faced with many new challenges.

Some of these challenges will result in intellectual stimulation as students focus on their preferred areas of studies. Non-academic challenges, however, may be a little more difficult to deal with. The problem of continuing to follow religious traditions after leaving the nest for school is a difficult one for Jewish students.

Many Jewish traditions are celebrated with family around the dinner table. During an intense study period, it can be difficult to find time to go home. This year, Passover fell on April 18, during the exam period, making it next to impossible for these students to plan a trip to their respective cities.

With their families being in other parts of the country, and perhaps the world, it can be daunting for them to sit down for a seder without the familiarity of family. Rabbi Chaim Boyarsky, and the Chabad Student Network (CSN) in Ottawa, have diligently been trying to create a home for these students.

Rabbi Boyarsky believes it's very important to help these Jewish students stay connected to their roots. He acknowledges that students living away from their parents may face difficulties. "Students away from the comforts of their home may not have the ability to celebrate Passover in true family spirit," Rabbi Boyarsky said. "We welcome them to join the Chabad on campus family, so they can fully experience and enjoy Passover."

Staying true to his beliefs, Rabbi Boyarsky, for Passover, opened his home to a large number of Jewish students, making sure they were well fed with traditional services and a meal. The seders

On Campus

Justin Dahan

were described on the Facebook event page as "a home-made five-course dinner that would make your bubbie proud."

The number of people who attended the two seders was staggering. "We had 80 students the first night and 65 the second," Rabbi Boyarsky said.

Students left the seders feeling happy. Fourth-year economics student Demian Chaiquin said, "The seders at Rabbi Chaim's were prime examples of how welcoming the Jewish community is in Ottawa."

Rabbi Boyarsky and the CSN play an integral role in welcoming students to the Ottawa Jewish community. He has always worked very hard to open his home to Jewish students. He is often heard on both the Carleton University and University of Ottawa campuses saying to Jewish students that they are "always welcome" to come over. Rabbi Boyarsky consistently fills up his home for Shabbat dinners and leaves his guests' minds and stomachs nourished with enriching conversation as well as bountiful food. Many Jewish students say they consider his house to be their home away from home.

Ottawa campuses have benefited greatly from Rabbi Boyarsky's work. Not only does he contribute by helping students feel at home during the High Holidays, he also does it throughout the school year.

He has done plenty for Jewish students, aside from his Shabbat dinners. He also has a weekly pizza-and-Parshah event, where Jewish students meet in a large group to discuss the Parshah, as well as dine on kosher pizza from Rideau Bakery.

Diverse customs are a strength

The Talmud Shabbat (21b) says that whatever one studies in his youth is much more enduring than what one learns later in life. Elsewhere, in Chapter 4 of Ethics of Our Fathers, Elisha Ben Avuya says, "He who learns when a youth, to what is he like? He is like ink written on fresh paper. But one who learns when old, to what is he like? He is like ink written on rubbed paper."

As a child, I grew up in a Sephardi home, where I learned about my heritage and Jewish values. It was done in very gentle and subtle ways. Each holiday had its special aromas and flavours, and a unique charm that engendered keen anticipation.

Sephardi Window

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

Rosh Hashanah had the quince marmalade, Sukkot the couscous, Chanukah the sfenj (Moroccan donuts), Purim the bread baked with hard boiled eggs, Pesach the Moroccan charoset, Mimouna the moufletas (Moroccan crepes) and the eggplant and orange jam, and Erev Tisha b'Av the Moroccan lentil soup.

All of these different foods suggest to this very day what I looked forward to as a child.

Another component of my education is the memory of the Sephardi music in our home. Each holiday and special occasion had its own musical signature. These beautiful songs were written by our great Sephardi composers, among whom are Rabbi Yehuda Halevy, Ibn Gabirol, and, most recently, Rabbi David Bouzaglo.

My mother told me on different occasions how she grew up in the city of Mogador across the street from the synagogue. She used to wake up to the beautiful melodies sung by the paytanim (liturgical singers). Those songs, too, had themes connected to different holidays and inculcated in me and my siblings the traditional anticipation of, and yearning for, the Holy Land.

As I grew older, I started to examine more carefully the different customs that I grew up with and found that some of them were nearly 1,000 years old! These customs were in no way arbitrary, as each accentuated an aspect of the holiday or the season of the year.

One of these customs is the Mimouna, which we continue to celebrate at the departure of Pesach. The first to mention this custom was Rav Nissim Gaon (990–1062). This custom evolved over time and is today a national holiday in Israel.

It is personal and indeed crucial to preserve these customs, ingrained in me since childhood, and not just because I am a Sephardi rabbi presiding over the only Sephardi synagogue west of Toronto. It's hard to describe, but, if I were to lose even one of these customs, it would be as if I lost a part of me. I am proud of my ancestry and its varied customs, and I derive much pleasure in sharing it with others.

Let's all take pride in those customs that make us who we are. Furthermore, let's begin to understand those of all of our Jewish brethren that make them who they are. After all, the diversity of customs, along with the unity of belief, is what serves to strengthen the Jewish People.

Media cling stubbornly to established storylines

What has Margaret Wente's April 26 Globe and Mail column, "Can you handle the truth?" to do with the coverage of the Middle East? On the surface, nothing, but by implication, quite a lot.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Wente's subject was the failure of the media to disclose the truth about the relative health of the Gulf of Mexico, including its fishing industry, one year after the horrific Deepwater Horizon oil spill. According to Wente, despite some lingering problems, most scientist have found the Gulf to be surprisingly healthy. Yet, she noted, media coverage overwhelmingly has clung to the established "narrative of catastrophe."

Why was this so? Why ignore the abundance of countervailing facts?

Her answer is that the media had invested too much in the "disaster" storyline (which also captured the "morality tale" of evil oil interests versus good environment) to change it in light of new evidence.

It's on this theme – maintaining the established storyline and ignoring overwhelming contrary evidence – that Wente's remarks become relevant to much of the coverage of the Middle East.

What we find here, with some exceptions, is a persistent narrative: currently, the notion that Islamists (whether Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood or its offshoot Hamas) are actually "moderates" if given the chance to prove it.

The latest illustration of this is the storyline found in much of the coverage of the "unity" agreement between Fatah and Hamas signed in Cairo last week. Despite fresh statements from Hamas leaders themselves that they'll never recognize Israel's right to exist and are determined to destroy it, numerous media reports ignored these pronouncements and focused instead on potentially positive results of the reconciliation agreement.

To be sure, the media in general did report that Hamas still refuses to accept the Quartet's conditions that it recognize Israel's right to exist, renounce violence, and endorse existing Israel-PLO agreements. But many also drew attention to an apparent willingness of Hamas to compromise.

Patrick Martin, for instance, wrote (globeandmail.com, May 4) that "While Hamas leaders say they will not accept Israel's right to exist... they repeatedly make it clear they are willing to establish a Palestinian state based on the June 1967 borders that defined the West Bank and Gaza, and willing to sign a long-term truce with Israel."

In fact, Khaled Meshal, the Damascus-based head of Hamas who signed the reconciliation deal with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, reiterated one critical caveat. During the Cairo ceremony, Meshal brought up the key, longstanding demand for establishing a Palestinian state on the 1967 lines: the insistence on the "right of return" of Palestinian refugees to Israel. This of course would mean the destruction of Israel, not even a "long-term" truce with it. In short, what appears to many to be Hamas' moderation toward Israel is anything but.

Osama bin Laden killing denounced by Hamas PM

Martin did acknowledge one aspect of Hamas' extremism when he noted that Ismail Haniyeh, the Gaza-based Hamas prime minister, "didn't do his cause any good... when he condemned the U.S. killing of Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden, just minutes after his Fatah 'partners' hailed the killing as a boon for peace."

Hamas leaders weren't alone in their views. The Fatah-affiliated Al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigade issued a similar statement, and the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt also denounced the operation.

The previous day in the National Post, Robert Fulford wrote about Haniyeh's praise of bin Laden as an "Arab holy warrior" and condemnation of the U.S. operation for its "continuation of the American policy based on oppression and the shedding of Muslim and Arab blood." Fulford also added a rare skeptical reminder that Hamas "was recently endorsed by many observers as an appropriate peace partner for Israel."

In an opinion piece in the May 5 Globe and Mail, Michael Bell, in a departure from the standard narrative, observed that "Hamas' ideological determinism forces rejection of any achievable option [with Israel], despite what its members might whisper into the ears of western sympathizers."

Fixed, familiar narratives may be appealing and comforting. But, as Wente reminded us – and these exceptions above indicate – it's the truth that matters.

DANI panel to address special needs

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Marc Penner of Queens, N.Y., will join two Toronto rabbis for a May 15 panel presentation on "Special Needs: What Halachah Expects from the Community."

The Sunday morning event is organized by DANI (Developing and Nurturing Independence), an organization for young adults with physical and/or cognitive challenges. It runs from 9:30 to 11:45 at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation (BAYT), and admission is free.

Rabbi Marc Penner

Rabbi Asher Vale, the BAYT's interim rabbi, and Rabbi Mordechai Torczyner, rosh beit midrash of Torah Mitzion Beit Midrash, which is affiliated with Yeshiva University, will round out the panel, with Rabbi Vale introducing and moderating the discussion.

Rabbi Penner – spiritual leader of a Young Israel congregation and an administrator at Yeshiva University – is the father of 15-year-old Matis, who has autism.

The rabbi refers to his son as a "superstar, because he can do lots of great things despite his challenges," he told The CJN in a phone interview last week. A marathon runner, Matis works part time and has a role in his synagogue.

"A lot of it is learning to celebrate what people can do," said Rabbi Penner, whose remarks will address parents of special needs children as well as the greater community.

"I think there is a lot that needs to be changed," he added. "Small needs and small changes can make a big difference."

Rabbi Torczyner, whose kollel is involved in supervising the kashrut of DANI's new catering initiative, said that, as a rabbi, he's seen the importance of addressing the issues facing special needs families. Among them are how to celebrate bar and bat mitzvahs, and mainstream versus separate education.

"It's very clear there is a need to do more," he said.

Susie Sokol, who co-founded DANI with Kathy Laszlo, is co-sponsoring the panel with her sisters to honour the memory of their parents, Olly and Bumi Mittelman.

The more community connection that people with special needs have, the better it is for them, particularly as their parents age, Sokol said.

DANI has had wonderful support from the Jewish community since its inception in 2005, she added. "We're the first generation who has included our kids everywhere."

Former BJE leader finds new life at Ve'ahavta

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Seymour Epstein, a Jewish community fixture who dedicated his career to humanitarianism and education, hopes to help Ve'ahavta, the Toronto-based Jewish humanitarian organization, with his decades of experience.

Just weeks ago, Epstein accepted a position as Ve'ahavta's acting director of international and education, filling in for Sarah Zelcer, who is on maternity leave.

Epstein said he's "very happy" to be working for Ve'ahavta "because for me it blends two worlds that I've been involved with my whole life."

Having spent 10 years as the director of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Board of Jewish Education, and 18 more doing humanitarian work in North Africa, eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union with the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, Epstein, a former CJN columnist, said working for Ve'ahavta feels like a "perfect fit."

"The combination of international work and education is exactly what I'm all about," he said.

Epstein, who joined Ve'ahavta just over a month ago, added, "I'm 65 years old, so this is a great moment to start fresh. I have a new job, and it's very exciting."

Epstein spoke enthusiastically about the international initiatives Ve'ahavta facilitates.

"We just had a medical mission that returned from two weeks in Guyana, where we had four doctors and two other volunteers working in villages and running clinics in places where there is very little access to that kind of medicine," Epstein said.

"We have a Kinder Kit program where we fill a backpack full of school supplies that we give out to children around the world."

Since the program launched in 2009, almost 30,000 backpacks have been distributed to children in developing countries including Zimbabwe, Guyana and Argentina.

"We just sent 10,000 Kinder Kits to Israel, and there will be a mission going there in June to distribute them through our partners," Epstein said.

He said that although his new position with Ve'ahavta is "radically different" from his work with UJA Federation, where he focused solely on the Jewish education system, he'll be using his expertise as an educator to develop a new program at Ve'ahavta that teaches people to be empathetic.

"We're looking at ways that we can be a force of Jewish education in the city, specifically in the area that excites us, which is humanitarian work, tikkun olam and the passion for tzedakah," Epstein said.

"We're hoping to become a force for what [Ve'ahavta] president, Avrum [Rosensweig], calls, education for empathy. This is about teaching the values of tikkun olam to young people."

Rosensweig explained that while the education program is still in the conceptual phase, his goal is to offer classes at Ve'ahavta's new offices on Bridgeland Avenue in Toronto.

"I'd like to connect our programming... to our classes, to our education so people can learn about tikkun olam and then translate it into action in places like Guyana, Haiti, Zimbabwe, and other places around the world," Rosensweig said.

Epstein said the plan is to first offer courses to Ve'ahavta's past volunteers, as well as those of other Jewish agencies.

"The idea is that we might be able to offer a course to workers in Jewish agencies [that is in line with] the kinds of Jewish values that go behind their work," Epstein said.

In terms of his personal goals, Epstein said he's eager to help develop the education department and turn it into "a real force for education in the community.

"That is a really important goal, and I think we have a lot to offer," he said, adding that the organization recently received two major gifts to develop the education initiative.

Rosensweig, who said that while his goals are "lofty," he wants to push Ve'ahavta beyond Toronto to be a voice "that speaks about empathy from a Jewish point of view" on an international scale.

"We really want to make an impression on the world."

Rosensweig said that Epstein "fits in very well with our plans to expand our education department," and having his expertise is "a gift and a treasure."

Epstein said the feeling is mutual.

"To say, 'I care about people and I want to do something,' is not quite enough... I think it's important for a people like the Jews to reflect on what it is about our past that forces us to have empathy and want to help," he said.

"[Ve'ahavta] really made a great fit for me... There were no alterations necessary."

Epstein's addition isn't the only new development at Ve'ahavta.

On June 5, it will be hosting a public housewarming to dedicate its new offices at 200 Bridgeland Ave. The agency moved from its Yonge Street location to Bridgeland in November.

UJA Walk with Israel Family Challenge takes to the streets on Sunday, May 29

Funds raised have doubled from this time last year

By Daniel Horowitz and Taali Lester Tollman

With over 200 families having already pledged to raise a minimum of $1,000 and 33 more committed to bringing in at least $5,000, this year's UJA Walk with Israel Family Challenge, taking place on Sunday, May 29, has already raised twice as much as was raised at this time last year - and fundraising is only now moving into high gear.

And what better family project is there than joining forces on behalf of UJA to raise funds for its ongoing, transformative work in Israel?

"The Walk is huge in our community, in fact it's actually the largest single-day Jewish event in Toronto, but we wanted this year's event to be more than just about the one day, and that funds raised will continue to work on behalf of Israel and her citizens. We have been overwhelmed with our community's response," said Laurie Sheff, chair of this year's Walk with her husband Jonny Cole.

"This year, we started the Family Challenge where we actually challenged families to come together and either commit to raising $1,000 or $5,000 towards UJA's incredible, ongoing work in Israel." Cole continued. "So now you not only have an amazing community event, and a day of great fun, you also have a signature event that raises money for Israel and can truly make a difference in the long-run."

Sam Hershenhorn, 85, seen here with great nieces Felicia (l) and Jaclyn at a past Walk with Israel, will be participating in his 44th Walk on Sunday, May 29th.

Prior to the 10:00 a.m. start of the Walk, participants are invited to the kick-off party, taking place at 9:00 a.m., featuring a live performance by Juno Award winner Shawn Desman, presented by Mandell Entertainment Group & Camp Timberlane at 9:30 a.m. at Coronation Park. The day culminates with great food, games, rides and inflatables for the kids at the Renee & Irwin Nadal Festival at Ontario Place, starting at 12:30 p.m., after the completion of the Walk.

One man who can't wait for the Walk to start is Toronto's Sam Hershenhorn, who at 85, will be doing exactly what he's done once a year for the past 43 years, he'll put on his shoes, and walk the Walk.

To put this incredible feat into perspective, consider that Sam started this annual ritual back in 1967 which also happens to be the year we celebrated the 100-year anniversary of Canadian Confederation and, alas, the year the Toronto Maple Leafs last captured the Stanley Cup.

Back then, Sam completed the then grueling 26-mile UJA Walkathon with his wife, Gertrude, and children. Today, in time for this year's Family Fun Challenge, Sam's close knit circle has grown to include not only his children, but his three grandchildren and one great grandchild.

"Today, the Walk is much more about community involvement, and, of course, family involvement," says Sam. "The Walk with Israel has always been important to me and my family because it unites our Jewish community for one purpose, Israel. It also happens to combine two of my great loves, walking and helping Israel."

For Sam, the Walk is anything but a one-day event. In fact, the event consumes a good four months of his year, as he writes letters to potential donors, collects pledges and generally prepares for the day itself.

And, however Sam gets himself ready to walk, it's clear that his strategy is a winning one. Last year, Sam raised more than $18,000 from 205 sponsors, and judging by his unmistakable passion for this year's event, nobody would be surprised if he raises the bar again, as he has for the past 43 years.

As proof that the Walk with Israel Family Challenge has attracted enthusiastic participants and fundraisers, young and old, alike, the Green Gold Rainbow Fundraising team has already exceeded their expectations.

Comprised of Daniel Carman, 29, and Zach Goldstein, 30, the team has already raised more than $4,000 for the Walk.

"Zach and I are childhood friends and, growing up, we always talked about raising money together," says Carman. "Both of us made strong connections to Israel through our Canada-Israel Experience Birthright Israel trip, and we were both so grateful to had been given the gift of this incredible trip to Israel, we wanted to raise money for the Walk and walk with our peers and be able to give back to the country that has left such important footprints in our lives. We want to recognize all the people who stepped up to the plate this year and donated generously to our team. Everyone who donated will be walking with us in spirit."

Hillel awards honour passionate students

Laura Fixman
Intern

Most of the nearly 70 award winners at the 15th annual Hillel Awards Night, held last week at Ryerson University, were current students who have shown leadership and commitment to Jewish life on campus.

But Adam Hummel, who won the Outstanding Alumnus Award, instituted last year, was honoured for his achievements as a student, even though his undergraduate days are over.

"He exemplifies everything in our leadership that we aspire to," Hillel's executive director, Zac Kaye, said.

Hummel's work included founding Youth Ambassadors for Peace, which involved bringing peace-building programs to Kenya, including a soccer tournament. He was also the two-time president of Hillel at York and is now a law student at the University of Windsor.

Although he was being honoured for what he did for Hillel, he said he felt that Hillel did a lot for him.

"Hillel changed my life, and Hillel has the opportunity to change everyone's lives," Hummel told the audience.

He shared the story of his first time visiting the Hillel at York lounge. He was looking for more information on Israel, and the staff there directed him to a filing cabinet and asked him to come to them with any questions.

He added that he has changed a lot since then, and so has Hillel.

"It's amazing to see how much it's grown," Hummel said in an interview.

Current students who received awards are just as committed to making diverse contributions to Jewish life. One new initiative Kaye said he's very proud of is the "Jewski" program, which reaches out to students from the former Soviet Union.

"It's very typical of the kind of programming we do when we reach out to niches of students on campus," he told those in attendance.

There were also awards presented to students from specific campuses. They included awards for Ryerson, the University of Toronto, York University and Seneca College.

Kaye said he was grateful for the contributions each of these campus leaders made.

"We don't take for granted what the students commit to," Kaye said.

One of Ryerson honourees was Rachel Velsher, who was Holocaust and genocide awareness chair this year. The other was Mitch Reiss, who was involved in the Save a Child's Heart program and will be the president of Hillel at Ryerson next year.

Winners from U of T included Tal Shachar, who created a Jewish education seminar; Chaim Graftstein, a first-year student who was praised for his willingness to help, and Oleg Shteyner.

The York winners included Rony Kamenetsky, who was heavily involved with the Jewish fraternity AEPi; Elysa Keshen, who demonstrated a huge amount of passion for Israel this year, and Yonatan Oliver, who made sure there was a strong Jewish speaker at York every week.

The students honoured from Seneca, Dovi Lipton and Sarah Agulnik, were both instrumental in re-establishing Hillel at Seneca's Newnham Campus this year.

Kaye emphasized that he was proud of how many students were reached by Hillel and the way the organization continues to expand.

Adam Hummel [Laura Fixman photo]

"We engaged close to 500 students who never would have been involved at all," Kaye told The CJN.

He added that Hillel creates a sense of conversation by breaking down barriers and building relationships.

As an example, he spoke of Layla Lavan, an event showcasing Israeli arts and culture that was advertised as being presented Nuit Blanche-style. He said such events counter anti-Israel sentiment on campus.

Steven Farber, who accepted the Founding Friends of Campus Award on behalf of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, also commented on how much Hillel has grown in his time as a student. He hoped that this bodes well for federation's future.

"When you leave campus, that doesn't mean you need to stop your activity," Farber told the winners.

Montreal matriarch was the niece of Seagram's founder

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Mildred Lande's death marked the passing of an era when scions and inheritors of great family wealth made giving back to their community an overriding purpose in their lives, family and friends suggested at her funeral at Congregation Shaar Hashomayim May 1.

Mildred Lande

Such was the case with "Milly," as she was known, they said. She died April 28 at age 97.

The daughter of Abe Bronfman and niece of Seagram's founder Samuel Bronfman, Lande was described as an "accidental trailblazer," an optimistic woman with no airs or pretensions who treated all people with respect. She was also, they said, a person of resolute purpose who involved herself deeply in an array of Jewish and non-Jewish institutions and causes.

Lande had deep affection and devotion for "the Shaar," Shaar Hashomayim, where she was a major benefactor and regular presence for more than 60 years, and where she remained active almost to her dying day.

The major reception hall at the shul bears her name, and Lande, a devoted practitioner of needlepoint, handmade many of the synagogue's Torah covers.

She was also one of the first "multitaskers," her son Eric said, and could be found on a regular basis in the Shaar kitchen, cooking for "the old people," as she phrased it when she was more than 90 years old herself, or pitching in with spirit during the 1998 ice storm.

"She was here on every Shabbat," Rabbi Adam Scheier noted.

After Bernard Lande, her husband of 57 years, died, the Shaar "became her greatest solace," rabbi emeritus Wilfred Shuchat said.

He said Lande was especially responsible for a "long list" of programs developed at the Shaar, including its High Holiday supplementary service.

She also insisted on staying in charge of the "seating committee," a comment that elicited laughter.

At the funeral, the Shaar choir performed her favourite liturgical selection, L'dor V'dor, and among the pallbearers was her first cousin, Charles Bronfman. Several grandchildren also spoke.

"You were her nourishment," her daughter Ruth told those assembled.

In addition to becoming, in the early 1980s, the first woman president of the Shaar, an Orthodox synagogue by charter, Lande also served as the first female head of the Combined Jewish Appeal General Campaign of then-Allied Jewish Community Services, of the Israel Emergency Fund and its Women's Division, of the Jewish Community Foundation of Montreal and of Mount Sinai Hospital.

Lande is survived by children Neil, Eric, Ruth and Margot, sister Ruth, six grandchildren and four great-grandchildren.

Tories take some 'Jewish' ridings from Liberals

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

The May 2 election resulted in a tectonic shift in Canada's political landscape and a surprising amount of MP turnover in ridings with large Jewish populations.

Prime Minister Stephen Harper

While the Harper Conservatives won their first majority, the Liberal party saw its leader, Michael Ignatieff, lose in his Etobicoke-Lakeshore riding, and a number of high-profile MPs were defeated, many in ridings with high numbers of Jewish residents that had been Liberal strongholds.

Indeed, the tide of Jewish votes seemed to swing in favour of the Conservatives across the country.

Just prior to the campaign, a Conservative advertising strategy targeting ethnic communities, including ridings with large Jewish communities, was made public.

In Montreal's Mount Royal riding, Irwin Cotler was only one of six Quebec Liberals who managed to hold their seats. Despite his victory, it was the closest race of his political career, as he beat Conservative challenger Saulie Zajdel, a former city councillor and B'nai Brith official, by less than 2,300 votes, with only a 41.4 per cent share of the vote.

Mark Adler

The Liberals had 11 seats in Quebec prior to the election.

Across the Greater Toronto Area, Liberal MPs were chased from their traditional bastions.

In York Centre, a riding with a large Jewish constituency, former cabinet minister and Liberal leadership hopeful Ken Dryden fell to Conservative newcomer Mark Adler by nearly 6,400 votes. Adler, a businessman and founder of the Economic Club of Canada, is the first Conservative to win the riding since 1957.

The morning after his defeat, the former star goalie with the Montreal Canadiens stood in the rain on the corner of Wilson Avenue and Bathurst Street waving to rush hour traffic, holding a sign that read: "Thank You! – Ken Dryden."

Joe Oliver

To the south, in Eglinton-Lawrence, Dryden's fellow Liberal incumbent, Joe Volpe, who had held the seat since 1988, lost to Conservative rival Joe Oliver, a lawyer and investment banker.

Both Oliver and Adler are Jewish.

Eglinton-Lawrence, another electoral district with a large number of Jewish voters, saw Oliver best Volpe by more than 4,000 votes on election night, ending the Liberals' 32-year hold on the riding.

Meanwhile in St. Paul's, Liberal incumbent Carolyn Bennett successfully defended her seat against Conservative Maureen Harquail, winning by about 4,600 votes. Bennett's previous victories – she has held the riding since 1997 – were all by more than 10,000 votes.

In Thornhill, the riding with the largest proportion of Jews in Canada, Conservative incumbent Peter Kent cruised to a comfortable win, beating Liberal Karen Mock by more than 24,000 votes, with a 61 per cent majority of ballots cast.

Conservatives capture York Centre, Eglinton-Lawrence

In Willowdale, incumbent Martha Hall Findlay, also a former Liberal leadership candidate, lost a tight race to Tory Chungsen Leung, who won by less than 1,000 votes.

Leung's website describes him as "an entrepreneur with vast international business experience."

And in the riding of Don Valley West, where Jews make up more than eight per cent of the population, Conservative John Carmichael thwarted Liberal Rob Oliphant's quest to retain his seat by eeking out a 600-vote win.

The Liberals had held the riding since 1993.

In Manitoba, the riding of Winnipeg South Centre changed political colours as well. Liberal incumbent Anita Neville, who is Jewish, lost to Conservative rival Joyce Bateman by less than 700 votes.

Winnipeg South Centre has 59,444 voting-age residents, with pockets of significant Jewish population.

The final national seat counts for the parties are Conservative, 167, NDP, 102, Liberal, 34, Bloc Québécois, 4, and Green, 1.

Most Jews in Mount Royal voted Tory, Cotler concedes

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Liberal MP Irwin Cotler, who won with 41 per cent of the vote in Mount Royal, acknowledges he didn't get the support of most Jewish electors.

"Clearly, there was an erosion," Cotler said in an interview after the May 2 federal election. "I think it's correct that I lost the majority of the Jewish vote. But I won, importantly, in the cultural communities."

His closest opponent, Conservative Saulie Zajdel, who trailed Cotler by 2,200 votes, is confident he received at least two-thirds of the ballots cast by Jews, who make up about 35 per cent of the electorate.

Mount Royal comprises Côte St. Luc, Hampstead, Town of Mount Royal and part of Côte des Neiges-Snowdon, and has been Liberal since 1940.

While a win for any Liberal was an accomplishment, Cotler has seen his popularity tumble from 92 per cent when he was first elected in a 1999 byelection. In 2008, he received close to 56 per cent of the votes.

Cotler, a stalwart defender of Israel and Jewish concerns, says he doesn't take it personally. Many Jews, he understands, feel a debt of gratitude to Prime Minister Stephen Harper for his stance on Israel.

"People said to me directly, 'Irwin, you're a great guy, but we have to vote for Harper. He's there for us. We have to be there for him.'"

He also admits many did not like Ignatieff, but he said he was bothered by what he called "the demonization" of Ignatieff by the Zajdel campaign.

"I had some painful encounters. I would go into seniors' residences, and they would ask me, 'Why is Ignatieff an antisemite?'... Negative attack ads do work," Cotler said.

The Zajdel campaign's flip-flopping on who was behind flyers making disparaging comparisons between the Harper Conservative and Liberal record on Israel, antisemitism and terrorism, including charges the latter party was sympathetic to Hezbollah and Hamas, left a bad taste in Cotler's mouth.

"I took Saulie's word at the beginning of the campaign that the flyers had nothing to do with him, then the ads came out. You can't have it both ways."

Cotler is one of only seven Liberals elected in Quebec and 34 in the country. As the "dean" of that greatly diminished caucus, he was asked to serve as interim leader until the party finds a replacement for Michael Ignatieff, he said, but he declined.

Cotler believes the nearly 7,000 votes New Democrat Jeff Itcush garnered was largely at his expense, rather than Zajdel's.

Irwin Cotler

"Ten days before the election, I was polling at 50 per cent. In the week after that, with the NDP surge, I was down to 40 per cent," he said.

One of the bitterest personal outcomes of the election was the loss of his close friend and "soulmate," fellow Liberal MP Ken Dryden, who lost to Tory Michael Adler in the Toronto riding of York Centre.

Both had recorded phone messages for each other's constituents during the campaign in an unusual exchange.

Cotler notes that all of the members of the Liberal Parliamentarians for Israel, including Dryden, were defeated, except, of course, himself. Cotler is now the only Jewish Liberal in the House of Commons.

The turnout in Mount Royal was 57 per cent, below the national average of 61 per cent. Cotler thinks the relatively low showing in his riding, when the race was thought to be close and an indicator of the extent to which Jews were shifting to the Tories, reflects people's growing cynicism about "negative" campaigning.

Cotler, who turned 71 this month, is now, he believes, Canada's oldest MP. But he said he doesn't feel his age, and vows "to hit the ground running" when Parliament resumes.

The former justice minister in Paul Martin's cabinet and most recently his party's human rights critic doesn't think the Liberals' demotion to third-party status will affect his advocacy on the international level.

Cotler plans to work with the government and other parties, and hopes that Harper, who now has a secure majority, will co-operate more with the opposition.

His priorities in foreign affairs are passing legislation holding Iran accountable for "incitement to genocide" and adding the Iranian Revolutionary Guard to Canada's terrorist list, as well as urging the government to endorse the Ottawa Protocol drawn up at last November's international parliamentary conference on combating global antisemitism.

MAJORITY WIN: Students in grades 5 to 8 at Leo Baeck Day School's Holy Blossom campus voted overwhelmingly for a Conservative majority government on May 2 in the school's mock election. The Conservatives received 78 per cent of the vote, followed by the Liberals, NDP and Greens. Students and teachers alike cast ballots, while Grade 6 students ran the polling station and served as deputy returning officers, poll clerks and greeters. Pictured, from left, are teacher Cindy Opler with Jared Klein-Tyer, Shane Sigesmund and Jordan Posen.

Ex-mayor's name rejected for building

Diane Koven
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Ottawa Mayor Jim Watson has backed away from his recommendation to name a new city building after a controversial former mayor whom Jewish groups said opposed Canada's acceptance of Jewish refugees during World War II.

The city's finance and economic development committee voted in favour last week of Watson's proposal to name the new central archives building the Charlotte Whitton Archives and Library Building after the late Whitton. She served two terms as Ottawa's mayor, from 1951 to 1956 and 1960 to 1964, and was the first female mayor of a major Canadian city.

The proposal was to go to council this week, but after outcry from Jewish groups and others, Watson changed tack.

"These kinds of commemorative namings should be positive occasions that bring the community together," Watson said in a letter sent Sunday night to councillors that he posted on Facebook. "Instead, this suggestion, which was mine and mine alone, was creating disunity in parts of the city, and as mayor, I felt it my obligation not to allow the matter to continue to divide."

He said the new building will open next month as scheduled, but Ottawa residents will be asked for input on its name.

Although a trailblazer in the realm of civic accomplishments, Whitton also used her position and influence as director of the Canadian Council on Child Welfare prior to and during World War II to prevent Jewish refugee children from being granted safe haven in Canada.

Mitchell Bellman, president and CEO of the Jewish Federation of Ottawa, voiced the community's opposition to honouring Whitton, "based on the critical role that she played in preventing Jews fleeing the atrocities of Nazi Germany to find refuge in Canada.

"She campaigned coast to coast to ensure that welfare agencies did not accept 'non-British refugees.' The positions that she took were based on her dislike of Jews, and they had grave consequences for the thousands of Jews who could have otherwise been saved from the death camps."

Eric Vernon, director of government relations and international affairs for Canadian Jewish Congress, had also urged city council to reject Watson's idea.

"We frankly find it astonishing that the report you received dated 20 April 2011 which contains the recommendation to name the new archives after Charlotte Whitton makes absolutely no mention of her antisemitism and how she acted upon it to her shame and discredit. The historical record shows that through her critical role in the Canadian National Committee for Refugees, Whitton worked assiduously to bar the door to Jewish orphan children seeking haven from Europe," Vernon said.

Several people also spoke against the proposal, noting that Whitton had also been known to discriminate against French Canadians and other groups.

Watson said initially he wasn't influenced by opposition to the name change, insisting that Whitton's civic accomplishments made her worthy of the honour.

"It is true that people tend to prefer to remember past leaders in a positive light," Bellman said. "We would much rather think about Canada's heroic role as part of the underground railroad or the outstanding welcome that we provided to Vietnamese boat people than to think back to the days when we turned a blind eye to the slaughter of millions."

The committee voted 8-1 to approve Watson's recommendation that the building, located in a neighbourhood with many Jewish families, be named in Whitton's honour. The lone dissenter was Counc. Keith Egli, who noted that no one had spoken in favour of the idea.

Don't leave home just yet

Family Matters

Question: We both live in the same home and tensions are rising. I am male, aged 43. We have two small children and I would prefer to move out. What happens if I do?

Answer: This is one of the most difficult questions to answer because much depends on the facts for each case. Generally, in the absence of violence or the serious threat of violence, I advise clients to stay put and not move, but rather to get therapy or someone to speak with on how to control the tension in the home. Pending a resolution, put all separation issues into a binding legal agreement or court order.

The reasons are multiple. First, if you leave the home and your spouse stays with the children, she then could be deemed the de facto custodial parent after a short period of time. This means that if push comes to shove and the parties went to court to sort out differences, a judge would likely view you leaving as an acknowledgement that your spouse is the parent that should make the child-rearing decisions, since you are leaving her behind with them and they normally sleep in the matrimonial home. This means not only the small decisions relating to their day-to-day care, but also the major decisions such as education, religion and health.

In other words, the moment you leave without the children, even without a court order, you will be deemed to have already granted her a type of acknowledgement. A future judge will interpret that as, historically speaking, the mother's having factual custody until the matter came before him for a decision on legal custody. And the process could take several months. Thereafter, no matter how good a parent you claim to have been, no matter how many allegations you may have against your spouse's parenting skills, and no matter how badly the children may want to live with you, the very act of the status quo being with Mom for all those months, and by you having entrusted them with her to begin with, will all provide a very hard challenge to overcome in any custody battle.

Moreover, with respect to your interest in the house, you may lose any interest in the increase of its value after the date of separation if it is registered solely in her name. Much depends on whether or not you registered it in her name solely in order to avoid prospective creditors. If so, you may possibly lose any benefit in the increase in its value after you separate.

Together we can accomplish anything and everything

Greetings from the president of the State of Israel to Diaspora Jewish communities on Israel's 63rd Independence Day, Yom Ha'atzmaut

Dear friends,

As we celebrate 63 years of statehood, we can look back on the historic miracle of the birth of a nation – the State of Israel. And we can laud one of our greatest leaders, David Ben-Gurion, for declaring the establishment of a Jewish state – a homeland – one momentous day in May 1948. Immediately afterward we were attacked – outmanned, outnumbered, outgunned.

From the debris of the War of Independence arose one of the best and most moral armies in the world. The desert turned into a model of state-of-the-art agriculture admired by all. Israel's development in fields such as high-tech, science, technology and medicine has placed her at the forefront of advances in these areas the world over.

On the day of the proclamation of the State of Israel, it was stated that this newly founded nation would be based on freedom, justice and peace, as envisaged by the prophets of Israel. We abide by the Jewish code of moral values instilled in us.

We are still facing evil forces, especially those that emanate from Iran. This call, from a regime that is a danger to the entire world, should be met by an uncompromising mobilization of the international community. We are determined, together with our supporters everywhere, to fight antisemitism and delegitimization.

The State of Israel is prepared to do its share, even at a painful cost, to achieve peace with our neighbours. We are hopeful that the winds of change sweeping our region will herald new opportunities for peace, security and prosperity for all.

We all share the hope that Gilad Schalit will be reunited with his family immediately.

The bridges of kinship that link the Jewish state with the Jewish communities around the world are vital to us. You are full partners in our success. Looking back, we have much to be proud of. Looking forward, we still have much to achieve. Together we can accomplish anything and everything. Together we can prevail. And together we shall celebrate many more independence days to come.

השיר בוצע בהשמעת בכורה לאחרונה בערב פרס נתן יונתן בתל אביב, כשהוא מוצג על ידי יהורם גאון, שגם משמיע אותו במדור שלו ב YNET. בקרוב יוצא השיר לרדיו והקליפ שלו ליוטיוב.

נשמת הקהילה Spirit of the Community

השני ביוני הוא אחד הימים המרכזיים של הקהילה הישראלית בטורונטו, כשהרב ישראל לנדא מקיים את האירוע השנתי "נשמת הקהילה", שבו הוא וקהל גדול סביבו מודים לאלה שעזרים להם לאורך כל השנה לספק את צרכיה הרוחניים של הקהילה הישראלית. לא סוד הוא שאני מוקיר מאוד את הרב ואת פעילותו למען רבים שהגיעו הנה ומצאו עצמם מנותקים מסיוע נפשי ורוחני, לעתים קרובות ללא משפחה קרובה, ולדאבון הלב לעתים גם על סף פת לחם. אם אתם רוצים להשתתף באירוע מרומם נפש ואופטימי- זה המקום שלכם. בעולם העיון של היום-"אהבת החינם" של רב ישראל ואנשיו ראויה לכל הוקרה ותמיכה שאנחנו יכולים לתת. אבל שישאר בינינו.

In a Better World

כל שנה אני מצפה בכליון עיניים לפרסי האוסקר- אבל לא כדי לראות איזה סרט הוליבודי "עשה את זה"- כי סרטי הוליבוד ברובם הם סרטי דיסני למבוגרים. אני ממתין לסרטי האוסקר לסרט הזר- שהם הסרטים הטובים ביותר שנוצרו בעולם וברוב מוחלט של המקרים, לטעמי האישי. הם עולים על הוליבוד בחמש דרגות. הסרט הדני "עולם טוב יותר" הוא ללא ספק אחד הסרטים הטובים ביותר שראיתי אי פעם. סיפורו של רופא שבדי שעובד במחנה פליטים באפריקה ונחשף לכל נוראות מחנה הפליטים. אך עם חזרו לחופשה למשפחתו בדנמרק, הוא מגלה שהאלימות קיימת שם באותה מידה, גם אם היא מקבלת צורות אחרות. סרט עשוי נפלא על מקומה של האלימות בחיינו. נוגע ללב מאין כמותו. 11 בסולם קורן.

Hush falls over Israel as war dead remembered

JTA

JERUSALEM – Israel continued its observance of Memorial Day, Yom Hazikaron, Monday morning with a two-minute siren sounded across the country.

The siren, during which people stopped and stood in their places and traffic came to a standstill, also marked the start of the state ceremony at Mount Herzl in Jerusalem.

The annual observance of Remembrance Day for Israel's Fallen Soldiers and Victims of Terrorism is in memory of the nearly 23,000 men and women who have fallen in battle for the State of Israel and some 2,500 Israelis who have been victims of terrorist attacks.

"It is hard to estimate the full price our state has paid with its fallen – families never established, children who were never born, creations never created," Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said during the ceremony.

"I wish I could advise those of you who have this year joined our family, the family of bereavement, but I am powerless to do so. I know that even though the entire nation accompanies you, you have been sentenced to walk alone with this pain and the abyss that has opened up in your lives," Netanyahu said.

Netanyahu has himself experienced loss. His brother, Yonatan, was killed 35 years ago leading the operation to free the hostages at Entebbe Airport in Uganda.

At a memorial ceremony Sunday on Ammunition Hill in Jerusalem to open events marking the day, Netanyahu addressed bereaved families. "As a member of a bereaved family, I am well acquainted with the pain, the sense of loss and helplessness," he said.

Netanyahu, his wife and two sons visited the grave of Yonatan Netanyahu on Saturday night.

Some 183 members of Israel's security forces, including the police, Israel Defence Forces, Border Police, Israel Security Agency and other organizations, have been killed since last Memorial Day. Among that number are the 41 police officers and prison services officers killed in December 2010 in the Carmel Forest Fire. Three firefighters were also killed in the blaze, but the cabinet decided Sunday to defer a discussion as to whether to recognize the firefighters as among Israel's fallen.

Memorial ceremonies were held in military cemeteries across the country on Monday.

"To this holy place, a remnant of our Temple, our fighting sons, the first paratroopers came, and touched the stones of the Western Wall, in the midst of the Six Day War," Israeli President Shimon Peres said Sunday night, addressing bereaved families gathered at the Western Wall for the national memorial ceremony, following a minute-long siren and moment of silence to usher in the sombre day.

"We didn't seek war. It was imposed upon us. But when we were attacked, we didn't have the possibility to lose, even one war. And when we won, we returned to seek peace," he said. "We were sober then and we remain prepared today. And in any situation, we will not give up the chance of full peace, real peace. And if one opportunity fails, we will look for a new one."

The conclusion of Memorial Day on Monday night marked the beginning of Israel Independence Day, or Yom Ha'atzmaut.

Egypt pushing Hamas on deal to release Schalit

Avi Issacharoff and Jack Khoury
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Hamas has agreed in principle to a new proposal aimed at securing the release of captive Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit.

A report, which was published on Al Jazeera television's website on Sunday, said the plan came from Egypt.

Egyptian sources told Ha'aretz Sunday that although Egypt has renewed efforts to promote a deal for Schalit's release, no actual negotiations have begun. Egypt is trying to exert pressure on Hamas to soften its stance so that a deal can be concluded, which would include the release of Palestinian prisoners.

The Egyptians are aware that if there are Palestinian elections, Hamas would need to present accomplishments to the Palestinian public.

Palestinian sources said Egypt has been working hard to advance a deal to free Schalit – who has been in Hamas captivity since June 2006 – since Hamas and Fatah signed a reconciliation agreement last week, according to the report. "Reliable" sources quoted in the report said the Egyptians intend to present their plan to an envoy who is due to arrive in Cairo shortly.

It was not immediately clear whether this was a reference to David Meidan, who was recently appointed Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's negotiator on the Schalit issue. Meidan is due in Egypt shortly, as Ha'aretz reported last week.

Senior Egyptian officials expressed optimism about the chances for a deal on Schalit's release. The Egyptians have resumed mediating Schalit negotiations and have made it clear to Hamas that they want an agreement on the issue wrapped up quickly.

Netanyahu referred to Schalit at a Memorial Day ceremony on Jerusalem's Ammunition Hill on Sunday.

Not a day passes in which his government isn't working to bring home Israel's captive and missing soldiers, "including Gilad Schalit, who is being held by a cruel enemy," Netanyahu said.

Prior to the resignation of Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, Hamas was suspicious of his intentions on the matter, suspecting that he did not want a deal concluded because it would complicate matters for Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas. More than a week ago, two leaders of the Hamas military wing visited Egypt, where they reportedly made contact with Egyptian intelligence officials on the Schalit case.

The Al Jazeera website reported that Egyptian officials also discussed the Schalit case with Hamas political leader Khaled Meshal while Meshal was in Cairo recently for the signing ceremony.

So far the Hamas military wing has been standing in the way of a deal, but observers expect that it will be willing to compromise because political issues will garner increased attention with elections coming up. In addition, the military wing is currently seen as relatively weak.

Such a compromise could include willingness to accept Israel's release of Hamas prisoners to Gaza, rather than the West Bank.

The Egyptian officials responsible for maintaining ties with the Hamas leadership are Murad Muwafi, Egypt's new intelligence chief, and one of his deputies, Mohammed Ibrahim.

Muwafi has the trust of Hamas, and Ibrahim has been involved in Schalit negotiations from the beginning. Since German mediator Gerhard Conrad has failed to get Israel and Hamas to agree on the terms for Schalit's release, Egypt has in effect taken over as the primary intermediary.

Noam Schalit, the captive soldier's father, told Ha'aretz that he had not been provided with any new information on negotiations for his son's release and said Netanyahu's remarks were nothing new.

What's important is the results, he said, and by that measure, the bottom line is that his son has been in captivity for nearly five years.

Chief Rabbinate to recognize all Israeli Orthodox conversions

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israel's Chief Rabbinate has agreed to recognize all official Jewish conversions undertaken in the country, which are all Orthodox, JTA has learned.

ITIM, the Jewish Life Information Center, and the Chief Rabbinate have reached an agreement under which the rabbinate will recognize all conversions conferred under the auspices of official Israeli conversion programs, including the military. The agreement was made available to JTA.

Rabbi Seth Farber

The Chief Rabbinate recognizes only Orthodox conversions, not those of the Reform or Masorti/Conservative movements.

ITIM had filed a lawsuit against the rabbinate in Israel's Supreme Court in May 2010 after the rabbinate refused to recognize the conversions of some couples who had come to register for marriage.

Under the agreement, local rabbis are obligated to open a marriage file for any convert that comes before them. If a local rabbi does not feel he can open the file, he can send the paperwork to a national office, which must return the paperwork to the original office within two weeks. The file then must appear on the local office's letterhead.

The Chief Rabbinate had offered to open a separate registration bureau for converts in three cities, which ITIM turned down as discriminatory.

"I am a little skeptical whether the local rabbis will follow as directed, because they have already demonstrated that they have no respect for the Chief Rabbinate," Rabbi Seth Farber, founder and director of ITIM, told JTA.

Farber said ITIM is set to respond positively to the state's offer on May 8 – the deadline for the organization to respond. He said the organization will not withdraw the complaint, only freeze it, giving the Chief Rabbinate one month to implement the new system and six months to see how it works. If it's not successful, the group can unfreeze the complaint.

"We see in the state's response a victory for the converts and the justification of the righteousness of this struggle," Farber said. "From now on, converts can again feel like an integral part of the Jewish people and not feel inferior. We must continue to be vigilant to ensure that such incidents do not repeat themselves in the future and that the state's policy decisions are actually implemented."

Israel's population over 7.7M on its 63rd birthday

Moti Bassok
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Israel's population stands at 7.746 million on the 63rd year of its independence, the Central Bureau for Statistics reported Sunday.

Since last Independence Day, there has been a two per cent rise – an increase of 155,000 – in Israel's population.

Israel's Jewish population comprises about 5.837 million (75.3 per cent) of the total 7.746 million inhabitants, while Israeli Arabs comprise about 1.587 million (20.5 per cent) of the population.

Immigrants and their descendants who are not listed as Jews by the Interior Ministry make up about 322,000 (4.2 per cent) inhabitants of the total population.

Upon the establishment of the State of Israel in 1948, the country's population was 806,000.

Since last Independence Day, some 178,000 babies were born and about 43,000 people died. Some 12,000 people left the country over the past year, and Israel's population grew by another 7,500 people for reasons unspecified by the Bureau for Statistics.

According to the report, more than 70 per cent of Israel's Jewish inhabitants were born in Israel and more than half are at least second generation Israelis, in comparison to 1948, when only 35 per cent of Israel's inhabitants were born in the country.

As of this Independence Day, 14 cities in Israel are home to more than 100,000 residents. Of them, six cities are home to more than 200,000 residents. They are Jerusalem, Tel Aviv-Jaffa, Haifa, Rishon Letzion, Ashdod and Petah Tikvah. In 1948, only one city – Tel Aviv – had more than 100,000 residents.

Agmon was commander of Operation Moses and Solomon

Agmon was brought to Canada by the Canadian Association for Aviation and Space in Israel, a Toronto-based organization that supports activities that "ensure that Israel's legacy of aviation excellence continues to thrive and serve the Israeli population through education, research and advanced training," according to its website.

Asaf Agmon

Agmon also has the distinction of being the commander who headed Operations Moses and Solomon, the two renowned rescue efforts by the Israel Defence Forces to bring Ethiopian Jews to Israel.

In an interview with The CJN last week, Agmon said Ramon's legacy continues to have an impact on the Israel Space Agency, which works at arms-length from his institute.

Astronauts and scientists from the United States visit Israel annually to speak at the Fisher Institute's yearly Ilan Ramon International Space Conference, now in its sixth year, Agmon added.

The effect is a profound one, particularly on Israeli children, he said.

Ilan Ramon

"If you ask any astronaut why they wanted to become one, they will inevitably tell you about how they listened to an astronaut talk to them in school one day when they were kids, and that [inspired] their career choice."

The conference gathers people from the IAF, NASA and the European Space Agency, as well as Israeli science students, among others, in Ramon's name in order to further space exploration.

The president of the Canadian Space Agency (CSA), former astronaut Steve Maclean, a friend of Ramon's, has spoken at the conference, Agmon said.

While in Ontario, Agmon spoke to CSA representatives.

Canada and Israel have the potential to "co-operate a lot on space projects" in the future, he said.

While Canada has its "space niche" in the form of robotics, such as the Canadarm, Israel also has its own expertise in the realm of sensors and satellite technology.

"We can learn things from each other," he said.

Agmon also noted that once Endeavour's mission is complete, the last manned shuttle launch by NASA is scheduled for June with the liftoff of the space shuttle Atlantis. After that, NASA is scuttling the shuttle program.

"The idea of [U.S. President Barack] Obama's team is to let the private sector send humans to space" from now on, Agmon said.

This will effectively leave only the Russian and Chinese space agencies with the will and capacity to send people into space and to the International Space Station (ISS).

For this reason, the Israelis have been courting the Russians and Chinese for partnerships in space technology and ventures.

In what Agmon termed a "breakthrough moment," the Fisher Institute was able to convince a delegation from China to attend the Ramon conference in Israel earlier this year. This resulted in the first "handshake" between the two countries space programs, he said.

"So now there is a possibility of co-operation in the future," he added.

Regarding the possibility of Israeli and Russian collaboration, Agmon said: "I don't see this happening in the near future."

Currently, Israel has its largest space contracts with the Europeans.

Israel is one of nine countries with space-launch capability. The others are the United States, Russia, Ukraine, France, the United Kingdom, Japan, China, India and Iran.

Families seek break

Some 5,000 bereaved Israeli families and their backers have signed a petition urging at least a 24-hour break between Memorial Day and Independence Day, saying it's too hard emotionally and logistically to have Independence Day right after Memorial Day. The change requires legislation.

Maccabi loses

Maccabi Tel Aviv lost the Euroleague basketball finals in a game that was moved up several hours so it wouldn't be played on Israel's Memorial Day. Greece's Panathinaikos defeated Maccabi Tel Aviv, 78-70, in Barcelona, Spain. More than 5,000 Israelis travelled to the game. Maccabi was trying to win its first Euroleague title in six years. It has won four since 1977.

Fuel issue grounds planes

The Israel Airport Authority (IAA) demanded Monday that the Paz Oil Company explain why it said its oil was fine when it was contaminated. Contaminated jet fuel led to a crisis at Ben-Gurion International Airport last week, with flights delayed and cancelled. The problem affected flight schedules into this week. When the IAA checked the fuel at an outside lab, it found bacteria and mould in it, and also in several fuel filters.

Jail delayed for Katsav

Israel's Supreme Court postponed the date that former president Moshe Katsav must begin serving his prison sentence on rape and sexual assault convictions. Katsav had been scheduled to enter prison May 8 to serve a seven-year sentence, but the court granted a delay last week following his appeal the previous day. The court set a May 11 date to hear a final appeal by Katsav's attorneys. The conviction was handed down in the Tel Aviv District Court last December. Katsav also was ordered to pay more than $28,000 to the rape victim and about $7,000 to the sexual assault victim. He was ordered to serve two years of probation after he is released from prison. The 300-page appeal reportedly suggested it would be undignified for Katsav to show up at the Supreme Court for his appeal in handcuffs. The appeal also asked that "weighty consideration should be given to the fact that Katsav served as the president of the State and Israel's official representative at home and abroad." The year-long trial, which was closed to the public, ended with a guilty verdict on Dec. 30.

ICRF honours five female community leaders

Luncheon raises about $650,000 to be used for research

Laura Fixman
Intern

Dr. Marla Shapiro was one of the five women honoured for their outstanding achievements in various fields at the Israel Cancer Research Fund's Women of Action Luncheon.

The fund also recognized Bonnie Brooks, CEO of The Bay; community activist Wendy Eisen; and Daniela Rotin, a biochemistry researcher at the Hospital for Sick Children. Sharon London-Liss, an Israel Cancer Research Fund (ICRF) volunteer, received a lifetime achievement award.

Nearly 800 people, a record number, attended the annual luncheon held at the Toronto Sheraton Centre on May 3, and about $650,000 was raised.

"This wonderful turnout is a testament to the worthiness of our honorees," ICRF president Bryna Goldberg said.

The event began with a video message from some of the scientists funded by the ICRF, who spoke of how ICRF funding is necessary in helping to find more effective ways to treat cancer. The 2004 Nobel Prize winners in chemistry, Avram Hershko and Aaron Clechanover, were cited as examples of ICRF-funded scientists who have made important contributions to cancer research.

Dr. Marla Shapiro

The funds raised at the luncheon will support the research of 15 separate Israeli scientists, and all the money will go directly to research, with no overhead costs.

The honorees, selected by the ICRF's executive committee, are considered women who have gone above and beyond their duty to help their own community as well as the global community.

ICRF executive director Joy Wagner Arbus said that what the honorees, among them "Dr. Marla," have in common is that they have devoted their lives to the betterment of the world.

Shapiro, an advocate for the well-being of all women, wants to encourage others to follow in her footsteps. "All of us together, as people of action, can make a difference," she said.

Before each of the honorees spoke, a video, prepared by friends and loved ones as a tribute to the honoree, was shown.

Shapiro originally said no to being honoured at the event, because she felt she didn't deserve it, she said. She never thought of herself as inspirational, although others who hear her life story may believe differently, she added.

Shapiro has experienced many hardships in her life, including losing a son to sudden infant death syndrome and being diagnosed herself with breast cancer. She said that this made her see her life in a different way.

"It changed me from a woman of reaction to a woman of action," she said.

Shapiro has been on television and across the country, sharing her story, in hopes that other people will learn from it.

Sharon London-Liss said she was too young to receive a lifetime achievement award, but she has been involved with the ICRF most of her life.

When her younger brother, David, died of leukemia in 1971, London- Liss' parents got involved in the ICRF. As an adult, London-Liss became involved herself, eventually becoming president of the fund's Toronto chapter from 2003 to 2007. Her husband was the president of the fund from 1996 to 2001, and she remains involved with the ICRF executive committee.

In her years of involvement, London-Liss has remained impressed with the skill of ICRF-funded scientists.

"I am increasingly in awe of the brilliance of their performance," London-Liss said.

The ICRF has chapters in major cities in Canada and the United States and in Israel. The funds raised by the ICRF at events such as the Women of Action Luncheon have helped Israeli scientists discover many of the cancer treatments used today.

These discoveries include drugs such as Doxil, which treats ovarian, breast and AIDS-related cancers, and improved chemotherapy techniques.

IGTO launches campaign aimed at Quebec travellers

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

The number of Canadian visitors to Israel is setting new records, but that success is not stopping the Israel Government Tourist Office (IGTO) from launching an advertising campaign to boost the country's profile in a market with untapped potential – Quebec.

The campaign is being rolled out in major media outlets, including French and English newspapers, in television and radio spots, in niche media such as Catholic newspapers and magazines, and on TV monitors in Pierre Elliott Trudeau Airport. The aim is to present French-speaking Quebecers with a campaign specifically geared to them, said Oded Grofman, consul for tourism of the IGTO's Canadian office.

Quebec has played a part in the growing number of vacationers visiting Israel, but in recent months, the IGTO has been working with tour operators and travel agents in the province to establish an infrastructure to make it easier for Quebecers to choose Israel.

The aim is to grow the market and appeal to Catholic Quebecers' interest in the Holy Land, as well as their reputation for travel to fun places that offer the finer things in life, said Grofman.

That effort could be boosted by a report last week from HotelsCombined.com, one of the world's largest online travel sites, which named Tel Aviv as one of the world's top 10 summer party destinations

The "city that never stops" is "home to some of the hottest nightclubs in the Middle East," the review raved. Tel Aviv boasts a "steamy nocturnal playground" that is "not for the faint of heart."

Creating demand in Quebec while providing travel agencies with the tools they need to answer potential travellers' questions should increase the number of visitors to Israel, Grofman said.

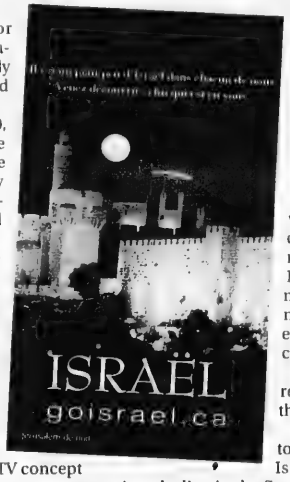
Currently, Quebecers account for about 25 per cent of the number of Canadian passport holders visiting the Holy Land, and that's before any concerted effort to cultivate that market.

The IGTO is devoting about $500,000, the bulk of its quarterly budget, to the Quebec effort, and it's pressing its case with get-acquainted trips to Israel by Quebec writers, as well as by providing French language materials to travel offices and pitching Israel as a safe destination for those interested in the Middle East.

"I believe this situation in the Middle East now, where Israel is a modern, safe democracy, will bring people to Israel, if they want to go to this area," Grofman said. "I believe we can get great results from this."

At the same time as the IGTO focuses on Quebec, Israel's Ministry of Tourism is starting a North American campaign that was based on a reality TV concept that employs social media and other Internet communication tools.

The campaign, aimed at secular travellers, centres around two families who were chosen out of 600 applicants to tour Israel and document their experience, said Grofman. The families, one from New York the other from Texas, visited the Holy Land and put their impressions and videos on Facebook, Twitter and in blogs.



Meanwhile, data released by the IGTO show Canadians across the board are choosing Israel as a travel destination in greater numbers than before. Visits to Israel by Canadian passport holders set a new record for the month of March, while the first quarter of 2011 also saw all-time highs, said Jerry Adler, marketing and PR manager for the IGTO.

A little more than 6,000 travellers visited Israel in March, up four per cent over the year before, while the number for the first quarter reached 13,500. Adler predicted gains of as much as 10 per cent for 2011 over 2010, meaning close to 75,000 Canadians are expected to visit Israel in the current calendar year.

Adler noted that 45 per cent of visitors return for a second trip, much higher than for other travel destinations.

While the number of tourists heading to Israel from Canada continues to grow, Israel overall suffered a small tourism decline in the first quarter compared to the year before, Grofman said.

Areas for growth include Russia and Eastern Europe, while Brazil is proving to be a fertile new source of visitors, Adler said.

Robotic system for brain surgery gets approval

Yoram Gabison
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — Mazor Robotics stock rose 0.8 per cent on the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange in a single day last week after European medical authorities gave their blessing for the company's SpineAssist technology to be used in brain surgery.

SpineAssist is a robotic system approved so far for use in spinal procedures. Its purpose is to direct the surgeon's instruments, achieving the utmost accuracy and minimal invasiveness in the surgical procedure, which is crucial in the case of the spine – and the brain.

Half a year ago, Mazor wrapped up clinical trials of SpineAssist in brain surgery to relieve the symptoms of Parkinson's disease. The purpose of the trials was to show that the device can be stably attached to the skull during the process and that the technology indeed provides greater accuracy in the surgical procedure. But the ultimate purpose was to show that using SpineAssist reliably produces good results over time.

The researchers, a team of leading brain surgeons at Hadassah University Hospital in Jerusalem, judged the trial a success after concluding that SpineAssist achieved its objectives in full.

The SpineAssist technology is expected to be used in brain surgery in Israel and Germany, to begin with.

Mazor had prepared for the day. A year and a half ago, the Israeli company entered into a distribution agreement with Alpha Omega, which makes advanced equipment for brain surgery and neurological therapies. Alpha Omega will be handling distribution of the SpineAssist system for brain surgical procedures.

The company is in the process of applying for U.S. Food and Drug Administration confirmation of SpineAssist for use in brain surgery.

Mazor Robotics CEO Ori Hadomi says the miniature robotic system could improve the placement of electrodes and implants in the brain.

The market for navigating and inserting implants into brain tissue, and deep-brain stimulation therapy to treat Parkinson's disease is worth several hundred million dollars a year. The thinking is that deep-brain stimulation therapy – using electrodes to provide non-invasive electrical impulses to brain tissue – could be used in the future to alleviate chronic compulsive and psychotic conditions, eating disorders and neurological diseases.

For 2010, Mazor reported losing a net 21.5 million shekels ($6 million) on turnover of 14.8 million shekels ($4.1 million). For the year before it posted a net loss of 17 million shekels ($4.7 million) on turnover of 5.3 million shekels ($1.5 million).

A frank memoir about raising an autistic son

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

The heartbreak and strain of raising a child with autism are recounted with candour and humour in Bad Animals: A Father's Accidental Education in Autism (Viking Canada) by Montrealer Joel Yanofsky.

For Yanofsky, best known as a book reviewer, and his wife, Cynthia Davis, their son Jonah's diagnosis at almost age four was shattering.

The couple never expected to be parents, and in fact, weren't married, when Cynthia, at 38, became pregnant. Joel was 42.

Their apprehension vanished when Jonah was born. The baby, to them, was blessed with a beauty they were at a loss to explain. They were besotted. Yanofsky couldn't contain his pride. He worked his son into almost every column he wrote.

But their joy was soon shattered when the boy did not develop according to the norm. Yanofsky, who frankly admits to his own self-absorption, took it the hardest. His coping mechanism was to withdraw into a funk of self-pity, to lament how this could have happened – to him.

The author had a nagging sense that he had never really fitted in or become the kind of conventional job-holder society expected.

"I was, in my own low-key way, weird," he writes of his youthful obsession with fiction and its creators.

Meanwhile, his wife took a pro-active approach, reading everything she could, seeking out professional help, networking with other parents of kids with special needs .

Bad Animals is a kind of memoir, written over the years. Yanofsky makes clear that this has not been easy, even though writing is his livelihood and his most fluent means of communication.

His voice slowly changes from one of despair to one with a degree of serenity.

The humour in Bad Animals is, as is typical of Yanofsky, of the self-deprecating kind.

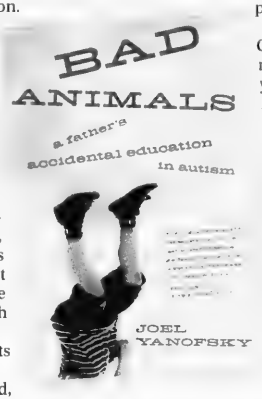
As Jonah grew, his behaviour became a problem. His father knows it is not politically correct to say this, but the best word to describe his son's behaviour is strange – temper tantrums, repetitive activity, lack of focus, no friends. Jonah is high-functioning and quite social, at least within the family, and witty. He attends a regular public school, with a shadow.

The autism spectrum, his parents learn, is a very broad one.

No matter how disturbing and, Yanofsky admits, embarrassing his son's way of acting has been, his love for him shines through without having to be made explicit to the reader.

Yanofsky draws on his lifelong relationship with fiction to get inside Jonah's mind. "Sometimes I try to imagine Jonah as a character in a novel. I know that if I can think of him that way, I'll have a better chance to understand him, figure out how he thinks."

Bad Animals ends as Jonah approaches his teen years. It's not exactly a happy ending, and Yanofsky expresses his fears about a whole new set of concerns as Jonah ceases to be a cute child who can be protected.



The title is his son's, taken from a Grade 4 story he wrote. Animals, the more exotic the better, are a mania with young Jonah. Yanofsky tried to engage his son's attention by having them write a sequel book together.

Bad Animals offers a truthful portrait of the often bewildering and frustrating relationship between parents and the experts: psychologists, doctors, therapists, teachers, shadows.

Yanofsky does a fine job of surveying and digesting the plethora of books about autism, even a growing literary genre, and the movement among some parents to have autism recognized as just another way of being, about which he is dubious.

By book's end, Jonah is nearing his 12th birthday and has made considerable progress. He is learning Hebrew, for which he shows an aptitude, and planning for his bar mitzvah.

But unlike "neurotypical" youngsters, Jonah must be taught to separate from his parents. And for his mother and father, letting go is much harder than it usually is for other parents.

"This is the paradox at the heart of raising Jonah – how much he depends on us to make him independent," Yanofsky writes.

Classic Jewish book reprinted

Compiled by CJN Staff

Sixty years after Brooklyn-based author Yuri Suhl first published his autobiographical novel One Foot in America, it is being republished in an attractive reprint edition by Now and Then Books.

"One Foot in America is a forgotten classic of Jewish immigrant fiction," said the book's publisher, Bill Gladstone. "It bears immediate comparisons to classic works such as Abraham Cahan's The Rise of David Levinsky and Henry Roth's Call It Sleep."

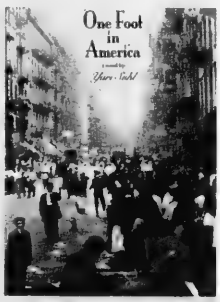
The Toronto Workmen's Circle is hosting a book launch later this month for One Foot In America. Gladstone will discuss the novel and present a slide show on aspects of the Jewish immigrant experience in both Brooklyn and Toronto.



Originally published in 1950, Suhl's autobiographical novel depicts the author's experience as a young Jewish immigrant coming to America in the early 1920s.

The book launch is Sunday, May 29, 1:30 p.m., at the Workmen's Circle Centre, 471 Lawrence Ave. W. Free admission, refreshments. Everyone is welcome.

Yael Naim's pressures ease after Apple used her song

Joseph Serge
Arts Editor

Do you remember Dorit, the Jerusalem tour guide who taught Bart a hard lesson in Krav Maga karate in The Greatest Story Ever D'ohed, last year's Israeli-themed episode of The Simpsons?

Dorit was voiced by French-born Israeli singer-songwriter Yael Naim, who rose to international stardom in 2008 when her single New Soul was featured in Apple's debut commercial for the MacBook Air laptop.

"I was so happy to do that, I love The Simpsons," Naim says over the phone from her home studio in Paris. "I got to kick Bart Simpson's ass!"

Yael Naim in her home studio with collaborator David Donatien

Naim says she recorded the role of Dorit in her Paris home studio. "I was really happy to participate in this kind of thing. It was amazing. Sasha Baron Cohen [Borat] was playing my [uncle], too, and it was very funny."

Naim has been using that same studio in her Paris apartment to record She Was A Boy, her second collaboration with percussionist David Donatien, and the followup to her 2007 self-titled album.

New Soul was a No.1 hit on iTunes making her the first Israeli solo artist to to reach the top 10 in the U.S. The album reached No. 15 in Canada. Despite selling more than 150,000 copies of that album in North America, Naim says she feels no pressure to replicate that success.

"We are really lucky to do the music that we love," Naim says. "We wanted to take our time to make the music we like. We're hoping it is successful, but if it's not — well, it's all about the music for us."

She Was A Boy was released late last year in France, where it has already reached Gold status. She recently won Best Female of the Year at the 2011 Les Victories de la Musique (comparable to the Juno Awards in Canada).

"I really feel completely happy," she says. "It's really great."

She Was A Boy continues in the same style as her previous album. The first song, Come Home, is similar to the uplifting feel-good style of New Soul and the rest of the album flows nicely into her quirky mode of jazz-fuelled indie pop and piano melodies.

"Things have actually been calmer for me [since the Apple commercial]," she says. "Before, I was looking for my musical way and was running after stupid goals and success all the time."

Jewish Film Festival continues until May 15

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

The Toronto Jewish Film Festival is blessed with an abundance of compelling movies. A preview:

Jonathan Gruber's fascinating documentary, Jewish Soldiers in Blue and Gray (May 12 at 1 p.m. at the Bloor Cinema), is fortuitously timed on the 150th anniversary of the outbreak of the U.S. Civil War. Billed as the first film of its kind, it tells the story of Jews who fought in this defining conflict.

Ten thousand Jewish Americans served in the Union and Confederate armies, at a time when the United States had a population of 150,000 Jews. Pitting Jew against Jew, the war solidified the Jewish connection to the United States, Gruber argues.

On the Union side, 7,000 Jewish officers and enlisted men rallied to the cause. Col. Edward Salomon played a key role in the seminal Battle of Gettysburg. Col. Marcus Spiegel commanded troops in battles in Mississippi and Louisiana. Frederick Knefler, a brigadier-general, had the distinction of being the highest ranking Jewish soldier on either side. Leopold Karpeles won the Medal of Honor, one of five Jewish soldiers to be so honoured.

Nonetheless, antisemitism was a factor during the war. On Dec. 17, 1862, Gen. Ulysses S. Grant unilaterally issued General Order No. 11, which expelled Jews from Tennessee, Mississippi and Kentucky.

At the urging of a Jewish delegation, president Abraham Lincoln rescinded the infamous decree, the most blatant anti-Jewish edict in U.S. history.

Apart from the fact that 3,000 Jewish soldiers joined the Confederate army, Judah Benjamin, a lawyer, U.S. senator and secessionist, became the confederacy's secretary of state.

A significant number of Southern Jews owned slaves and a few Jews were even slave traders, Gruber says. He adds that Charleston, S.C. had the biggest Jewish community in the United States until the 1830s, underscoring the fact that the South was an historically important region in American Jewish settlement.

A Jewish Girl in Shanghai (May 12 at 2 p.m. at the Al Green Theatre and May 15 at 1 p.m. at the Cineplex Odeon Sheppard Centre) is the first animated feature from China about the Holocaust. It was adapted from a graphic novel by Wang Genfa.

Shifting between the past and the present, this empathetic film is definitely pro-Jewish.

Rina and her younger brother have been driven out of Europe by glowering Nazis and find themselves in Shanghai, fending off a predatory Japanese gang. Shivering in the snow, Rina attracts the attention of a street vendor who offers her a pancake. In gratitude, she gives him her heart-shaped necklace, a gift from her mother, who seems to have disappeared during a Nazi roundup.

As this uplifting but simplistic film unfolds, Rina and her brother meet a succession of people, Chinese and Jews, who help acclimatize them to Shanghai and assist them in their search for their parents.

In A Jewish Girl in Shanghai, the saga of European Jews who found a haven in this cosmopolitan Chinese port city is essentially recreated.

Sholem Aleichem: Laughing in the Darkness (May 12 at 5:15 p.m. at the Bloor Cinema and May 15 at 3 p.m. at the Cineplex Odeon Sheppard Centre) is an affectionate and thorough portrait of a master of Yiddish literature. Joseph Dorman's nostalgic film takes us from his birthplace in Russia's Pale of Settlement to his death in the United States in 1916.

Best known for his humorous stories, which turned difficult situations into high farce, he came from a traditional Jewish family formed by religious rituals. A businessman by day, he emerged as an immensely popular writer as eastern Europe was thrown into political and social upheaval by the unstoppable forces of modernity. Aspiring to raise the literary level of Yiddish, he produced satiric sketches for the Yiddish press, churning out a new story once a week for 25 years.

Ironically, his children, accustomed to speaking Russian, never learned Yiddish. His wife's inheritance gave him considerable latitude to write, but his ineptness as a businessman and his rash decision to sell the rights to his stories ruined him financially. He tried to break into the Yiddish theatre in New York City, but his hopes were dashed.

Suffering from a range of ailments, he died all too soon. His funeral, at the time, the biggest ever in New York City, was attended by 200,000 admirers. Long after his death, he enjoyed amazing popularity, particularly in the United States, the Soviet Union and Palestine. The Broadway smash hit, Fiddler on the Roof, was based on his stories.

Sholem Aleichem, the great Yiddish writer.

Five Brothers* is a sort of Sephardi version of The Godfather.

Little Rose (May 14 at 9:15 p.m. at the Al Green Theatre), a taut and well-crafted Polish feature film by Jan Kidawa-Blonski, is set in Warsaw in 1967 and 1968, when thousands of highly assimilated and cultured Jews were driven out of Poland by a malicious state-orchestrated antisemitic campaign.

At the outset, the director establishes a mood of menace. Israel, having won the Six Day War, is excoriated as the aggressor by the Polish media. Under the thin guise of anti-Zionism, the secretary-general of the Communist party pointedly questions the loyalty of Polish Jews.

As these sombre events play out, Roman (Robert Wieckiewicz), an oily officer in the security service, is told to "expose" Adam (Andrzej Seweryn), an elderly university professor, as a "Zionist." A cold and unpleasant figure, Roman enlists the assistance of his beautiful and needy lover, Kamila (Magdalena Boczarska), who works as Adam's secretary. Roman hopes that her feminine charms as an undercover agent under the pseudonym of Little Rose will induce Adam – a pro-democracy advocate opposed to dictatorship – to reveal his supposedly subversive secrets.

The film moves along at a steady clip and sweeps up viewers in its firm clasp. The actors turn in glowing performances.

Acne (May 12 at 9 p.m. at the Cineplex Odeon Sheppard Centre) explores the awkwardness of adolescence. Fredrico Veiroj's coming-of-age feature film, which is set in Montevideo, Uruguay, revolves around Rafa Bregman (Alejandro Tocar), a pimply 13-year-old Jewish boy whose parents are going through a divorce.

Although he frequents prostitutes, romantic love is what he truly wants. The object of his desire, the pretty Nicole (Belen Pouchan), appears to be beyond his reach.

Though Acne moves all too slowly and tends to be pedestrian in terms of presentation and style, it projects plausible emotions and feelings. And Tocar, the lead actor, steals the movie.

Noa Ben Hagai's Blood Relation (May 12 at 12 p.m. at the Al Green Theatre) is a bracing documentary from Israel, touching on universal human interest themes.

Following her grandmother's death, she discovered a trove of astonishing letters, the correspondence between her Jewish grandmother and great aunt Salma, a Muslim from a Palestinian refugee camp near the West Bank town of Nablus.

Ben Hagai learned that her late grandmother's sister, Pnina, Salma's mother, had converted to Islam, married a Palestinian Arab before the 1948 Arab-Israeli war, settled in a refugee camp and gave birth to eight children.

Pnina resumed contact with the Jewish side of her family shortly after the Six Day War, sending her sister in Israel the first of many letters.

Blood Relation kicks into high gear when one of Pnina's daughters, Salma, visits her Jewish relatives in Israel. When Salma declares herself to be a Muslim, which is what she has been since birth, her Jewish relatives look dumbfounded and ill at ease.

During subsequent visits, Salma, a forthright woman, requests an Israeli work permit for herself and asks her cousin Shmulik – a former Israeli military governor in Ramallah – for assistance in helping her husband and son wriggle out of an uncomfortable situation.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Happiest days of her life

She says that since then she has stopped running and work on this album took place, "in one of the most happiest periods in my life."

She Was A Boy deftly blends upbeat songs with slower, more melodic ballads like Puppet, about a jewelry-box dancer condemned to dancing to the same tune every day.

On the Indian-inspired Man of Another Woman, she uses an Indian harmonium sitar and works her sultry vocals to remarkable effect.

Naim was born in 1978 in France to Tunisian Jewish parents and moved to Ramat HaSharon in Israel when she was four. She was a soloist in the Israeli Army Orchestra. Some 10 years ago, she moved back to Paris to start her music career

One noticeable difference between her new album and Yael Naim is that on that album she sang in English, French and Hebrew. This time all 13 songs are in English.

"I'm still trying to figure out why I did that," she says. "As a child I listened to a lot of songs in English, like Joni Mitchell and Nick Drake, and my first habit in writing songs was in English. [When I moved back to Paris] I missed home and started writing in Hebrew to help me connect myself to Israel." She says that down the road she may feel the need to write in Hebrew again.

Naim is currently on a small tour that saw her play in Montreal on May 7. She hopes that a larger tour will follow.

"Last time we got to go on a big North American tour and at the same time discover the whole country, and it was very nice. Hopefully, we'll get to do it again soon."

She Was A Boy was released in Canada on May 3. You can get a free download of the single Go To The River from Naim's website, www.Yaelweb.com.

Hyman named junior hockey player of the year

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Zach Hyman of the Hamilton Red Wings has been named RBC Canadian Junior Hockey Player of the Year.

Hyman was presented with the prestigious award, won in previous years by future National Hockey League stars Paul Kariya and Dany Heatley, at the RBC Cup in Camrose, Alta., where the national junior A championship was held.

He was one of eight finalists chosen from 3,000 Junior A players across Canada.

Selected by the Florida Panthers in the fifth round of the 2010 draft (123rd overall), Hyman went on to a strong season with the Red Wings, a team owned by his father, Stuart. He finished second in scoring in the Ontario Junior Hockey League (OJHL) with 102 points in 43 games, leading all Canadian Junior A players with 2.37 points per game. According to a bio on the Red Wings' website, "He missed games early in the season while attending the Panthers' rookie camp, and took two weeks out of the Red Wings' schedule to help Canada East to a silver medal at the 2010 World Junior A Challenge."

Among the other honours earned by Hyman in the past season were being named to the Northwest Conference First All-Star Team and being named the OJHL's Most Gentlemanly Player after picking up just 24 minutes in penalties.

Zach Hyman

"It's a real honour for Zach," said his father, Stuart. "He's the first Jewish kid and the first from Toronto to win the award. We're very proud of Zach."

"I was extremely happy, and it is a huge honour," Zach said before flying to Camrose. "I was overwhelmed.

"I knew I had a good year, but all the players were great candidates," he added.

A native of Toronto, Hyman attended the Robbins Hebrew Academy before enrolling in Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto. As a Grade 9 rookie, he was good enough to play with the kids in Grade 12.

In addition to being a talented hockey player, Hyman, at age 18, is a published author. His first book is titled Hockey Hero, a children's book about a grandfather and grandson's love of the game.

Hyman planned to continue his hockey career at Princeton University in the NCAA, but those plans may be on hold. A few weeks ago, the team announced that its entire hockey staff had left for another university.

Since then, he has been approached by a number of high-profile NCAA teams eager to recruit him, Stuart said, but no decision has yet been made.

"It's pretty open right now," Zach said. "A lot of schools are interested. I want it sorted out. It'll be nice to know where I'm going."

Casspi's sophomore season in NBA disappoints

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

SACRAMENTO — Disgruntled forward Omri Casspi still needs to improve certain aspects of his game in order to become a bigger overall threat on the court, Sacramento Kings general manager Geoff Petrie told the Sacramento Bee recently.

Casspi, the first Israeli to make the active roster of an NBA team, ended a disappointing second season with Sacramento, just one year after dazzling fans with an extraordinary rookie campaign.

The Kings struggled for much of this season, finishing with a record of 24-58. While the team couldn't overcome an injury to guard Tyreke Evans, its play improved after the acquisition of Marcus Thornton.

Casspi, meanwhile, grew disillusioned with head coach Paul Westphal, who limited the Israeli's minutes on the floor this season. The former Maccabi Tel Aviv star averaged just under nine points and four rebounds per game in 24 minutes. Last year, he averaged more than 10 points per game in 25 minutes.

Casspi let it be known that he would prefer to play elsewhere, but Petrie suggested that the Yavne native still has a future with his team. The GM and Westphal sat down with Casspi at the end of the season to discuss the forward's prospects in Sacramento.

"I guess [Casspi] was happy that the team played better and was winning more games, but he was frustrated that his playing time had really diminished from what it had been for two-thirds of the season," Petrie told the Bee.

"We did have a discussion, which usually comes up with some players, about maybe it's better if I play somewhere else," the general manager said. "But a lot of that gets borne out of frustration. I think he still has a chance to be a pretty valuable contributor, because there are some things he does really well."

"But, again, there are areas of his game he needs to continue to work on to become more well-rounded in terms of the things he can do out there," Petrie told the Bee. "He's a competitive guy, he's got a lot of pride, and we just left it at that."

The Kings' season was overshadowed by speculation that the owners planned to move the team to Anaheim. Co-owner George Maloof announced recently that the team would remain in northern California for at least one more season.

Festival brims with compelling films

Being a decent man, Shmulik is accommodating. But Salma, having applied for Israeli citizenship under the Law of Return, soon senses that her Jewish relatives are not that interested in maintaining a relationship with her and her family. In Blood Relation, east and west never really meet.

In Alexandre Arcady's thriller, Five Brothers (May 14 at 9:15 p.m. at the Cineplex Odeon Sheppard Centre), a box office hit in France, a petty criminal flees the scene of a crime in Marseilles and returns to his Algerian Jewish family in Paris, setting off a chain reaction of events against the backdrop of Yom Kippur.

The film, a sort of Sephardi version of The Godfather, hews closely to traditional Hollywood gangster lore. It characteristically begins at a funeral, where friends and enemies alike pay their respects to the departed, and ends in a bloody shoot-out.

The Hayouns – a band of close-knit brothers and their grieving widowed mother – are a respectable and law-abiding family. Four of the brothers are upstanding citizens, earning legitimate livelihoods, but the fifth brother, David (Vincent Elbaz), is the proverbial black sheep, the prodigal son who has kept his distance from the family.

David's sudden reappearance in Paris is a source of embarrassment to the proud Hayouns. His very presence results in the trashing of two apartment flats, the assault of a woman and a police raid.

As these developments unfold, the mother is rushed to hospital, her diabetes out of control, and one of the brothers is led to the suspicion that his wife is having an affair with David. Long-suppressed family secrets spill out as the brothers discover that their late father's associate was less than a sterling character. Rather than dividing them, their troubles draw the Hayouns closer together.

Arcady, an able director, mixes the sacred with the profane in a film that is bound to appeal to many viewers.

Fabian Hofman's semi-autobiographical I Miss You (May 15 at 3:30 p.m. at the Silver City Richmond Hill) takes place in Argentina during the 1976-1983 "Dirty War" period, when a ruthless military junta was in charge of the country's affairs. This was a black era when thousands of political dissidents, some of whom were Jews, routinely disappeared, never to be seen again.

A Jewish Girl from Shanghai was adapted from a graphic novel.

With the generals having assumed power in a coup, a middle-class Jewish family in Buenos Aires braces for blowback. Their sons, Javier (Fermin Volcoff) and Adrian (Martin Slipak), are radicals, and rightly worried about their fate, their father (Luis Ziembrowski) hustles them out of harm's way.

When Adrian, a soldier in the army, is picked up by paramilitary-military forces, Javier is sent to Mexico to stay with his parents' friends. After six months, during which time he receives military training from comrades in exile, he yearns to go back to Argentina.

I Miss You, though distinguished by stellar performances from its accomplished cast, is somewhat disappointing. The film sags and lags when it should be rushing forward. These defects notwithstanding, it mostly succeeds in recreating an epoch most Argentines would sooner forget.

Described as a "personal documentary," Between Two Worlds (May 15 at 3:30 p.m. at the Al Green Theatre) is probing as well as thought-provoking. The directors, Deborah Kaufman and Alan Snitow, examine the evolving nature of identity and politics in the American Jewish community.

Not surprisingly, the opening scenes turn on a divisive controversy. The San Francisco Jewish Film Festival is showing Rachel, a film about Rachel Corrie, a 23-year-old member of the pro-Palestinian International Solidarity Movement who was crushed to death by an Israeli bulldozer in the Gaza Strip on March 16, 2003 while protesting the planned demolition of an Arab house.

Rachel hits a raw nerve in the Jewish community. The film festival, championing free speech, has no qualms about including it in its program. Critics think otherwise. The upshot is that the executive director of the local Jewish federation is relieved of his duties because he financially supported the festival.

Kaufman and Snitow use the fallout from the film festival to launch a lively and much-needed debate about the parameters of dissent, Israel's policies toward the Palestinians, the boycott, divestment and sanctions campaign against Israel, and the hopes and fears of a rapidly changing Jewish community in the United States.

Within this inquiring spirit, the filmmakers plunge into a heated debate concerning the propriety of building a museum on the grounds of a disused Muslim cemetery in western Jerusalem. This is a reference to plans by the Los Angeles-based Museum of Tolerance and Human Dignity to open a "branch plant" in the Mamilla cemetery.

In passing, Kaufman discusses the love affair some Jews once had with communism and her sister's conversion to Islam. Regrettably, her sister's conversion is given short shrift.

Vitaly Vorobjev's I Shall Remember (May 12 at 5:30 p.m. at the Al Green Theatre), a Russian film based on a true story, takes place in a small town in Russia occupied by the German army during World War II.

Having entered the town, the Germans target Jews, first forcing them to wear a yellow star and then transporting them to a pit where they are to be shot. Russian turncoats assist in the roundups.

Sincere in its passions, the film focuses on a callow antisemitic teenager – a member of a Christian family that risks everything to hide and save Jews – who learns the value of humanism and tolerance.

Documentary examines controversial issue

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

"It's an incredible betrayal," says Nancy Meyer, a Toronto therapist.

She is talking about pedophilia in North American Orthodox Jewish communities, the subject of a Vision TV documentary by Alan Mendelsohn due to be broadcast on May 16 at 10:30 p.m.

Titled Wall of Silence, this frank film sets out to expose a phenomenon that has caused untold grief and is usually hushed up by rabbis.

According to Mendelsohn, the Orthodox community is vulnerable to sexual predators. In outlining his case, he cites two examples, taking viewers to Brooklyn and Winnipeg, where pedophiles have wreaked havoc.

In Brooklyn, the principal of a day school molested a boy who belonged to the Satmar sect. The assault threw the boy into depression. North of the border, in Winnipeg, a rabbi assaulted a boy – the son of a newspaper journalist – who referred to his perpetrator as The Zipper Man.

Wall of Silence claims that a victim who reports the crime to civil authorities is held up to ridicule and shame and is ostracized.

Victims are branded as liars, while offenders walk free, charges Amy Neustein, an author.

Orthodox rabbis prefer to refer sexual abuse cases to rabbinical counsels, where such crimes are reportedly not treated with the gravity they deserve, Mendelsohn suggests.

Wall of Silence says that a rabbi who attempted to expose a molester was the object of an assassination attempt and barred from praying at his synagogue.

Dov Hikind, a New York assemblyman who represents a heavily populated Orthodox district, urges the Orthodox community to deal firmly with this problem.

But as Wall of Silence points out, there is still "stiff resistance" to bringing pedophiles to justice.

"We have a long way to go," says a man familiar with the situation.

MC Mac Miller says he won't forget his Jewish roots

Daniel Koren
Special to The CJN

Look out Drake, there's a new Jewish rapper in town.

Mac Miller, born Malcolm McCormick, is the newest Jewish rap sensation, and he's been steadily gaining momentum following the release of his mixtape K.I.D.S. last year.

The 19-year-old MC spoke to The CJN about his rise to fame, his musical influences and juggling his Jewish identity with his music career.

Now signed to independent label Rostrum Records – which also represents promising rap star Wiz Khalifa, whose Black And Yellow anthem is one of the hottest rap tracks these days – Miller's fanbase is growing faster than he ever dreamed.

But the Pittsburgh native said no matter how famous he gets, he'll never forget his roots.

Miller grew up in a traditional Jewish home, had a bar-mitzvah and observes the High Holidays.

"Judaism is definitely my heritage, so I grew up celebrating High Holidays. It's harder for me now since I'm always on the road, but whenever I'm at home with my family, we always do something," said Miller, who also sports a not-so-subtle chai tattoo on his arm.

Miller said he grew up in a culturally diverse city, much like Toronto. "We definitely had a Jewish community where I grew up, but there were also all sorts of people, and we all kind of lived together in harmony. No one was very religious when it came down to it."

After bursting onto the scene last year with his well-received K.I.D.S. mixtape, featuring tracks including Nikes On My Feet and Kool Aid And Frozen Pizza, he released another mixtape called Best Day Ever, which can be downloaded for free on his website.

His video for Donald Trump, the album's first single, had more than one million views on YouTube in less than a week.

With a growing number of avid Jewish followers, particularly in Toronto, Miller made his way to the city earlier this year as part of his first solo tour.

Tickets for his show were in such high demand that his performance had to be moved from the Mod Club to The Opera House to accommodate a larger audience.

More news for young Jews on heebonics.ca

"I really dig Toronto. It's a cool place, and I seriously like the vibe," Miller said.

The young MC was modest about his show selling out and said he appreciates all the support he's been receiving on this side of the border.

Inspired primarily by old-school rap groups like A Tribe Called Quest and Big L, Mac Miller's music is a blend of classic and contemporary hip hop.

Best Day Ever samples independent artists such as MSTRKFT and Sufjan Stevens, and his sound is influenced by rappers Kid Cudi and Kanye West.

Miller also enlisted well-known producers Chuck Inglish and Just Blaze to provide a fresh take on instrumentals.

Unlike most artists in the rap scene nowadays, Miller uses beats that transform pop rock and indie pop into rap.

He said his talent is based on his love of music, having grown up listening to a variety of artists and performing himself as often as he could.

At 14, he joined a rap group called The Ill Spoken with fellow Pittsburgh rapper Beedie, and also released his own solo material.

To date, the prolific Mac Miller has seven mixtapes to his name, and vows to continue releasing as many as possible until the entire world knows his name.

Though he's already garnered a large fan base, he plans to continue releasing free tracks and mixtapes until he decides to release a proper full-length record.

He said his objective is to keep his music as original and entertaining as possible, constantly trying out new sounds and different methods of recording.

One of the highlights on the new record is a song called Oy Vey, which Miller said is "a fun term that Jews would understand. For those who aren't [Jewish], it's a little Jewish culture for everybody," he said with a laugh.

Thanks to Miller and Wiz Khalifa, the Pittsburgh music scene is at an all time high. Miller insists that he will stay loyal to his hometown, make music only with people he enjoys working with and, most importantly, will be doing another tour in the summer.

With plans to make it to Canadian cities in July, Miller promises that this tour will "be even crazier than the last time."

He added that he also has aspirations to perform in Israel – he just "needs to get an Israeli booking agent."

Any takers?

Take care reproducing documents

We are now in the period of sfirat haOmer, the count-up to Shavuot, the time of the giving of our Torah.

The study and transmission of our written and oral laws have benefited from technological advancement. We are known as the People of the Book – five books of Moses, 24 books of Tanach, countless written commentaries – but many are beginning to find the content of these books being transferred to electronic form, and we will soon be know as the "People of the PDF."

Historically, Jews have written and accessed their Judaic texts in a physical form. For example, klaf (parchment made from the skin of a kosher animal) is the required medium for Torah scrolls. And as written media developed – papyrus, cloth, vellum and paper – Jews began utilizing those media to write commentaries or carry their own personal copy of such books.

Sustainable Jew

Fred Winegust

With the advent of modern technologies, many Jews now use an electronic tablet or smartphone to access prayers or daily study sessions during the week. Mishnah Brurah? There's an app for that.

We are increasingly living our lives – both Jewish and secular – through our electronic devices. At first thought, it seems that relying on an electronic copy of a book may be the more "eco-friendly" or "green" solution. The production of paper uses many natural resources – water, wood, glue, energy – and the medium itself has a limited capacity – only so many words can fit in one book.

Electronic devices, alternatively, have a seemingly infinite capacity to store information, and the files stored on such devices are relatively cheap to reproduce. However, the manufacture, use and disposal of electronic devices and the hard drives used to save and record content can have a significant energy consumption footprint. No matter which medium one prefers, the issue of sustainable energy and resource consumption is always at play.

For many reasons – Shabbat observance, ease of access, personal preference – many of us will continue to read and collect paper versions of our favourite books. From a sustainability perspective, there remains a role for paper as a biodegradable, renewable, sustainable product made from trees.

In order to minimize the impact on the environment, a publisher should choose paper from sources that themselves have already been recycled, thus minimizing the impact on existing forest stock. If any of these publications contain holy words, they cannot be recycled, only buried, following the principals of shaimos (referring to works with God's name in Hebrew) or genizah, which require that such books be stored and properly buried to allow for natural decomposition.

Jewish organizations such as schools, social service and fundraising agencies that use paper-based communications and do not print holy words avoid the need for the documents to be buried. They have both the choice of paper to be used and the opportunity to recycle the paper after use.

Next month, we will explore the lifecycle of paper and the options for and impact of the paper we choose to use as the People of the Book.

Bin Laden dead. But no Kiddush

After the Jews crossed the Dead Sea, the waves swooshed back and destroyed the Egyptians on chariots. The Children of Israel then began to dance and sing in celebration of the death of their former slave owners.

After 400 years of humiliation, it made sense. I have felt a similar emotion in my heart, excitement knowing that someone who has demeaned me was suffering. It's not the nicest character trait, but it is inevitable.

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

Yet, God felt differently. She sent an angel to the Jewish People to say, "Stop the festivities. The Egyptians, those who whipped you and threw your children into the pyramids as bricks and mortar, they too were My creation.

"I am saddened by the choices the Egyptian people made allowing them to be so devastatingly cruel. But they were Mine."

When Osama bin Laden was executed and celebrations sprang up in the streets of America and the world, I considered the Jewish position on this. I wondered whether we should be joining those festivities with millions of others, knowing that an evil man is no longer in this world and more babies are safe.

Shouldn't we place the proverbial hat of Haman on our head and spin the gragger of anger and pleasure as loudly as possible because bin Laden lies at the bottom of the sea?

I then read an article about an Israeli mother who had lost her son to 9/11. She was not excited at bin Laden's assassination. In fact, quite the opposite – the hunting down of bin Laden and destruction of this terrorist leader meant very little to her.

She simply said, "I want my son back, and the death of bin Laden doesn't give me that."

She added that she felt almost disconnected from the event that occurred in Pakistan on May 1.

I thought about the time my brother-in-law, David Rosenzweig, was murdered and how my sister and her family responded when the murderer went to jail for many years. Were they joyous?

In fact, like the Israeli mother, my family did indeed feel a disconnect, somewhat, between the murderer and the murdered. They were satisfied that a level of justice had been served, but then closed the door to further discussion about the disappointing human being who committed the murder. It made sense to all of us that he was separated from society. He should be in jail. But there were no kiddushes. We wanted David back.

Osama bin Laden was a destructive force in the world, like the Egyptians. He was responsible for the death of thousands of people. He is gone and few will argue that this is bad.

However, this chapter of history is anything but reason to send streamers into the air. Bin Laden was a miserable example of God's creation, but he was shaped in God's image. His life was an absolute tragedy, and he went out of it with cauldrons of blood on his hands. The events that made him that way were disastrous.

The story of Osama bin Laden is a horror story, but at the end of the day, it seems wiser, perhaps more Jewish, to contemplate how such a man could exist, and then fight those dynamics that shaped him.

When the day has turned to dark, we as Jews grieve over the murdered. We do not drink wine at the death of the murderer.

May all good people be safe. May all wicked people change their ways.

Charity stores sell clothing, appliances and furniture

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

On a Thursday evening late in April, the Just A Second Shop at 4117 Bathurst St. was bustling. The popular thrift store run by Jewish Family and Child (JF&CS) attracts people of many backgrounds, and you can hear a cacophony of languages in the store.

There are bargains to be had for those people with the patience to sort through the racks of clothing and shelves of books and household items. On this day, a small group of people lined up at the cash with their finds.

One man had scored an Armani Jacket for $12, while another was trying to bargain with Rina Kapun, the spirited and friendly salesclerk.

But she held her ground with humour and a warm smile. "Do you think I don't know what this would cost new? You're already getting a bargain."

"Well, I'll come back tomorrow," the customer says.

"Do you think the price will change? I'll be here."

They continue to banter back and forth. Both of them are laughing.

"He is a regular," she later told The CJN. "I like to kid around with the regulars."

Indeed, she seems to know many of the shoppers, and switches back and forth between English and Hebrew as she greeted them at the cash. They talk about life and family.

Esther Assor, who was born in Israel, says Kapun's warm manner is a big attraction for her at Just A Second (416-633-9898). One reason is that they can converse in Hebrew. Assor says she shops at Just A Second all the time. "I buy my clothes and my kids' clothes here, and I'm always bringing things back for donation."

During her almost eight years at Just A Second, she has gotten to know many of the customers, Kapun says. "Some people come almost every day. I have lots of customers who are very friendly."

In an earlier telephone conference call that day, Jo Michaels, manager of marketing and communications at JF&CS, and Sofia Grinshpun, JF&CS financial controller and store supervisor, provided background information about the Just A Second Shop.

The store, which began as a pilot in 1982, was started by a committee of volunteers and staff. Initially, it was run from a room at JF&CS, but in 1985 the agency rented a space for the store. Donations of new and gently used clothing and household items come from the community.

According to Michaels' statistics, about 21,000 Jewish people in the Toronto area are in financial need "They are at what the government calls the low-income level."

The thrift shop allows them to get basic necessities such as clothing and small household appliances, she says.

Great items at bargain prices

"About 800 people – the number also includes JIAS [Jewish Immigrant Aid Services] clients – use the store for free."

The store nets $50,000, says Grinshpun, noting that these funds are then used to send JF&CS clients' children to Jewish communal camps.

The store runs with two full-time and six part-time workers, as well as volunteers, says Michaels. "The volunteers learn socialization skills.

"It's offers work experience for clients looking for work in retail and customer service."

There are four collection boxes along the Bathurst corridor, she says. "We're always in need of clothing, especially winter boots and jackets."

Michaels says they welcome volunteers and they encourage people in the community to shop there. "It's a great place to go for a great thrifty find for clothes, household items, kitchenware, toys, books, linen, and there are lots of tchatchkes."

For larger household items at bargain prices, check out the ReStores in Vaughan (405 Rowntree Dairy Rd.) and Newmarket (776 Davis Dr.). The profit from ReStores pays for administrative costs of Habitat for Humanity, the international organization that build houses for low-income families.

When someone donates to Habitat, 100 per cent of the money goes to building homes because the ReStores provide the funding for other costs, explains Bryon Di Sera, store manager for the York Region stores in Vaughan (905-265-1079) and Newmarket (905-868-8723).

These stores sell items that might otherwise end up in landfill, he says, explaining that much of the inventory is donated by big-box stores such as Home Depot, Rona and Prima Lighting.

Often these are materials that were overstocked or returned. "The companies prefer to donate them... We sell them for 40 to 70 per cent less than the retail prices."

While you will find building supplies such as tiles, windows and doors, the ReStores in York Region are different from some of the other stores – there are 35 in the Toronto area and 65 across Canada – because they carry furniture, décor fabric and other household items.

"We get a lot of antiques from private homes," says Di Sera, adding that sometimes they sell second-hand kitchens and appliances if they're in good condition.

He says it's a win-win situation for everybody, because the home-owners avoid the dumping fees, while Habitat for Humanity benefits from the sales of these items. "We get picky about what we sell because we don't want to get stuck with items that can't be sold. We don't want to be paying dumping fees."

Tax receipts for donors are provided after the sales of the donated stock.

Di Sera notes that the store also gets a lot of new furniture and kitchen appliances and other items such as tiles because the stores are in locations where these things are manufactured. "Just the other day I got a call from a tile guy with four skids of tiles to donate."

The ReStore gets help from volunteers and people doing court-appointed community services. "We get 1,000 hours a month of volunteer time."

Di Sera says the York Region stores attract many designers and antiques dealers. "We recently had some beautiful sets of vintage dishes from the early 1900s... You never know what you might find in a ReStore."

Do you need new carpets or flooring?

Jennifer Libman
Special to The CJN

With over 15,000 different styles of carpets and rugs, Dominion Rug (416-485-9488) has been meeting the flooring needs of Canadians since 1947. Located on Yonge Street between York Mills Road and Lawrence Avenue, Dominion Rugs offers products that have been sourced by experts and imported from all over the world.

"We carry contemporary styles and are always on top of the latest trends," said Ben Baum, the owner of Dominion Rug.

Currently, grey carpets are very popular. "It's the new beige," Baum said. "You can add some colour to it by getting an accent rug in purple or blue."

Baum is proud of his team of staff who collectively have over 100 years of experience in the area. One employee recently celebrated his 50th anniversary with the company.

"We really know what we're selling. We can make the right recommendations for our customers so they trust us and develop a lifelong relationship with us."

Dominion Rug staff work with customers to stay within their specified budget and to choose the right carpets and colour schemes for their needs. "We truly care about our customers and don't just want to sell them a product – we want to take care of them."

Any customer of Dominion Rug can expect fast service – a home will be measured and the cost quoted within a week.

"We go beyond the gold standard of customer satisfaction," Baum said. "I would call it the platinum standard. Only a family company like ours can offer this kind of service."

Dominion Rug is proud to be an International Design Guild member, one of only 100 carpet showrooms in North America. This membership enables the company to get exclusive products at better prices.

If carpeting isn't the right fit for your home, you can visit Riviera Flooring (905-738-4588), a Toronto store that specializes in hardwood, laminate and ceramic floors in addition to carpeting. Riviera Flooring has been in business for over 30 years and is located at Jane Street and Highway 7.

"We are a full-service business," said Joe Rivietz, owner of Riviera Flooring. "We help you choose the product that's best for you, and then we'll come over and install it. We move your furniture, rip out old flooring and install a new one before you know it."

Riviera Flooring has a team of professional sales consultants who are both friendly and knowledgeable about their products.

"We are capable of working with any budget, and we promise we'll beat any other price in the city," said Rivietz. "You will never find better service."

The latest trends in flooring include hardwood floors for the main areas of the home, and Riveria Flooring is proud to use engineered wood that is good for high-traffic areas.

For basements, Rivietz recommends laminate floors or carpets with a textured finish. "We offer a full line of textured carpets specifically for basements," he said.

"The thing that makes us stand out is that we only deliver what the customer wants. We're a family business, and we cater to everyone's individual needs. You would never get that kind of service from a larger chain."

Gift buyers appreciate Judaica by Israeli artists

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

Judaica items in the home are an expression of style and tradition. Toronto Judaica stores offer a wide selection of original products with unique designs by Israeli artists. Their collections include sculptures, mezuzah cases, challah covers and wall hangings, which will infuse your décor with beauty and culture.

Since 1982, Petroff Gallery (1016 Eglinton Ave. W.) has been one of Canada's leading private art galleries. Gallery staff makes fine art and contemporary craft more accessible to customers.

Petroff Gallery represents more than 300 artists from across North America in its 2,200-square-foot space. When it comes to Judaica, specialized staff can help you find that one-of-a-kind piece or a gift for the person who is hard to buy for. The gallery's most popular Judaic artworks are those of Gad Almaliah, which include framed blessings and talmudic passages illustrated with impressed pewter.

"Gaddy used to be a designer of stamps and coins in Israel, and his graphic genius is evident in each piece," said Sara Levine-Petroff, Petroff Gallery's art consultant and curator. "What makes them so sought after is that there is an appropriate prayer or blessing for everything – for those who contribute to their community, for a new home, a physician, a wedding, a teacher."

The stunning glass menorahs are also extremely popular, especially for weddings, she said. "People want to give a unique piece that will bring meaning to the recipient's life, to fill it with light and beauty."

Each piece exhibited at the gallery is a signed original, which is appreciated by the person receiving the gift. With each holiday, there is a rise in popularity of the objects related to the festival. Recently, the seder plates flew out the door, said Levine-Petroff.

For bar mitzvahs, kiddush cups, tzedakah boxes and Judaic kaleidoscopes are always great gift choices. For bat mitzvahs, the gallery sells hand-blown glass Shabbat candleholders, as well as menorahs and framed paper-cut blessings from Israeli artist Marci Weisel.

For the bride and groom setting up a Jewish home, the gallery has an artful collection of mezuzot, silk challah covers, stunning seder plates and Shabbat objects. "Shabbat pieces are really one of the best gifts, since they will be used weekly. And with use comes meaning, and a deeper appreciation of the Sabbath."

Levine-Petroff said the gallery has a deep connection to Judaic arts. "We develop an understanding and appreciation of prayer and ceremony when we are stimulated by innovative interpretations that get us to reinvest our soul. Judaic works of art should inspire us," she added.

For Jewish books, gifts and ritual items, Israel's Judaica (870 Eglinton Ave. W. and 441 Clark Ave. W.) is a one-stop shop. Established more than 25 years ago, Israel's provides its customers with excellent service and in-depth knowledge of all things Jewish. The store also has an Internet and mail-order division serving the Jewish community both nationally and internationally.

Yerachmiel Mehl, store manager at Israel's Thornhill location, said Judaica items continuously change in popularity. Throughout the year, kiddush cups, mezuzah cases and challah boards are regular sellers.

"I was surprised this Pesach to see so many kosher lamps fly off the shelf, along with wash cups. We also, of course, sold many hundreds of Haggadahs, many dozens of bedikat chametz kits, seder plates and matzah plates," said Mehl. "Parents were often looking for Haggadahs and plague kits that would keep their kids involved."

Rachel Samery, manager at the Eglinton location, said the most popular Judaica items at that store are mezuzot, kiddush cups, candlesticks and kippot – "the essential ritual items for keeping a Jewish home." While the Thornhill crowd leans toward traditional-looking items, the Eglinton shoppers prefer more modern products, Mehl said.

When it comes to gifts, the choice depends on the occasion, Mehl said. "For a wedding, I think that the Get 2 Gift Wedding Kit is amazing. This item includes a multi-coloured glass to break under the chupah and the cost of having a local artist fuse that glass into a beautiful mezuzah case, menorah, cube or pretty much anything you want."

For a bar or bat mitzvah, Mehl recommends the Timechart History of Jewish Civilization. "It comes in the form of a book, but it's really just a huge pull-out time chart. It is interesting without the heavy reading."

Retirement-home residents tell their stories

Residents of retirement homes bring with them a multitude of stories. Here are some of them.

Rose Besser

Residents at Amica communities throughout Ontario and British Columbia have many wonderful stories to tell. Whether you wish to reside at the luxurious Amica at Thornhill, the grandly appointed Amica at Bayview Gardens; downtown, midtown, east or west, there is an Amica that is right for you. Here is one resident's story.

"Two years ago, I had a fall at home. After surgery, rehab and discharge from the hospital with a walker, neither I nor my family felt comfortable with my going back to a house that had simply outgrown me. It was time to look at options. Of all the retirement communities my children and I toured, Amica at Thornhill, with its luxurious décor, location and accessibility to public transit, was an easy choice for me.

At Amica, I regained my strength using on-site physiotherapy, personalized fitness programs and hydrotherapy in a warm massage pool. I transitioned from using a walker to walking independently within four months of my accident. During my stay at Amica, I made friends and loneliness became a thing of the past, so I made the decision to move in permanently. Today, I am completely independent, enjoying all that Amica, and life, has to offer."

– Rose Besser, resident of Amica at Thornhill

Kensington Place residents give back. You might be tempted to think that retirement is a time of well-deserved rest after a life of busy work. However, for residents of Kensington Place, a move to the residence has opened up a wealth of opportunities to contribute their time and talents to worthy causes.

"This past winter we baked challahs and hand-decorated beautiful scarves and hats for the Out of the Cold program," says Kensington Place general manager Michael Ayers. "We also held fundraisers for the National Council of Jewish Women, hosted many community groups and enjoyed an amazing Memoirs of the Catskills event to benefit the Jewish National Fund. Our residents are simply eager to give back to their community."

Currently, Kensington Place residents are holding a clothing drive to benefit Bikur Cholim, a charity that supports the underprivileged. Donations of clean clothing in good condition may be dropped off at Kensington Place at 866 Sheppard Ave. E., attention Danyelle. For more information, call 416-636-9555.

Doreen and Irene

There's nothing closer than sisters.

Doreen and Irene are living proof. They've always been together even when apart. Their childhood was an odyssey that saw them flee their birthplace, Singapore, to Australia, only to return three years later — then on to England the following year. There, Irene and her younger sister Freda remained in Boarding School as her father and Doreen moved to South Africa. Doreen and Irene were ultimately reunited in South Africa, where they married and raised families of their own.

They always lived near each other so it comes as no surprise that after Irene moved to Thornhill in 1985, where she catered for the Holy Blossom Synagogue, Doreen was only a few years behind. Then, they both moved to Skymark, a Tridel condominium in Toronto. In 2010, because Irene's daughter wanted her mother to benefit from the worry-free support of a retirement community, they visited Delmanor Northtown and immediately felt at home.

Speaking with one voice, Irene says: "We knew the moment we walked in that we'd both be happy living here. Tridel quality was what we were used to and the chance to retire together was what we were after." Adds Doreen, "we love doing things together – the activities, the excursions and dining together. We always have."

Sisters. There's nothing closer.

Margaret Darte, one of Hazelton Place's longstanding residents, is 90 per cent blind, but Margaret has ears like a hawk and really enjoys the variety of music that Hazelton offers. She says "the music that we have here is very good and I find it very uplifting. I love the Irish Harp player who often tells stories after each piece. The classical groups play beautifully and give me lovely intervals in my life. And the steel drummer has great rhythm and gets people to be lively. Some even dance. Overall, I just love the variety, and I always look forward to who will be entertaining next."

Sophie Bendel

Since opening L'Chaim Retirement Residence in 2001, founder Judy Cohen has had the pleasure of enjoying a decade of continuity with residents. Typifying that continuity is its very first resident, Sophie Bendel, who moved to Toronto from Winnipeg into 2001 at age 90 to be closer to her Toronto-based children. Ten years later, she and L'Chaim look forward to celebrating her 100th birthday together.

At age 95, Helen Cornfield has found her joie de vivre as a member of a theatre group at the Terraces of Baycrest, the retirement residence where she resides.

"Being part of the group makes me feel alive," says Cornfield, who had a front-row seat at the recent viewing of a movie her group had made to showcase their talents.

"People have the stereotype that there is a way you should act and sound when you're my age," says Cornfield. "They think you just sit and vegetate, but we are active. We have a social group that keeps us feeling creative… we're giving something back and not just sitting there passively while entertainment is provided for us."

Her friend, Terraces of Baycrest resident Jean Goldstein, 89, agrees. "The theatre group keeps me in touch with what's going on at the Terraces. I meet people with interests similar to mine, and it's very stimulating to learn new things and perform for others. Our grandchildren look at us with new eyes."

The eight members of the group – all residents of Terraces of Baycrest – write and perform skits about the challenges they face as seniors. With honesty, sincerity and a sense of humour, they explore a wide range of topics.

"This group was founded close to five years ago as a vehicle for hearing the voices of our clients, giving them a mechanism for self-expression and for dialogue in community," says Baycrest's Bianca Stern.

Stern believes in the power of the arts as a therapeutic medium. Today, she and her co-facilitator, Shawn Fremeth, work to empower the actors and enable their creativity. They hold annual storytelling sessions, inviting all interested residents from the Terraces to participate, and choose topics based on discussion with the actors.

Stern knows that storytelling can be a powerful way to capture feelings and emotions and explore social issues.

"It has given the group a sense of purpose and energy," she says. "It has increased their confidence and self-esteem. Group members have also been a source of encouragement and support for one another through the ups and downs in their lives. It has given them the impetus to explore other creative activities and empowered them to raise key social issues within their community and explore solutions."

Back at the Terraces of Baycrest, the theatre group's movie performance has just ended. The theatre group receives raucous applause. The members get to their feet – slowly and surely – and with big smiles on their faces, turn to the crowd and wave at them.

"It's pretty nice to get some applause," Cornfield says, laughing. "We love to ham it up!"

At Constantia Retirement Residence, a case of mistaken mail delivery had a happy ending. Who hasn't, at one time or another, received a letter addressed to someone else? Although this can be a hassle, at Constantia Retirement Residence, the wrong address is sometimes the right one.

Consider the case of residents Rose Caplin and Dorothy Bellack. One day Rose received a letter addressed to Dorothy and returned it to the front desk. Dorothy had been expecting the letter for some time and wanted to know who returned it so she could thank them personally.

Rose and Dorothy met and a friendship developed that endures to this day. They now enjoy socializing together, having tea, playing Rummy Q and going on outings.

Adenat Inc. a one-stop shop

Marni Brinder Byk
Special to The CJN

When attempting to sum up Adenat Inc., the two words that come to mind are "vertical integration." Adenat Inc. does everything when it comes to real estate – they buy, rent, demolish, renovate, landscape, and sell.

Owner Israel Schwartz says he doesn't just buy homes, he revitalizes neighbourhoods through the redevelopment and revitalization of its homes.

Adenat Real Estate Ltd. (416-785-8555) and Adenat Property Management (416-633-3833), purchase, sell and rent a wide variety of homes and properties. Currently, Adenat Property Management oversees more than 120 properties in southern Ontario.

Once owned by Adenat, a residential property is either demolished by another division of Adenat Inc., or it might be renovated by Adenat Cabinets and Custom Kitchens (416-784-4440).

"With over 15 years experience... we design and manufacture unique kitchen cabinets, all wood trims, inlay designs and carpentry work while using the finest quality materials," Schwartz says.

"Our craftsmanship is 100 per cent satisfaction guaranteed to our customers."

If a house is to be demolished, Adenat's custom homes division (416-633-3833) uses their fine materials and craftsmanship to build the home of your dreams.

Adenat – named after Schwartz's two children, Adina and Nathan – began as, and still is, a perfume company.

With offices in Israel, Canada, the United States, and France, Schwartz took his perfume profits and invested in real estate.

Schwartz spent a lot of time and energy buying property when the market was low, mostly during the early 1990s. Schwartz then rented out his homes, and in approximately six to eight years, they returned the capital.

He then decided whether he wanted to develop them, using, of course, all of the various Adenat divisions to complete the jobs.

Schwartz, who now lives in Miami, spent a lot of time and effort making Adenat a one-stop shop.

Adenat Real Estate Ltd. sells Adenat homes, because, as Schwartz puts it, they market the Adenat brand far better than any typical real estate agent would.

"Our real estate company is quite young, but [Adenat Inc.] gets better exposure with its own agents."

He points out that real estate agents typically advertise themselves, not the builder of the homes they're trying to sell. He says builders spend years and many dollars on a finished home and, in the end, barely get any recognition.

But Adenat agents "highlight the high-quality products Adenat fills our homes with." The Adenat agents remind potential buyers that "this is an Adenat home, this is an Adenat kitchen."

His agents also benefit from a large amount of inventory through Adenat, and if they're seeking a renter for a property, they're more invested in finding the right renter, so they are essentially making sure a company's investment is safe. That's why they've been known to rent to professionals, executives and even employees of the Israeli consulate.

Renting is an affordable way to live downtown

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to the CJN

Maybe you thought you were finished with rental living when you bought your first home. Or perhaps you still think it's only for students, new Canadians, young professionals, or anyone who can't afford a house. Whatever you used to think about renting, think again: it's an appealing option for anyone, at any stage of life. And today's renters have a lot to choose from, even premium options you might not have thought possible.

Think owning your own home is always a better investment? In fact, says Trish MacPherson, vice-president of sales and marketing with Canadian Apartment Properties Real Estate Investment Trust (www.caprent.com), "Homes are close to peaked. They're not going to increase as dramatically as they have in past."

Renting can not only save you money in mortgage and maintenance (generally two to four per cent or more of the value of your home per year), but can also free your principal so that you can invest more securely and at a higher rate of return. Many who rent, MacPherson says, can actually afford to own, but choose to put their money to better use.

Of course, if your income is less secure, renting is definitely a better option, offering flexibility, predictable payments and lack of maintenance "surprises" – the kind nobody enjoys, like coming home to an unexpected flood. "A reputable landlord is going to have communication channels 24/7 to help if there is an emergency, major or minor," says MacPherson.

Don't think rental living means life crammed into a tiny or outdated apartment, either. In fact, the Canadian Apartment Properties Real Estate Investment Trust (CAPREIT) – which controls more 30,000 accommodations across Canada – is constantly upgrading its units, as well as common areas such as lobbies. And if there's anything in an apartment that you'd like updated to suit your personal taste, CAPREIT is usually happy to accommodate those requests, doing the work or recommending contractors who know the buildings and can provide quality workmanship.

As for the apartments themselves, most offer more personal living space than contemporary condominiums. With a brand-new condo, "you're going to get something half the size for the same monthly rent," says MacPherson.

CAPREIT also offers town-home complexes as well as two "land-lease communities" in Ontario. Land-lease properties offer the best of both worlds: you own your home (most are bungalow-style houses), and lease the property. The lease includes neighbourhood amenities like a community centre. "It's a good way to transition from home ownership into something with a little less maintenance," says MacPherson.

Judaica for every occasion

Finding that special gift "for a person who is unlikely to spend on themselves but would feel pleasantly spoiled having it is key," Mehl said. "For example, sterling silver drippers for a candelabra or a beautifully framed Birkat Habayit or a silver tzinder can really be an endearing gift."

At the Eglinton location, seder plates and challah boards are very popular wedding gifts, said Samery. For bar and bat mitzvahs, people love to give tzedakah boxes, menorahs and gift books. The store also offers a variety of personalized kippot, benschers and ketubahs for simchahs.

Israel's makes an effort to support Israeli artisans by providing a venue for their giftware at both stores. There is even a simchah consultant available to serve clients at each location.

"Our customers want to feel cared for more than anything, and I feel special nachas every time we achieve that as a team," Mehl said.

At Shaynee's (492 Lawrence Ave. W.), the most popular Judaica items include Shabbat candlesticks, menorahs, challah boards and knives. Shaynie Schwartz said the store specializes in handcrafted pieces by artists and unusual items from the classic to the funky.

"Our taste is avant-garde. We also carry upper-end production lines such as Michael Aram, who is a very hot designer in the giftware industry and has a beautiful line of Judaica. We attend many gift shows in search of these unusual items."

Schwartz said selling Judaica products reflects her heart and soul. "It is a marriage of our childhood memories and our adult refinements."

Gift ideas at Shaynee's depend on the occasion. For bar and bat mitzvahs, tzedakah boxes, menorahs and candlesticks are top sellers. For weddings, a challah board, challah cover, menorah or seder plate are practical options.

Schwartz said all types of customers from all over the city are attracted to her store. "There are Jews of every denomination and non-Jews as well, extravagant and budget-minded. They like what they see and they enjoy being heard, because we listen."

Chuck Elnekave, of The Israeli Source, said that this time of year, some of the most popular items are gifts for the upcoming wedding season. "It could be anything from books or housewares to challah boards or kiddush cups. One of the most popular lines we sell for the wedding season is Gary Rosenthal's collection of items that can be personalized with shards of the glass broken at the couple's chupah."

He said that the wedding season is a popular season for people buying new tallitot. "We've just expanded our selection of tallitot by about 40 per cent, with some great new styles and designs."

Elnekave said that they carry a huge assortment of popular gifts, depending on the occasion. "From weddings and bar/bat mitzvahs to graduations and housewarmings, we've got lots of items that would be relevant for any occasion, as well as for no occasion at all."

His store is different, he said, in the sense that it's not a typical boutique store. "We offer great service and a phenomenal selection, but because we cut out the fancy frills you come to expect with a boutique, like wall-to-wall carpeting and fancy shelving units, we're able to offer the products people are familiar with at prices that would typically be exclusive to wholesale purchasers.

"I love interacting with the Jewish customers, and helping people find products that enrich their lives. Whether the customer is looking for something that will have special meaning to them or not, I know that whatever people buy from me will, at least in some way, play a role in something deeper than just a purchase of any random tchatchke."

Customers who have a keen eye for savings absolutely love the store, he said. "We're constantly looking for ways to streamline our business and product selection so that we can lower our operating and purchasing costs, and pass those savings on to the customers for even lower prices."

Home furnishings and custom kitchen cabinetry

Jennifer Libman and Barbara Silverstein

You spend more time in your home than anywhere else, so filling it with furniture that you love is important. Decorium (1-800-232-2267), a Toronto family owned and operated home furnishing store that was founded in 1986, can help you. "It's really more like five stores in one," said Steve Forberg, the CEO of Decorium. "We save people from running around to other stores to meet all their needs. We have 100,000 square feet of product!"

Decorium was started by Forberg's grandfather. "My grandfather came to Canada and went into the manufacturing business," said Forberg. "Eventually, my father took over his business and turned us into what we are today – one of the largest independent retailers in the country."

Decorium's goal is to provide customers with a fashionable high-end look, but give it to them at mid-line prices. "We search the world for our unique products," said Forberg. "You won't find stuff like this anywhere else." Decorium carries more 100 different sofas and over 50 bedroom sets. And if they don't have exactly what you hoped for, they can custom order it for you. "We bring in close to 100 new items every week. People will drop by the store just to see what has changed since the last time they came in. We like to keep things fresh for everyone."

One of the latest trends in bedroom furniture is upholstered headboards. "Colour is also coming back," said Forberg. "A splash of colour in an accent piece can really brighten up a room."

Decorium offers its clients free in-store interior design consultation and the experienced staff will help pick out pieces for all clients. The company also has a full delivery service and will put all pieces of furniture together. "Our clients deserve this level of service," Forberg said.

Brooklyn Furniture (416-635-6111), another family-owned business, can also meet all your furniture needs. The Bathurst Street landmark has been serving the Toronto community for more than 50 years and is known for its medium to high-end furniture that is sold at discounted prices year round.

"We have four generations of customers," said Louis Hochman, CEO of the company. "Our clients know we take care of them, so they keep coming back. They are our best advertisers."

Brooklyn Furniture carries a huge range of products, from children and youth bedroom sets to office, dining-room and living-room furniture. The store always has one-of-a-kind pieces on the floor and every summer has a tent sale with furniture that is further discounted. "Because we're a family-operated business, no one here is on commission. We're not just trying to sell you any product – we're trying to help you make the right decisions for your home," said Hochman.

Brooklyn Furniture also sells a wide variety of name-brand mattresses. "If someone is coming here to buy a bedroom set, why would we want to make them go to another store for the mattress? This is just another example of how we go out of our way to meet our customers needs," said Hochman.

Residences on Lytton offer style, intimacy

The desirability of a luxurious new home hinges not only on the trappings of the residence itself, but on the other properties that surround it. The right house with all the right finishes on the wrong street is hardly a solution for the discriminating buyer.

So when you find the home of your dreams in a splendid little enclave surrounded by other homes of comparable quality and matching style, says David Eichorn, Broker of Record at David Eichorn Realty Ltd. (416-787-1712, www.eichornrealty.com) you can immediately check off the two most desired qualities on your wish list.

Filling this bill, says Eichorn, is Residences on Lytton by Esquire Homes, of which he is the exclusive agent. This new residential community, situated at Lytton Boulevard and Bathurst Street, will boast nine townhomes, two semi-detached homes and one fully detached home. The units will range in size from approximately 1625 sq ft to 2850 sq ft of finished living space, including a selection of three and four bedroom models. These residences will be finished with high-end upgrades and feature quality craftsmanship throughout. Pre-construction prices range from $899,900 to $1,249,000.

Lytton Park offers a prestigious address with close proximity to all amenities. With only 12 residences in this new development, it offers prospective buyers the cachet of leading-edge construction together with the prospect of a close-knit community environment.

"Living in the big city doesn't mean you need to sacrifice intimacy", says Eichorn. "Today's builders are cognizant of the need to offer buyers a lifestyle without compromise, and I think the Residences on Lytton reflects that."

Don't ignore your home's electrical systems

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Homeowners who prioritize upgrading their kitchens or bathrooms before restoring their outdated home electrical systems could be making a potentially hazardous mistake, said Armando Pecchia, Birnie Electric's residential service manager.

While it may be tempting to fall back on the age-old "out-of-sight, out-of-mind" adage, Pecchia warns that ignoring faulty electrical systems could be dangerous.

"Just because you can't see it, don't ignore it because electrical systems have a shelf life. Wires degrade all the time, and you can't see it until a fire happens. Don't ignore your electrical system. Have it tested," he said.

"Typically, we see this in homes that are 15 years or older where no one has ever had their electrical [wiring] tested. If you've got fuse boxes versus circuit breakers, it's good to have those tested... Flickering lights is also an indicator that the electric system in the home needs to be updated."

Adam Gardin, owner of Garcon Building Group, which is a general contracting company that builds new homes, does renovations, repairs and additions, said that electrical work is a significant part of his work.

Gardin, who has been in business since 2004, said that the Electrical Safety Authority has recently been cracking down on ensuring that electrical systems are up to par.

"Four or five years ago, what would easily have passed [inspection], they're making us go back and redo a lot of things," Gardin said.

"A big problem is the old knob and tube wiring they used to do."

Knob and tube wiring can usually safely accommodate a maximum of 60 amp service, while most new homes come standard with 200 amp service to account for more electronics and appliances.

Another problem with knob and tube is that it is not a grounded system, which is generally more hazardous than modern wiring systems.

"When we do renovations and additions, sometimes people buy a home and they've been told that it's all been upgraded from knob and tube, but in fact, when we open up the walls, a lot of it is still there and that's typically a big surprise for clients," Gardin said.

Pecchia said aluminum wiring is another outdated and potentially dangerous electrical system that is found in many older homes.

"They were used in the 1970s, but they were banned. But there are a lot of homes in Toronto that have aluminum wiring. Insurance companies are also starting to deny coverage if you have aluminum wiring."

One of the problems associated with aluminum wiring is that the electrical current through the metal causes a changes in its temperature, which results in the expanding and contracting of the wire. The fluctuations in temperature can cause joints to loosen and compromise the connection, which can lead to an electrical fire.

Still, the most common mistake associated with residential wiring occurs when homeowners overload their circuits, Pecchia said.

"A lot of the houses weren't built to withstand all the gizmos that we're plugging in. They are really overloading the circuits, they're putting in extension cords, or those power bars and plugging in 10 devices into one outlet. It just wasn't meant to be used in that way."

Pecchia said it's important for people who own older homes to get an inspection.

Birnie Electric uses the CurrentSAFE Electrical Hazard Detection service to inspect homes inside and out.

The process includes a no-fee assessment of a home's electric system during which an electrician will test receptacles for wiring problems, check that smoke detectors are working properly, and answer any electricity-related questions.

Following that, the homeowner receives a full report that documents potential safety hazards, such as wires that aren't properly grounded or bad connections.

The best part of the inspection, Pecchia said, is that it can be done without having to cut any holes in the walls or ceilings.

"We use infrared thermal-imaging devices to check behind the walls for hot spots, and ultrasonic listening devices... so that if there is a loose wire, and it's arcing or buzzing, it detects that noise," he said.

Gardin said that from the perspective of a general contractor, his best advice is to do your research before hiring someone to work on your home.

"When people are doing repairs and renovations, it is [important] that they don't skimp out on the mechanical and electrical aspects of their home because the things that you don't see, per se, people feel like they can get away with using a cheaper guy or a less experienced guy. But those are crucial elements of the home," Gardin said.

His advice for future homeowners wanting to avoid facing an electrical problem is to get a good home inspection done before buying a home.

"When you go into look at a house, look at the overall condition of the mechanical room. That's where they have the furnace, the boiler, the electrical panel, all the difference elements of the mechanical and electrical systems are in that room," Gardin said.

"If you go in to that room, it'll either be really clean and neat and everything will look put together, or it will be a complete mess. That is usually a good sign of the overall condition of the home. If that room is a mess and you've got wires hanging out all over the place, chances are you're going to have some problems."

Those who own a home that is 15 years or older should look into upgrading their homes to 200 amp service.

"That will accommodate the additional equipment that we're putting into our homes – the big TVs, the stereo systems and that stuff," Gardin said.

Improving your garden and backyard habitat

With the weather warming up, it's time to start enjoying the great outdoors. And more than ever these days, that can be done without leaving your property.

Designing the space outside one's house or apartment has grown by leaps and bounds.

"Once upon a time, we'd just have a slab of concrete with a couple of chairs on it and that was it," said Brian Murphy, a longtime landscaper who created his own company, Brian Murphy Design.

Brian Murphy

"Now, we go for groupings, where you have couches, tables, chairs and fire pits."

All of those can be purchased from Deck and Dock, located on Castlefield Avenue, just west of Dufferin Street.

"We cover all aspects of outdoor living," said Deck and Dock's Dave Reburn. "We do sectionals, dining sets, tables, fire pits and basically all aspects of outdoor that anyone would be interested in."

He's noticed a bit of a change from a classic look of outdoor furniture to more of a modern feel.

"It really means that you move from a woven wicker armchair, a classic design over the last 30 or 40 years, to something like a sectional today, something that might even be called 'contempo,'" Reburn said.

Although some of the more popular items these days, such as sectionals, have large cushions, there may not be a need to bring them in every time it rains anymore.

"With better quality cushions, one of the things we can actually do is water-proof cushions," Reburn said.

Using a fabric called crypton (sometimes spelled krypton), cushions are essentially resistant to water.

Even if you've bought your cushions a few years ago, the process can be done at the same time as a cleaning.

"The best approach is cleaning and waterproofing at the same time, so sometimes the best cushion for that is one that's three years ago that needs to be cleaned anyways," Reburn said.

Deck and Dock also stores furniture and does restoration in the offseason, and will do either regardless of whether or not the items were purchased there.

Photos courtesy of Brian Murphy Design

With the living items in place, that just leaves the natural beauty of the landscape to worry about – which Murphy covers.

"Most often, I'll do a complete makeover," said Murphy, who has been landscaping since the 1970s. "It's either when a building is being renovated or just a basic garden in place, and then we build a whole beautiful landscape."

As with the physical outdoor pieces, landscaping has changed to become more current.

"There's a big interest in modern design and modern look," Murphy said.

"We're doing gardens now that are very structured, have clean lines, and lots of grasses or architectural-looking plants as opposed to a pile of fluffy things."

That's not to say that he won't plant a garden full of those pretty things, because he does like them.

"Some people just love flowers, and I'm able to create a border garden," said Murphy, who recently won awards for his design at a home in North York.

A border garden is a European-type concept that has perennials instead of annuals, staged in a way that some bloom in every different part of each season.

"It's difficult to create, but a lot of fun to do," Murphy said. "For people who love flowers, a border garden is a great thing to have."

Deck and Dock is open seven days a week and can also be reached by phone at 416-781-4887.

Baby stores have everything for new parents

Jennifer Libman
Special to The CJN

Becoming a new parent is a big adjustment and figuring out everything you need can seem overwhelming, so luckily there are experts in Toronto that can help. Dear-Born Baby, 905-881-3334, was established in 1979 and has been serving new parents ever since. It the one place to find all the best products to make parenting convenient, rewarding and enjoyable.

Not only will you find everything you need for your baby, but the store offers specialty services such as professional car seat installations, stroller tune-ups and repairs, furniture touch-ups, and rentals.

"We pride ourselves on being a full service baby store," said Hope Katz, registry manager at Dear-Born Baby.

"We carry everything you could possibly need to get your child through infancy and into toddlerhood. We also have the latest and greatest of every product."

If you don't see a product you want on the store-room floor, Dear-Born can order it in for you. "We have access to every line of all the manufacturers we carry. We want you to get exactly what you want," Katz said.

Dear-Born Baby recently opened up an outlet store located across the street from their original location on Doncaster Avenue in Thornhill. The outlet, which is currently only open on weekends, offers marked down and discontinued products at a reduced rate.

"This is a great opportunity for young couples on a budget to be able to afford high-end products" Katz said. "The items are all excellent quality – they just happen to be older models."

Dear-Born Baby also offers parents of new babies workshops on topics such as infant massages, car seat and stroller safety, and parent and child nutrition.

For parents who are unsure of what kind of furniture to buy for their baby, Dear-Born books personal consultations with experts in the store to help them make the right choices.

"Nothing is more stressful than trying to find a sales staff to help you in a crowded store," Katz said. "We let you book an appointment so all our attention is on you."

Of course, babies grow up and then they require new furniture. For a chic and contemporary line of adjustable beds, sofa sleepers and day beds, parents will want to go to Sapapa, 416-709-2385.

Sapapa, which is called Aminach in Israel, sells high quality beds and mattresses that are not only fashionable, but have a state-of-the-art patented "healthy sleep" technology that makes sleeping more comfortable than ever.

"We have beds in every size from single to king size," said Danny Seigelwachs, owner of Sapapa. "We can also custom make sizes to fit any room. Another unique feature of the beds is that each one is equipped with storage space underneath the bed. This is perfect for children because they can have a designated spot in their room for all of their toys."

Sapapa also has a line of sofa beds, which unlike many traditional pullout couches, are comfortable enough for sleeping on every night. "These are great for small rooms, or for guest bedrooms," Seigelwachs said. "They are so simple to transform from couch to bed that it can be done nightly." These beds are also popular for college and university students, because they can be used during the day as a place to study or entertain friends.

Sapapa is also proud to sell beds that have a built in sound system at the foot of the bed.

"It has speakers so you can plug in your iPod or laptop and listen to music while in bed," Seigelwachs explained. "And of course, we wouldn't compromise the quality of the mattress just because it has a novelty bed frame."

Sapapa is located on Disera Drive near Bathurst and Centre streets in Thornhill.

Tips for keeping your home healthy

Jennifer Libman
Special to The CJN

Lisa Borden, founder of Borden Communications + Design Inc., believes that your home is the most important place in the world for you to be safe, and the best thing you can do for yourself and your family is to fill it with healthy things.

"My main role is to help people get perspective and develop a healthy system that's the right fit for their home," Borden says.

When Borden began her company in 1994, the environmental movement was just beginning to enter mainstream society, and finding environmentally friendly products was difficult because the market was so small. Interestingly, over the last 15 years, even though the movement has exploded, finding these products is not much easier.

"There are thousands of 'green' cleaning products out there, but these aren't any better than the conventional product," Borden says. "Words like 'natural' and 'biodegradable' don't mean they are healthy for you. They still contain harmful chemicals, and probably cost more as well. We don't know how these chemicals will react with our bodies – save your money and don't buy them."

Borden believes in inspiring change in her clients by encouraging them to think creatively and view the world from a different perspective. "My job isn't to sell a specific product. I do market products I believe in, but even then, I want my clients to feel proud to put their name behind them."

She encourages people to use common sense when evaluating whether or not a product is healthy for the environment. "You need to think about where it came from, how it got there, what it's used for and where it will go after you're through with it. Don't be a blind shopper – think about your choices and be empowered to make educated decisions."

The first piece of advice Borden has for people looking to create a healthier home is to get rid of all cleaning products. "There is virtually no upside of using them in your home, and all of your cleaning needs can be met with just water and good microfibre cloth."

The only cleaning aids Borden allows in her home are dish soap and laundry soap. You wouldn't know that from walking into her house though. "I still have standards of cleanliness!" she says with a laugh.

The second tip she offers is to insist that all guests take their shoes off immediately upon entering the door.

"Think about it – would you want your kids crawling on a floor that's covered in pesticides and dirt? We have no idea what we walk through everyday. Don't bring it into your home."

Third, Borden encourages people to take an inventory of their personal care products. "Your skin is your largest organ, and it absorbs everything. Don't you want to know what you're putting into your body?" She advises people to look up their favourite products on www.cosmeticsdatabase.com a website that rates cosmetics and other health-care items based on their ingredients and toxicity.

Borden also tells people to avoid products containing any fragrances, including air fresheners. "Fresh air is the air we don't smell," she says. "We're so accustomed to these fake scents that when we don't smell anything, we wonder about it. If your house needs some freshening up, then open the window."

Finally, Borden stresses the importance of being a picky shopper. "This goes from the products you use to clean your home to the clothes and personal care items you use and the foods you buy. Think about every purchase and choose discriminatingly.

"If we all stopped to think before taking out our wallet everyone would make better decisions. Don't be lured by marketing."

Snowbirds purchase second homes

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

As the Canadian dollar continues to increase in value against the greenback, Canucks are looking south of the border for second-home investments and finding them irresistible.

Neil Schneider, a real estate agent with Prudential Arizona Properties in Phoenix, says the percentage of Canadians buying property in Phoenix has been very high in recent months.

Most of them are Western Canadians, he adds. "Phoenix provides a good contrast to Canada weather-wise. The values have been outstanding, and not everyone wants to go to Florida, so this is a good alternative."

Condominiums in decent communities in the area are selling for $25,000, Schneider says, and five out of the seven most expensive homes sold in Phoenix in mid-April were purchased by Canadians. "They were priced between $1.5 million and $3 million, and were 5,000- to 7,000-square-foot homes on at least an acre, with newer construction, great views of the desert, swimming pools and great amenities," he says. Many of them are in golf communities with clubhouses, or gated communities.

At the lower end of the spectrum, a $25,500 condo such as one Schneider sold to a Canadian family recently will get you a one-bedroom, one-bathroom condo in a gated community. "It's not fancy, but it's in a nice neighbourhood with a swimming pool, and it's just 10 minutes away from many cultural and recreational facilities," he says.

It's not just the retirees that are buying either, he adds. Most of the Canadians purchasing second homes in Arizona are in their 40s to 60s, still working, with teenagers or older, more independent children.

Rickie Klein, a real estate agent in Naples with Premiere Plus Realty Co., echoes this sentiment. "The age group I'm dealing with is 40s, 50s and early 60s, a highly educated, successful demographic. They fit in extremely well in Naples," she says.

It's the Ontarians who are purchasing in Florida, she adds. "I've been here 10 years, and we've never seen so many Ontario license plates on the road as we are today. The Canadians that are coming to Naples are so pleasant, easygoing and educated. They're a wonderful addition to our community."

Rental buildings have resident-focused approach

Jessica Green, marketing director with Greenwin Inc. (www.greenwin.ca), agrees that a rental lifestyle is hassle-free. "When you rent, you eliminate heating costs, water bills and property taxes. You get immediate response to service requests and a permanent break from shovelling snow. You can take a vacation with the comfort of knowing that a building representative is always on-site." Greenwin, a developer and property management company, has operated for more than 60 years in the residential and commercial spheres.

For Green, the advantages of renting go beyond the actual unit where you live to the community beyond. "Some sites have regular barbecues, contests and seasonal celebrations, while others offer yoga classes, swimming lessons and purse exchanges... our property managers are committed to creating communities within their buildings."

"We provide aqua fitness classes for the residents," says Eugene Hankin, a Greenwin property manager who operates two buildings near Yonge Street and Eglinton Avenue, along with scheduled yoga and Pilates classes. For one upcoming ultimate fighting (UFC) event, he says, "We're going to be ordering the pay per view, getting pizza," and allowing residents to enjoy the event in the media room. Even green thumbs can be happy in an apartment that includes a designated garden plot.

These amenities may not be available in all of Greenwin's buildings and developments, but they are definitely typical of Greenwin's resident-focused approach. "We're always looking for ways to improve by conducting surveys and regular resident appreciation events," Green says, adding that "all sites offer the same level of service—regardless of the amount of rent you pay."

Greenwin's definition of community doesn't end at the building door, either. "We're committed to social responsibility through community revitalization," says Green, addressing high vacancy rates, crime and drug activity in priority neighbourhoods. "Much like we did at San Romanoway [Apartments] with a Cineplex-sponsored movie theatre, art gallery and upcoming media-arts centre, our vision is to create community hubs where residents feel a sense of pride and ownership for their home."

Simply living in the heart of the city, close to transit, shopping, and a vibrant, exciting lifestyle can have its own benefits, especially at a time when the dream of owning a patch of land has driven some hopefuls farther and farther beyond the city limits.

Living in the city has lots of benefits

"The notion of the white picket fence is appealing," says Green, "but with property taxes, utility bills, legal fees, insurance, decorating, kids, travel, school and other debts, at some point you have to question whether buying makes sense for you."

"Renting doesn't have to be seen as a second option," agrees MacPherson. Shop around well ahead – in Ontario, mandatory 60 days' notice lets you find out early which apartments will be available.

Canadians find Jewish communities in Florida

They're also buying properties with higher price tags, on average. At the end of March, Klein closed on a $685,000 property that was purchased by a Toronto couple. "Some people just want to get their feet wet spending $200,000, and others want to spend $2 to $3 million," says Klein, who closed $3 million worth of sales in the first quarter of 2011. "Canadians get off the plane here, see the blazing sun and blue skies and make a decision to buy another residence. Then they don't leave," she says.

The sizable Jewish community in Naples is an added benefit. The mayor of Naples is Jewish, the city boasts three synagogues, a vibrant Hadassah group and an American Jewish Federation with more than 6,000 family members. "Many Canadians are surprised to find such a huge, tightly knit Jewish community here," she says.

Palm Beach is experiencing the same interest from Canadians, according to Phyllis Conviser, a real estate agent with Prudential Florida Realty. "Five to six per cent of our sales are to Canadians right now," she says. "Now that our dollars are so similar, they really should be looking in this area."

It's paradise, agrees Klein. "Naples is like Palm Beach. It's very special, not like any other community in Florida," she explains. "It's elite, clean, safe and full of culture. We have the highest concentration of retired CEOs anywhere in the U.S., which is to say we attract a really high-end demographic."

Everyone has their own version of paradise, though, and for Schneider, Arizona fits the bill perfectly. "This is a delightful place," he says. "It has an excellent cultural and recreational scene, lots of historic and natural beauty, and we're only six hours from California and the beaches there."

Whichever state they're eyeing, Canadians are loving their strong dollar and making a dent in real estate markets south of the border. They're looking for sunshine, good prices and the kind of amenities they can't enjoy year-round in the Great White North. No surprise, most of them are leaving their snowshoes and skis back home.

What drives a rise in property values?

As long as people have been buying and selling homes, there have been factors that drive a rise in value. One theory is to follow the artists, meaning where they buy and establish a neighbourhood. Inevitably, it rises greatly in value.

We asked realtors what they think the real drivers of future values are in the areas they work.

Rodica Iliescu, sales representative for Remax All Stars Realty Inc., said that the most important factor that she considers in the increase of property values is employment. Without it, the whole geographical area is affected and the property value is adjusting negatively.

The employment corridor is very important for the growth of the community and property. "I'm referring to the industrial zoning and adjacent commercial retail businesses – Promenade Mall, Walmart, Winners, Bagel World, Starbucks, restaurants, banks, medical offices, professional offices, and other supporting shops and offices," she said.

In Toronto, employment is very diverse. We have many industries. We do not depend on one as some towns do. For example, Elliat Lake depends on the extraction of the minerals and coal. If the mine closes, then the whole infrastructure is affected, including employment, real estate, standard of living, depression, illnesses related to the economic condition and the amount of crime.

There is another factor that comes into consideration as well – new residential development that is affordable for the community. Developers contribute to the growth of the community. They transform the geographical area positively and dramatically from year to year It is a great improvement for the community. The people who live there have choices.They can afford to raise a family. We are thankful for this community, and the developers who work in this geographical area.

Further consideration is the fact that there are two employed adults to sustain the family. Also, the higher number of renters, the higher the risk of having stagnated or negatively adjusted property values.

Fortunately we live in a community that cares about our future and prosperity. Nothing should be taken for granted. And we should continuously work together for the common goal of a stable environment. To create this condition, it has to be maintained,so please shop, participate and enjoy your community. Be part of it.

Donna Seidman, broker of record at Seidman Real Estate Limited/Brokerage, said that as long as people purchase property without over-budgeting themselves and they are comfortable and can keep up with their lifestyle, they are making a good investment, as they are increasing their equity in the property from year to year.

"I am a licensed real estate broker specializing in residential property and working over 30 years in Bathurst Manor. I see this as a great demanding neighbourhood. Lots of homes are being renovated or rebuilt. The land value with good-sized lots keeps the prices high. There are many large homes being built," she said.

"Many young families are coming back in the area to cut their travelling time to work and take advantage of good transportation and the Downsview subway."

Darren M. Slavens, vice-president/broker, Slavens & Associates Real Estate Inc., says simple supply and demand determines will determine future value. When supply outpaces demand, prices fall. Likewise, when demand outpaces supply prices rise. In most residential neighbourhoods in the central or midtown area, there are a number of different attributes that would lead to demand.

First and foremost would be access to good public schools and proximity to the TTC. For instance, we see that Cedarvale is one of the hottest neighbourhoods in the city. Why? It has one of the most sought-after public schools in the city and is within a five-minute walk to the subway station. You can look at the Yonge and Lawrence area, and we'll see the exact same thing – John Wanless School district and quick walk to the Yonge subway line. Who wouldn't want to live in Allenby? You have a beautiful green neighbourhood with, again, a top public school and it's not too far from the subway. You have to remember when people have access to good public schools they can be saving upward of $15,000 in private school tuition. Think of what that can cover in a mortgage at current interest rates.

Access is also a key factor for people. "What can I walk to?"; "Is there shopping?"; "Does the area have restaurants?"; "Can I walk to them?" We live in the greatest city in the world, and people who live in Toronto want access to all the city has to offer.

Bernice Whelan, of Bernice Whelan Real Estate Realty, said there are a number of factors that she believes will drive future value in the Lake Simcoe area.

As people's lives become busier and more stressful, the close proximity of Lake Simcoe to Toronto – only 40 minutes away – continues to increase in value to many cottagers. Many people are putting their permanent home on the water and keeping a condo in the city. As this lifestyle choice becomes increasingly popular, so do the waterfront properties they are looking for.

People are no longer interested in just the summer cottage – they want all the amenities and are willing to pay for it.

David Eichorn, of David Eichorn Realty, says the demand for specific areas is driven by proximity and access to community services that reflect similar cultural values. This may include synagogues, recreation centres, schools and shops.

"Ultimately, people want the same thing they've always wanted... a good roof over their head. Families with children or expecting children want to know that that their kids can grow up in a safe, culturally stimulating area close to other like-minded children and families. Older buyers want proximity to their children and grandchildren, insofar as possible.

"Finding the right home in the right location at the right price is an art in itself. When we do that, our "work" may not hang in a gallery, but I can assure you it's what our clients value most."

The Evolution of Apartment Living™

The garage has become my family's dumping ground

Anita Szabadi-Gottesman
Special to The CJN

I pride myself on keeping a neat, clean home. It borders on obsession. I can't rest my head on my pillow until I have made sure that every picture frame is turned to just the right angle, every dish is washed, dried and stored and the bathroom towels are neatly folded and hung.

Of course, the towel rule applies only to my bathroom and not to the second bathroom used by my not-as-compulsive adult children still living at home. My Armageddon, my highest insurmountable peak, my organizational nightmare – is my garage.

There is nothing quite as frustrating as being out for a leisurely stroll with my pooch and gazing with wonder and awe at many of the orderly, pristine garages in my neighbourhood. With their gleaming floor tiles, freshly painted walls and stainless-steel shelving units that would be the envy of any home design guru, I can't help but feel overwhelmed with feelings of anxiety and inadequacy.

But where to begin? Since downsizing from my large suburban home, the garage has become my family's dumping ground for any item that doesn't seem to belong anywhere else. From skis and toboggans to car tires and seldom-used sports equipment, my family members and I are all guilty of the same crime – when you don't know what to do with an item, including that birthday present you have not delivered to the selection of winter hats you may or may not wear this season, the refrain is the same – just put it somewhere in the garage.

Well into our third year in our new home, there is no more "somewhere." Every possible space has been taken up by some utilitarian items such as a much-needed upright freezer – chosen with saving space in mind – boot racks and garden tools to piles of junk with no other place to call home.

Experts agree that the first step in cleaning out any storage space from the cutlery drawer in the kitchen to the bedroom closet through to the garage is to start by removing everything in the space. A gargantuan task that cannot be done alone by even the most dedicated, all family members must become involved. Pick a day, notify family members, serve a hearty breakfast and begin.

First step in cleaning is to start removing everything in the space

Identify three distinct sections on your lawn: items to throw away; items to give away and items to keep. This, of course, requires a steely grit as when sorting begins various family members will want to hold on to "precious" items that they have not only not seen but not used for several seasons. Be strong and don't let your or any family member's emotions sway you from your mission. Visualize your clean garage neatly housing only items you really need. Surely those old rusty skates do not hold any emotional attachment and neither do the assortment of clay pots you bought just in case you had a sudden urge to plant that herb garden in your kitchen. Throw, give and keep sparingly is your mantra, and you must stick to it.

When curious neighbours stop by to chat be polite but curt so as not to distract you from your duties. Keep the family well fed and hydrated, and if you don't want to take the time away from your work to whip something up in the kitchen, order pizza or pre-purchase party sandwiches.

Once the sorting is complete, you can begin to assess your storage needs. Will it all fit in the garage leaving room for a car and a bicycle or two? If not, your local big-box home improvement store has all manner of easy-to-assemble storage units that double as garden seats and benches. Look for dead space on the side of the house and find the appropriate storage unit.

If you want to go all out and have the space, consider a garden shed to house your bulkier items. Assess the remaining space and keep going– can you hang items from the ceiling and create more room on the floor? There are specific units available for all manner of storage from sturdy hooking systems made just for bicycles to special inserts for rakes and brooms and vacuum cleaners. The educated folk at the big-box stores can provide a wealth of information if you're willing to ask. Just don't send your husband – he won't ask.

Picture your new home

Marni Brinder Byk
Special to The CJN

Norstar's Portrait Condominiums encourage potential buyers to "picture yourself home" in the currently-under-construction, eight-storey midrise building.

The company encourages potential customers to live in their "artistic, natural setting" and to live "life as art." Located in the Dublin Heights/Bathurst Manor area of North York, at 695 Sheppard Ave. W., two blocks west of Bathurst, Portrait's sales office is directly across the road from the construction site at the corner of Sheppard and Yeomans Road.

According to Norstar co-owner Gary Silver, Portrait Condominiums is in an ideal setting: an upscale neighbourhood, minutes from Yonge Street, highways, Yorkdale Mall, the subway, and numerous synagogues.

Asked what excites him about the project, Silver lists many exciting details, but he highlights its location and architect Paul Northgrave, whom Silver calls one of the "finest architects in Toronto... responsible for some of the most elegant buildings in Toronto."

Portrait Condominiums, he says, will be the "pinnacle of the Sheppard corridor" and proudly points out the building's south-facing terraces, enormous balconies, park-like settings and abundance of amenities. Portrait Condominiums will boast a fitness studio, yoga and pilates studio, steam room, pet spa with grooming facility, party room, a guest suite, games room, a 24-hour-a-day uniformed concierge, and even a garden potting room.

At Portrait's sales office, Hedwig and George Hoedlmoser are in the process of purchasing their suite.

When asked why they chose Portrait, they respond that they "like the area, like the building" and are downsizing from their current home. "We saw the model and knew it was the building for us" and that the staff are the "best they have worked with," George said.

Sean Sezlik, site sales manager, said Portrait is accommodating with floor plans and is letting the Hoedlmosers make some changes to their newly purchased suite. Sezlik also noted that there are also no hidden costs and that with Portrait's incentive program, they are receiving eight per cent interest on their deposit and free parking.

Silver, Sezlik, and the Hoedlmosers all toast the newly purchased suite with wine to close the deal.

But the good news keeps on coming. Although the Hoedlmosers are downsizing from their current home, they won't have to say good-bye to hosting summer parties. Their new suite will only be steps away from the building's fifth floor outdoor terrace and barbecue.

Occupancy begins in early 2012, but everyone can enjoy the daily evolution of the building by visiting PortraitCondo.com and looking at a live camera of the construction site.

Suites range from 600 to 1,700 square feet and "are embellished with soaring ceilings, engineered hardwood flooring, electric fireplaces, granite countertops, stainless steel appliances and more."

For more information, visit the Portrait Condominiums sales centre, visit PortraitCondo.com, call 416-282-9600 or e-mail portraitcondos@gmail.com.

Retirement residence changed lives

Gerald Berley, a resident at Four Elms Retirement Residence, says that moving into his retirement residence has changed his life – "it's made it even more wonderful!

"I've been able to continue all of my charitable work here, and yet, I can also make an impact here at Four Elms. It has enhanced my life because now I am spreading my wings, I am socializing more and doing what I love to do best – be with people," he says. "I love meeting new people and learning about them, and here at Four Elms, I have the opportunity to do that daily. I just love it!

Gerald Berley

"You know, I still wake up in the mornings, feeling like I live in a hotel, for everything is provided for me and I don't have to run around to do any chores or errands. There are so many fun things to do and wonderful common areas for us to enjoy – the theatre, the billiards room, the library, all the lounges and the gym. I am always busy, always doing something fun, and I am really enjoying my years of retirement."

* * *

The Dunfield Retirement Residence represents the evolution of retirement living says Karen Hen, marketing manager, where the residents can enjoy an active and stimulating environment that gives them the same kind of choice and variety they experienced throughout their lives.

Meeting with friends in the Bistro Café or the Classic Dining Room for lunch or dinner is great for residents like Lillian Peranson and Ida Fienberg. Lillian went to public school with Ida's brother and even though she didn't know her well then it was nice to know someone before she moved in. In fact when Lillian was touring our residence it was Ida who wanted her to see her own suite. What a great way to welcome a new resident.

As resident Fern Cohen put it; "I didn't know anyone when I moved in but I have made so many new friends here, this was the best decision I made and the happiest time of my life."

Station preview a huge success

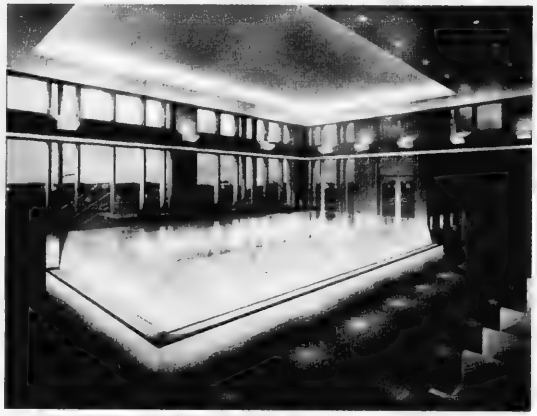
After a preview sale at the Station Condos on the Subway, this fabulous development is now more than 60 per cent sold.

These sales are a result of the total package the Station has to offer, including an amazing location at Wilson Avenue and Allen Road, steps from the Wilson subway station and close to amenities such as schools, parks and Yorkdale Shopping Centre.

The Station is leading the revitalization of this hot, emerging area of Toronto, which means that residential property values will likely increase over time. The Station is only minutes from downtown via the subway, but it's far enough that buyers can enjoy downtown living with uptown prices.

Suites start in the $200,000s, so now is the optimum time to get in on the ground floor of this incredible opportunity. The Station's two-bedroom designs are more spacious than most others you'll find in the GTA today and are priced even lower than many one-bedroom suites downtown. It's almost like getting the second bedroom free.

Adding to the tremendous value are remarkable amenities that include two Toronto firsts. The condominium will feature three "Urbanas" – intimate indoor/outdoor party rooms that open onto a heated, protected barbecue/dining space, similar to a private box at Air Canada Centre – and an indoor infinity-edge oasis pool with a magnificent waterfall that can actually be used for swimming. Typically found only in high-end hotels and exotic resorts, this innovative pool invites suite owners to relax at the side to the mesmerizing view of water spilling over all three edges, seemingly until infinity, or plunge right in for a refreshing dip.



In addition, the Studio Club on the seventh floor is surrounded by glass and boasts incredible views. The club includes a grand party room, with a large bar, catering kitchen, fantastic sound system, dance floor and indoor/outdoor fireplace opening onto a fabulously landscaped terrace with barbecues. Plus, the club has a games room, fitness centre, his and hers steam rooms, and outdoor lounge areas. And to maximize convenience, the community also features 4,000 square feet of convenient retail space right at the corner of Wilson Avenue and Tippett Road.

Lukas Design Interiors appointed these luxurious amenities, which are showcased at the presentation centre.

You, too, can own a vacation home in the Caribbean

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

You don't have to be a millionaire to own a luxury vacation home in the Caribbean. These days, prime beach front property can be an affordable option through fractional ownership.

You can buy into this luxury lifestyle at a fraction of the cost by buying a portion of the property, says Jeremy Brooks (705-739-1300 or 705-220-3830), a real estate agent with the Sutton Group. "You buy shares in a property that you can use a few weeks a year."

He notes that one of the big differences between fractional ownership and a time share is that fractional ownership is deeded. "The real estate is owned as deeded real estate or the deeded equivalent in a corporation owned by a group of individuals. Each owns a percentage of shares in the asset and has equal rights and privileges to its use."

Brooks says people tend to buy one-tenth or one-twelfth of the property. "Four- to five-week blocks are typical fractional sales."

He works with Hibiscus International, a Canadian-based development company with properties in islands including Barbados, St. Lucia, St. Maarten, the Bahamas, Turks and Caicos, St. Thomas, Granada, Antigua and the Dominican Republic.

He says that according to recent market research, a high percentage of Caribbean homes are being purchased by Canadian buyers, in part, because of the strength of the Canadian dollar.

The prices depend on the exclusivity of the location, the size and the amenities provided. "You can pay $200,000 to $300,000 for a fraction ownership property in the Dominican Republic – it's one of the more affordable locations – or up to $1 million plus on another island."

Price depends on location

Many areas in St. Maarten like Cupecoy, are popular because the setting offers luxury resort style amenities such as swimming pools, tennis courts and restaurants, he says. "You would think you're staying a big resort."

Another benefit, he adds is that "it's a 45-minute ferry ride from St. Maarten to St. Barts. That's the place to see celebrities."

Brooks says there are many different styles of fractional ownership, from villas in gated communities to resort-style condominiums.

Another type of fractional ownership is syndication, which is a private fractional ownership shared by a group of friends and/or family. Everyone becomes a shareholder in the property. "Syndication offers more flexibility in property selection, because it can be set up with any freehold private home. You also know your co-owners."

Most property ownership in the Caribbean is set up as a holding company, with the fractional or co-owners getting shares and splitting the taxes. "Property taxes vary. They're very low. In some areas, they're next to nothing."

He points out that from an investment standpoint, Caribbean properties offer many financial advantages in comparison to those in the United States, where foreign owners are taxed heavily and insurance premiums for such things as hurricanes can be high. As well, several islands have no inheritance or capital gains tax.

The management companies provide a range of services – the monthly fees vary between properties – and they can also rent out the properties when they are not being used by the owners. In this way, they can earn income from the units. However, he cautions that the money earned has to stay in the Caribbean. "If you bring the money back, you pay tax on it in Canada."

In years past, property ownership in the Caribbean was also limited to the wealthy because the islands were not easily accessible, Brooks says, noting that most of the islands now have modern airports and travelling logistics are no longer a major challenge.

Terrence Lukas has a diverse and storied background in creating fabulous residences, hotels, private clubs and resort interiors. Saturated primary colours in the model's accessories and artwork add dynamic contrast against the light grey walls and white furniture throughout the living, den and kitchen areas, while mirrored surfaces, glass and polished metals add sparkle. The model is fitted with furniture and accessories that give the suite a sense of personality that Lukas calls "a mixture of sophistication, sexiness and fun."

Select from one-bedroom, one-bedroom-plus-den, two-bedroom and two-bedroom-plus-den suites in sizes from 595 square feet (including a 100-square-foot balcony) to 1,180 square feet (with a 140-square-foot balcony). Each suite features a loggia, sun terrace, balcony, French balcony, or combination of outdoor spaces. For the ultimate convenience, many suites also include an interior storage area for those extra items that are not used every day – a rare luxury in modern condominiums.

Two-storey living spaces, called Townlofts, are available in two-bedroom, two-bedroom-plus-den, and three-bedroom-plus-den designs, from 1,237 to 1,706 square feet, including up to 197 square feet of private courtyard. These are available on the ground floor with private courtyards, or as sophisticated penthouse homes. There are also a limited number of Townlofts that feature both residential and commercial zoning – ideal for entrepreneurs who want to be close to home.

Continuing the theme of innovative building styles, The Station also has live/work suites, priced from just $399,000 for 1,094 square feet. These residence/business suites are already proving a hit with a variety of purchasers. The ground floor is right at Wilson and Tippett, so it's perfect for offering professional services or a retail space. Upstairs, the one-bedroom suite can become your home as well, giving new meaning to having a "home office," or you can rent it out and supplement your income by adding "landlord" to your entrepreneurial ventures. You may opt instead to live in the upstairs suite and rent out the ground floor to a business.

Since 1986, Brandy Lanes Homes has built innovative communities and imaginative residences across Southern Ontario. This well-respected firm has earned a reputation for pioneering condominium thinking and design. Vision combined with hands-on experience have catapulted this builder/developer to the front of the line when it comes to the design and construction quality of both homes and neighbourhoods.

Redecorating tips for a room fit for a teen

Ellen Lechter Green
Special to The CJN

Transforming a room to reflects your teen's taste and interests can be a challenge.

Trends or themes can go out of fashion quickly, and bold colour combinations for flooring and furniture, items that cannot be easily and inexpensively replaced can be risky.

Still, the bedroom is her domain, and she needs to have a voice in its décor. Better to listen to what your teen wants, advises a parent who recently went through the process, and try to incorporate as much of it into the space to satisfy you both.

"Lara had a beautiful little girl's room that I decorated myself when she was five," says Mary. "I had built a solid, dark-brown wood four-poster twin bed and matching armoire, and we painted the walls light pink to match her carpet. I thought that maybe one day the pink would go, but I felt she'd always have that furniture."

Now 11-years later, Lara's tastes and needs changed. "Lara was tired of heavy dark furniture. She really wanted light and modern," says Mary. "I always buy my furniture to last a really long time, so I had trouble with the idea of change. But I realized that these next few years are just another stage of her life, and her room should reflect her own tastes and style, not mine."

She does caution that anyone working with a teen on a room update has to set guidelines. First, she says, make a budget and adhere to it, no matter what. "I allowed her two paint colours for the walls, which can keep down costs if you are not doing the painting yourselves," she says. "Also, it creates more of an orderly flow to the space and chances are won't be something she gets sick of too quickly."

The old pink carpet was replaced with a sandy berber, a neutral that Mary feels will be better for resale one day. "Lara wanted a pastel violet paint and a soft cream for her walls, which was fine by me," she says. "She also loves the colour black, so we used it in accent touches throughout the room."

A design trick she learned from her painter was to pick paint in both eggshell and semi-gloss finishes as opposed to the traditional flat. "This creates more of a velvety lustre on the walls and a warmer ambience," she says. "And it also makes the walls easier to clean."

Another big change was selling the twin bed and purchasing in its place a double mattress, which now sits on an inexpensive white platform. Mary found an affordable violet bedspread that is both washable and soft, one of Lara's requirements. "Her last bedspread was very expensive but really didn't hold up well. When Lara's friends come over, they use her bed as a couch, and I wanted something I wouldn't feel too bad about replacing one day if it gets shabby."

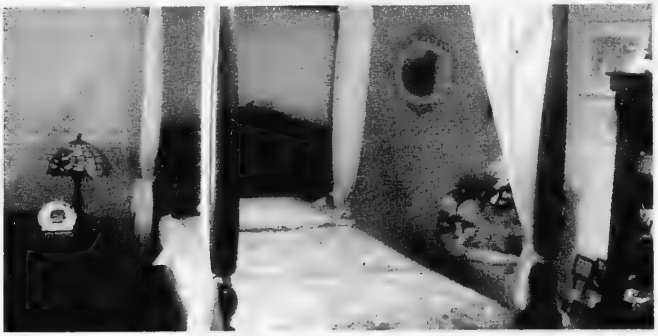
Simple white bookshelves bought on sale for $10 each help hold all Lara's sports trophies, knick-knacks, makeup, and of course, stuffed animals. "One of the conditions of redoing the room was that she had to donate at least half of her stuffed animals to a charity," Mary says, laughing.

The original armoire turned into a mother and daughter weekend project. "We painted it a semi-gloss cream that matches her walls," she says. "It was a huge job, and people thought we were crazy to paint this beautiful piece of furniture."

Still, there was no point in investing in more furniture when what Lara already had was so functional and well-made. "She used to hate this armoire," says Mary. "The shelves were so dark she could never see her clothing properly. Now it's light and airy, and I have to say it came out beautiful."

A ceiling medallion painted in violet highlights the new modern track light and finishes off the space. "Now her entire room looks like a jewel box," says Mary.

No pictures yet adorn Lara's walls since she is taking her time with what she wants. "The big decisions have been made," says Mary. "The small decorating details are up to her, and I expect they will keep changing over the years. But I've learned that change is good."



The four-poster bed once dominated the "little girl" bedroom.

The "teenage" room is now light and airy and feels spacious.

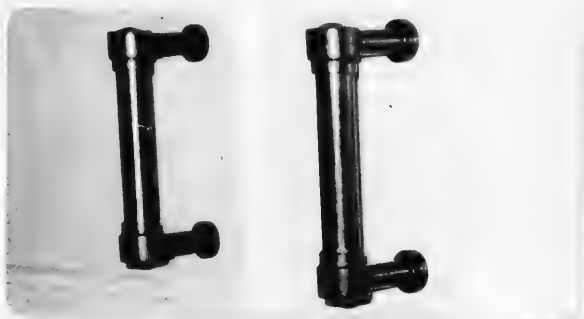
New look with kitchen handles and knobs



Wrought iron cabinet pulls provide a good, comfortable grip and unique look for kitchen cabinets. [Anita Szabadi-Gottesman photos]

Anita Szabadi-Gottesman
Special to The CJN

To freshen up a kitchen that is looking tired, an effective solution is changing the hardware on kitchen cabinets and drawers. Choosing new handles or knobs ensures an inexpensive facelift that will provide a completely updated look for any style of kitchen. Standard round metal pulls have been replaced by a vast selection available in an assortment of handles and pulls.

The first step is to measure the spacing of the existing knobs. Ideally finding knobs or handles that fit the existing holes in the cabinets is the way to proceed. If however you have fallen in love with a particular handle or pull that does not exactly fit the existing dimensions, a little wood filler will do the trick. Once dry, new holes can be drilled to accommodate the handle choice.

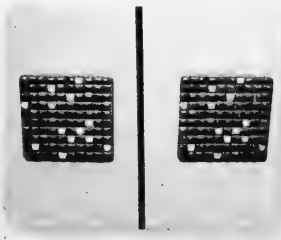
The selection of handles available today is overwhelming. They come in bronze, chrome, cast iron, glass, plastic, wood, stone, marble, porcelain and ceramic. Finishes can be high gloss, brushed, satin or hammered. Styles range from rustic to modern and sleek with Victorian and a bit of country thrown in.

A uniform look can be created by choosing all the same handles, or spice things up by mixing and matching. Finding one type of handle for cabinets can easily be complemented by a similar or contrasting look for the drawers and pantry doors. Take into consideration the handles of your appliances and mix and match with that look as well. Modern appliances have updated handles and pulls to work with today's kitchens.

While the look of the handle is important to achieve the overall effect for the room, the size of fingers and hands of the users must also be taken into account. Some pulls are very narrow and uncomfortable for a larger hand, while others do not have enough space between the cabinet and the fingers to ensure a good grip. The drawers and cabinets in the kitchen will be used multiple times daily by everyone in the home. Functionality as to size and spacing of knobs and pulls must be factored in before the final selection is made.

Big box stores always have an amazing array of choices on hand. Specialty shops are a great place to go for unique designs. Comb kitchen makeover showrooms and specialty shops to get some initial ideas then relax in the comfort of your own home and surf the web. A quick search will take you to countless websites specializing in unique kitchen hardware.

Whether putting a handle into your cart at a retail outlet or ordering online, it is best to order a sample first. Install one and see not only how it looks but how it feels in your hand. Even the most inexperienced do-it-yourselfer can replace most kitchen hardware in an afternoon.



Hammered finish wide comfortable handles create a completely new, modern look for existing kitchen cabinets.

If you can't find what you're looking for, customers can make special requests and the staff at Brooklyn Furniture will try to source it out for them. "Sometimes our best ideas come from our clients."

After your home is fully furnished, the next step is to accessorize, and give it your own special touch. A new company, Vermont Floral Design Inc. (905-761-5454), offers a unique product that will help make your home beautiful. The company takes fresh flowers and, using natural preservatives and a patented technology, turns them into floral art. The flowers are grown and preserved in Kenya, and then artists from North America and Europe turn them into different pieces that, unlike fresh flowers, last for many years.

The floral art can be used to make pieces such as lamps, tablecloths or place settings. Vermont Floral Design Inc. can also preserve floral bouquets that would normally wilt and dry out after just a few days. This means items such as bridesmaids bouquets can be saved and used as table decorations for years after the event. There are hundreds of different designs to choose from, and all of them are offered in 24 different colours.

To view products, or to make a custom order, visit the showroom located at Jane Street and Rutherford Road in Vaughan Mills shopping mall.

When Manny Y., owner of Logart Kitchens (905-709-2722, www.logart.ca), a custom kitchen company based in Thornhill, went into the custom kitchen cabinetry business in 1979, his innovative design work was well received in Israel, where he had trained in interior design.

In 1980, he presented a kitchen design at his first home show. He had money for only one display in his booth, while the larger companies were able to show several design options. Despite his limited financial resources, it was Manny who won the prize for kitchen design that year.

And today, he continues to offer his clients the same high level of design through Logart, the custom kitchen and dental cabinetry manufacturing company he founded 16 years ago.

Manny says his clients get real value, because not only are they getting high-quality custom cabinetry at affordable prices, but they are also getting his design services for free. He stresses that he is both a trained designer and a manufacturer, advising people on colour choices, how to match the counter and back splash and lighting selection.

One of the great skills, he said, is his ability to visualize a space and maximize its usage without structural changes.

He said most people opt for traditional style kitchens, but many people living south of Eglinton Avenue prefer the sleek lines of a European kitchen. "The traditional kitchen painted with glaze in an off-white or neutral is always classic," he said.

When he designs a kitchen he checks out the space and the natural light. "Not all interior designers are experienced with kitchen design," he said. "It's a real specialty. I also have a lot of years of experience as a kitchen manufacturer.

Barbecuing a year-round passion

Once a strictly summer pastime, barbecuing is now a year-round affair thanks to infrared technology and other innovations that allow backyard heroes to indulge their passion 12 months a year.

Gone are the days of waiting an eternity for the coals to heat up. Though that old-school technology is still available for the nostalgists among us, says Febian Frempong, owner of Sobie's Barbecues (416-224-2526, www.sobies.com), barbecuing is no longer synonymous with long wait times.

"With today's infrared your grill can attain maximum heat within two minutes," he grins. "You can have a restaurant-quality steak dinner ready faster than in most conventional kitchens."

This rapid attainment of peak temperature greatly facilitates searing the meat, poultry or fish to seal in the juices for maximum flavour, says Frempong.

Sobie's positions itself as a one-stop shop for barbecue enthusiasts, offering a huge selection of top brand-name barbecues, smokers, and accessories.

But it's the service, notes Frempong, that sets a barbecue vendor apart.

"We have a service department that caters for after sales service as well repair and refurbish existing barbecues."

"Many stores sell barbecues, but we pride ourselves on product knowledge and our ability to help customers determine which barbecue is right for them. If you have questions, make sure your salesperson is able to answer them."

Last new Thornhill Woods' community

Homebuyers are flocking to private previews of the last new home community in Thornhill Woods. "We're pleased," says Joe Morano of Elm Developments, creator of Baker's Lane, an enclave of 51 heritage clay, brick and stone town homes at Dufferin Street and Summeridge Drive. "We've spent a great deal of time making sure this new community is exceptional in every way."

Nestled beside a historic first-settlers site and protected green space, Baker's Lane features a nature path inside the community as well as a landscaped outdoor retreat area with seating. Homeowners will live in a setting surrounded by mature leafy trees.

Elm's architects have designed homes with distinctive architectural details, such as brick soldier coursing with keystones, arches, frieze boards, dentil trim, columns and ocular windows. The streetscapes will be stunning, says Morano. Elm brings a 25-year history of custom home building to this final phase of Baker's Lane.

Spacious three-bedroom interior designs, many offering walkouts, range from 1826 to 2106 square feet. Main-floor powder rooms, upper-level computer lofts and walk-in linen closets are among the highlights. Kitchens are luxury-sized with desks and pantries. Many open onto great rooms with walkouts. Every kitchen features an island with breakfast bar or a peninsula breakfast bar.

Generous walk-in closets are a given with every master bedroom retreat. Master ensuites feature his and her sinks, soaker tubs and separate showers.

Living close to walking-distance amenities is rare outside the city. Cyclists and walkers have the Dufferin-Summeridge shopping centre close by, as well as the North Thornhill Community Centre, with gym, pool and fitness facilities. Schools and synagogues are close at hand. Commuting is convenient with easy access to major highways and public transit. Prices start from the $470s.

To register for a private preview, call 905-771-8880 or go to www.bakers-lane.com.

Relaxing in the great outdoors

Elaine Cohen
Supplements Co-ordinator

With so many months of inclement weather, Canadians are eager to take advantage of the months from May to October, when they can take in fresh air, balmy breezes and sunshine. Whether it's a modest balcony, a stylish deck, a pretty patio, a spacious backyard or a beautifully landscaped lawn, it is home sweet home.

Therefore, it's nice to be able to take in the scenery, sip a cool drink, curl up with a book, and socialize with friends.

To take advantage of the outdoor scene, it pays to invest in some outdoor furniture. If you have to schlep bridge chairs and tables every time you go outdoors, it becomes a nuisance, especially if it starts to drizzle and everything has to be returned indoors. Eating outdoors is also a popular summer activity. Social events include family brunches, luncheons, barbecues, birthday parties and evening gatherings.

A vast selection of outdoor furniture is available and the price range is extensive. Before making a purchase, wise consumers must remember to choose furniture that suits their respective climate. Next, consider their lifestyle and the items that would increase their quality of outdoor rest and recreation. Price is another factor but even within each category of furnishings, prices vary. Here is a sampling of different types of furniture and items accessible to make the most of invigorating outdoor life.

Choose furniture for right climate

One need only study the history of teak to realize the benefits of this indestructible wood. In ancient China it was used to construct ships. After noting the durability of Chinese ships, the British emulated their formula and built strong fleets using teak wood.

Today, teak furniture is recognized for its good looks and functional benefits. It withstands water, is worm-resistant and doesn't rot; therefore, it's appropriate for outdoor use. Teak contains natural oils and silica. Moreover, it is easy to maintain because it can be washed down.

Teak comes in an extensive range of styles and collections. When exposed to sunshine, it adopts a radiant glow. Furniture sets, benches, tables, recliners and Adirondack chairs are among the popular items people buy to furnish their outdoor porches, patios and decks.

Eco-friendly reclaimed teak is produced from remnants of salvaged old teak objects that have been restructured into garden tables and chairs.

Rattan garden furniture endures rigorous outdoor weather conditions ranging from intensive sun exposure to heavy rainfall. It is strong, attractive and weatherproof, and is produced in different colours and styles. Consumers usually add comfortable cushions to the chairs and sofa suites.

Aluminum furniture is inexpensive, lightweight, strong and maintenance-free. It is resistant to fading, space and décor-friendly.

Hammocks and garden swings offer a delightful respite from daily commitments. Psychologist Evan Esar described the charm of the hammock as follows, "Hovering between heaven and earth, arriving nowhere but nevertheless being on one's way."

Iron garden furniture is durable, attractive, albeit requires maintenance and can be pricey. However, it is classy and stylish, as long as it is scraped and repainted every three years.

Stackable plastic furniture is inexpensive, washable, durable and lightweight. Colours, styles and pieces vary. Among the items are storage units, patio sets, plastic chairs and benches. Keep plastic clean and prevent mold by washing it with a soapy cloth and a small amount of bleach.

Cedar furniture is classy, durable and beautiful. Porch swings, trellises, arbours, planters, tables, chairs, recliners and rockers are among the useful items made of cedar. Consumers note cedar isn't cheap but is cost effective.

Cushions are comfortable components. Consumers are advised to look for cushions covered with fabric that resists mold in damp weather. As for wood, it should be stained with waterproof sealant to protect it. Any exposed wood on pergolas or decks should be stained.

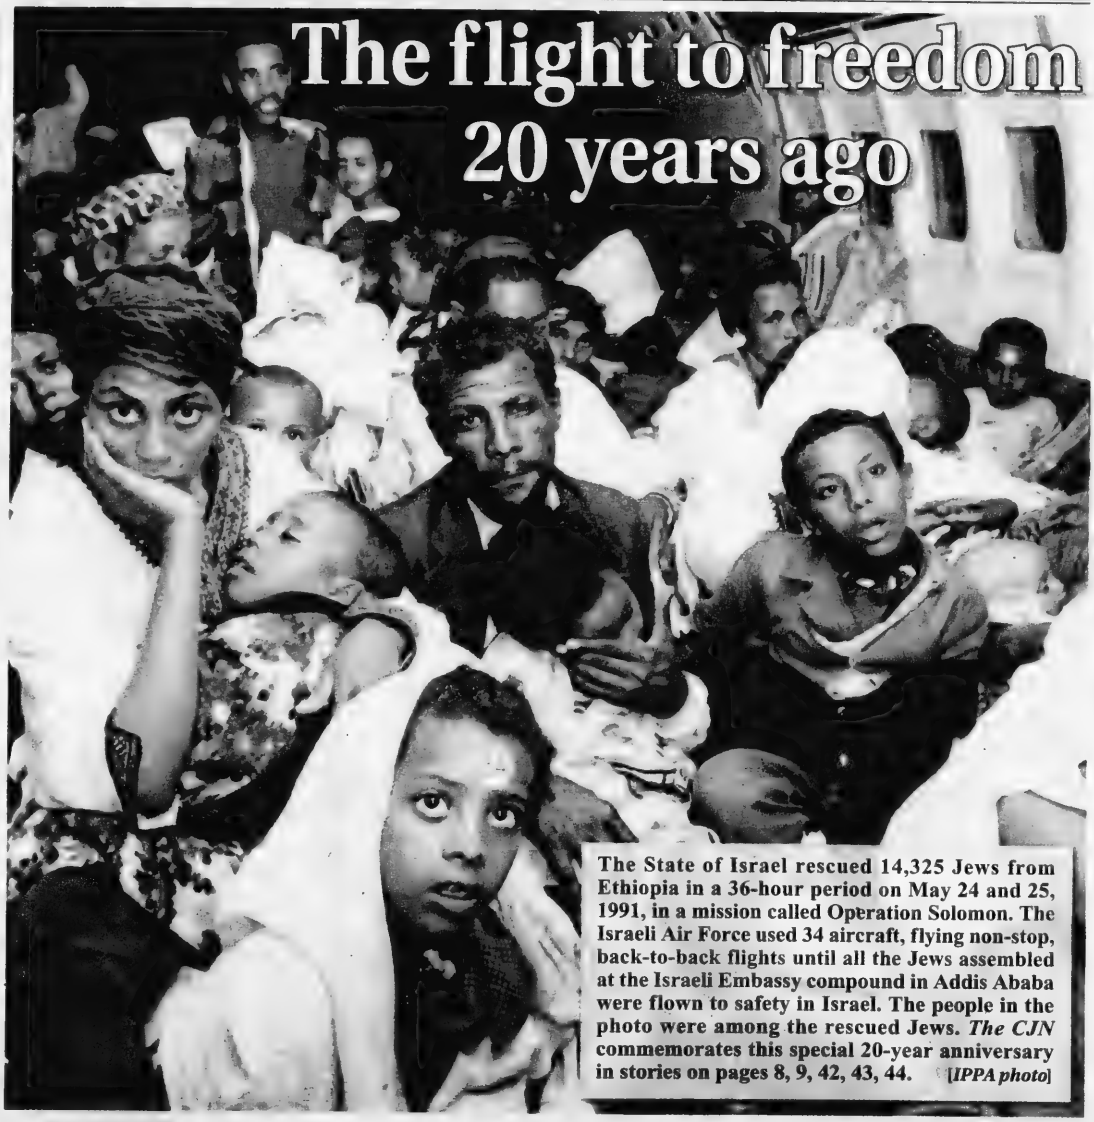
The flight to freedom 20 years ago



The State of Israel rescued 14,325 Jews from Ethiopia in a 36-hour period on May 24 and 25, 1991, in a mission called Operation Solomon. The Israeli Air Force used 34 aircraft, flying non-stop, back-to-back flights until all the Jews assembled at the Israeli Embassy compound in Addis Ababa were flown to safety in Israel. The people in the photo were among the rescued Jews. The CJN commemorates this special 20-year anniversary in stories on pages 8, 9, 42, 43, 44. [IPPA photo]

Waiting For Visa

MONTREAL — The son of a jailed Hamas leader, Mosab Hassan Yousef, who worked undercover for Israel's Shin Bet for 10 years, was still awaiting a visa last week to enter Canada. Yousef, 33, a West Bank Palestinian who lives in California, is due to give a Chabad-sponsored lecture in Montreal May 25. In an autobiography last year, he revealed he spied for Israel from 1997 to 2007. His father, Hassan Yousef, a Hamas founder, is in jail in Israel. The younger Yousef, his eldest son, was also jailed in his youth by Israel. Last June, Yousef was granted asylum in the United States, where he has lived since 2007. He'd been facing deportation because statements in his book appeared to support Hamas, a U.S.-designated terror group, until a Shin Bet official vouched for him.

Gartner Retires

TORONTO — Hana Gartner, host of TV's Fifth Estate, is retiring after 35 years with CBC, the corporation announced last week. The Prague-born Gartner, the daughter of two Czech Holocaust survivors who met after the war, had hosted the Fifth Estate since 1982. She also co-hosted CBC's flagship news show, The National, from 95 to 2000.

Educator Attacked

BUENOS AIRES — The headmaster of an Orthodox Jewish day school in Buenos Aires was attacked as he left the school. Moshe Cohen, of Heichal Hatora, was hit in the head with an iron bar May 9 as his assailant shouted "Jew, Jew." He was hospitalized with a serious head injury. The attacker was arrested. The assault occurred on the eve of Yom Ha'atzmaut. Leaders of the AMIA Jewish centre and Israel's ambassador to Argentina condemned the attack, as did the leaders of all major Argentine political parties.

Terror Plot Alleged

NEW YORK — Two men who allegedly intended to mount a terror attack in New York City, likely on a shul, were arrested May 11 after a sting operation. The men reportedly discussed attacking a synagogue, although they didn't have a specific one in mind. They reportedly attempted to buy hand grenades and guns. The alleged terrorists weren't identified, but an official told the New York Times they were "homegrown." One is believed to be of Moroccan descent and the other of North African descent. They were charged under New York State's anti-terrorism law.

Paper Apologizes For Cutting Clinton

NEW YORK — A chassidic newspaper apologized last week for removing U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton from a White House photo of officials watching the raid on Osama bin Laden.

Hillary Clinton

The Yiddish-language Der Zeitung in Brooklyn, N.Y., manipulated the photo of political leaders in the White House "situation room" watching the deadly raid May 1 on bin Laden's hideout in Pakistan. The two women in the room – Clinton and Audrey Tomason, director of counterterrorism who works with the Security Council – were digitally removed.

Media outlets noted that the White House released the photograph with a disclaimer stating that it "may not be manipulated in any way."

In an e-mail statement posted on the Washington Post's website, Der Zeitung said its photo editor had not noticed the stipulation. Along with its apology, the newspaper said it explained its policy of not printing images of women. "Because of laws of modesty, we are not allowed to publish pictures of women, and we regret if this gives an impression of disparaging to women, which is certainly never our intention. We apologize if this was seen as offensive," the newspaper said in its statement, which also noted the support that Clinton enjoyed in New York's Orthodox communities when she was elected and re-elected to the U.S. Senate.

The original photograph shows Clinton sitting at the table with the president, covering her mouth with her hand and wearing a shocked expression. Tomason is in the back, leaning forward, presumably for a better view.

Endowment fund created for Jewish studies

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Hindy Najman's vision for expanding the University of Toronto's Centre for Jewish Studies is becoming a reality with changes that have been implemented under her leadership and with the launch of two campaigns that will raise $36 million for the centre.

Last month, just before Passover, an agreement was signed between UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the university to establish a $15-million endowment fund at the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto for the U of T centre.

As well, the university is also planning to raise $18 million for the centre through its own campaign. The university's fund, which will be part of a larger campaign for the faculty of arts and science, will be used for eight new endowed faculty positions at the Centre for Jewish Studies. The faculty positions will be put in place over the next few years.

Ken Tanenbaum, a third-generation Toronto philanthropist whose family has a history of supporting Jewish education, is the driving force behind the endowment at the Jewish Foundation. His family is donating $5 million – $2 million of which will go toward the endowment, and $3 million as an immediate gift to Jewish studies, beginning in September with $1 million a year over the next three years.

At the same time, the $2-million Tanenbaum gift has kick-started a one-on-one campaign for the endowment fund, led by Tanenbaum and his father, Larry, which is expected to be completed by fall.

The $15-million fund and the Tanenbaums' $3-million gift will be used to support students financially, fund new programs for the university and the greater community, and underwrite day-to-day operations.

University president David Naylor told The CJN in an e-mail, "The University of Toronto is proud to be the home to one of the very best locations for Jewish studies research and teaching in the world. We have certainly benefited in recent years from the excellent leadership that professor Hindy Najman has provided.

"We've had clear signals that many professors and a growing number of students are deeply interested in the broad field of Jewish studies. We're also extremely encouraged that the University's Centre for Jewish Studies is drawing such strong interest and support from the community. I am personally very grateful for the leadership role that Ken and Larry Tanenbaum have been playing to move the centre forward."

Najman, who has been director of the centre for the past three years, said she could not have proceeded with her vision without the encouragement of Naylor, U of T provost Cheryl Misak and arts and science dean Meric Gertler. "They embraced my vision for Jewish studies as part of their broader vision for U of T as a university of academic excellence," Najman said.

Rhythm, soul and fire

A gathering of more than 700 elated and ready-to-party late-teen youths would, at all times, be a live-wire assembly of high-voltage electricity and stirring buzz.

Imagine then, that same number decamped on a stretch of leafy grass under a large protective canopy at the Mini Israel outdoor museum in the picturesque Ayalon Valley on the highway from Tel Aviv, just at the very edge of the hills west of Jerusalem.

The group was fidgety, playful and excited. They were the large Canadian contingent of 650 youngsters from Toronto and Montreal – and some from Panama and Australia – who were brought together to celebrate Yom Ha'atzmaut on the eve of the conclusion of their participation in March of the Living for 2011, a two-week program that takes Grade 11 students to Poland after Pesach and then to Israel.

From the editor's desk...

The 650 Canadian teens were also joined by some 30 young adults and by 39 older adults who had taken part in the March.

Anticipation coursed through the restless crowd like a spark jumping from one wire to another.

"Canada's March of the Living delegation was one of the largest of the total 8,000 marchers from around the world who took part this year," Dale Boidman, national chair of the March of the Living, proudly told The CJN.

Funded by local UJA– CJA federations, March of the Living is a department of UIA Canada.

"It is an educational experience whose primary goal is continuity through identity building," Boidman said.

She should know about educational experiences because she has been involved in Jewish education for more than two decades, and for the past three years, the dedicated, articulate Montrealer has been national chair of March of the Living.

"The goal is to take Jewish students and have them connect with Israel and with their Jewish identity," Boidman said.

The effusively enthusiastic response by the youths to the evening's program suggested that the March had achieved its goal.

When the sun dropped below the western horizon, Yom Hazikaron changed to Yom Ha'atzmaut and the program began. It had rhythm, soul and fire.

The singing of the familiar message by Rabbi Nachman, that the entire vast world is but a very narrow bridge, but the main point (of what we must try to do in our time) is not to be afraid, set hands clapping and bodies swaying.

Ernie Bloch of Toronto and Ernest Urman of Montreal, both survivors, were the soul of the program. They spoke briefly but poignantly.

When each man ascended to the podium and took the microphone to speak, the restless, stirring throng of 17-year-olds settled quickly into a deferential, respectful silence as they focused on the two beloved old men speaking to them.

The love and respect that was aimed so obviously by the youth at the old men was reciprocated with tender, touching inspiration.

"I am privileged to stand before you – you wonderful, young Jews," said Bloch.

This important expression of admiration for the youngsters was repeated by Montreal's firebrand, Rabbi Reuven Poupko. The flaming propulsion of his animated remarks provided the fire of the program.

"You are an extraordinary group of young Jews who are committed heart and soul to the Jewish people," he began. He then pointed out that the cool starlit evening ushering in the celebration of Yom Ha'atzmaut was for all of us a "magical moment of transition."

He elaborated.

"At the end of World War II, we were despairing. We were broken, we were lost. We were weak, we couldn't protect ourselves. Then, three years later, the Jewish state was declared. It was a reversal of fortune such that the world has never seen before. We went from being weak, powerless and homeless to being a proud, strong, independent people."

The consequence of being an independent people, Rabbi Poupko underlined, was that it made the Jewish people "the single most protected people on Earth." And why was that, he rhetorically asked the brazenly adoring audience? "Because, to be a Jew is to have a home."w

Jonathan Hazan, one of the young March participants from Montreal, told The CJN that "the March of the Living trip had been a really meaningful and amazing experience. I got to learn more about the Holocaust. Now, coming to Israel, I feel connected to God and to Judaism."

Hazan's unburnished testimony suggests that Boidman and the entire March of the Living infrastructure of volunteers and professionals had indeed achieved their goal "to take Jewish students and have them connect with Israel and with their Jewish identity." And that is all to the betterment of the Jewish future.

Premier plans to strengthen ties with Israel

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty, who spoke last week at the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Life as part of a political speaker series aimed at young Jewish professionals, said that part of his plan to build a stronger Ontario is to work with Israel.

McGuinty presented his plan for jobs and growth, health care, education, electricity and tax reform to about 100 people at the event organized by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Dalton McGuinty

No doubt catering to his mostly Jewish audience, McGuinty – the first speaker in a series that will also present Ontario Progressive Conservative leader Tim Hudak and New Democratic Party leader Andrea Horwath – began by acknowledging Ontario's Jewish population of more than 200,000 as a community that is committed to "shared success."

"We will do whatever it takes to secure a bright future for ourselves, our children and our grandchildren," he said.

McGuinty said his plan to build a stronger Ontario includes building more ties with Israel.

He spoke about his trade mission to Israel last year, during which he visited Jerusalem, Tel Aviv, and West Bank cities Ramallah and Bethlehem.

His meetings with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Israeli President Shimon Peres focused on the life-sciences sector.

"[It's] an industry where Israel grew from 186 companies in 1996 to over 1,000 by 2009. Thanks to its entrepreneurial spirit, Israel has fared much better than most in this economic recession. And as Ontario moves forward, I want to strengthen our partnership with the people of Israel and learn from their success," McGuinty said.

The premier moved on to education, referring to an increase in the number of graduating high school students in Ontario, promising to provide financial support for those who cannot afford university tuition fees, and committing to a plan for all Ontario schools to offer full-day kindergarten by 2014.

He said the full-day kindergarten plan has been garnering attention from countries around the world, including Israel.

"In fact, Prime Minister Netanyahu wanted to know more about it when we met. I think that's pretty flattering coming from the leader of a country that has more engineers and scientists per capita than anywhere else," he said, adding Netanyahu organized an impromptu meeting between McGuinty and Israel's education minister during the trade mission trip.

McGuinty's plan for strengthening Ontario's health-care system includes hiring 11,000 more nurses, and almost 3,000 additional doctors.

While it was reported only three years ago that up to 900,000 Ontarians were without family doctors, McGuinty said that today, 94 per cent of all Ontarians have a family doctor.

He boasted that wait times for surgeries have also been reduced.

Investing in infrastructure was also emphasized in McGuinty's plan. He said that in spite of the recession, Ontario has recently built 18 new hospitals, 400 new schools, and countless roads and bridges.

Because Ontario places a high demand on the electricity supply, retrofitting the nuclear power plants is a priority, he said.

"We're doing what needs to be done to make sure we have electricity to power our homes, our schools, our hospitals and our economy."

He said that some have claimed that they can rebuild the electricity system without increasing electricity bills.

"That's magic. I don't have magic. I just have reality and a responsibility. We need to do this work and there is a cost to it."

But he added that he hopes to offset the cost with a clean energy benefit, which would provide customers with a 10 per cent rebate on their electricity bills for the next five years.

Switching focus to the recession, McGuinty said that Ontario has fared well compared to the United States.

McGuinty also touched on the largely unpopular 13 per cent harmonized sales tax (HST) that replaced the GST and PST last year.

He said the tax reform is necessary to compete with emerging economies like China and India.

Most countries, including Israel, have taken on a value-added tax, which in Ontario is referred to as HST, he said.

"It works, it makes you stronger, it's good for the economy, and it creates more jobs."

He added that the tax makes Ontario a more attractive place to invest because the HST means that businesses will be paying less taxes overall.

Referring to Ontario's $16.7 billion deficit, McGuinty said that he will not cut services.

"Others would act recklessly in cutting taxes and public services alike. But that is not our way. I just don't believe that you can cut your way to strength. You give people what they need to succeed and that is the core of our plan," he said.

'Falasha never more'

Had the rescue of more than 14,000 Jews of Ethiopia in 1991 been delayed by even one day, it is very likely they would have been killed in the ensuing chaos and brutality of the violent overthrow by rebel forces of the harsh, Marxist regime of Mengistu Haile Mariam.

But the rescue was completed on May 25.

Rebel forces overran the country the next day.

A mere 36 hours before, in the early hours of Friday, May 24, Israel mobilized a small armada of airplanes and the courage of its air force, other specialists and volunteers to safely bring to Israel the 14,325 Jews who had bravely assembled at the Israeli embassy in Addis Ababa.

"In terms of the dangers to the rescuers and to the people being rescued, it stands out in modern history," according to Asaf Agmon, the commander of the rescue operation.

Agmon's pilots flew three-hour, non-stop, back-and-forth flights between Israel and Ethiopia. They used 21 Hercules planes, 10 Boeing 707s and three El Al jumbo jets. The seats had been removed from all the planes in order to squeeze as many people as possible into the rescue vehicles.

Two babies were born on the planes.

The 20-year anniversary of Operation Solomon attests to the humanity of the Jewish state and to the life-affirming rootedness of its people.

Not since the days of Dunkirk in World War II, under vastly different conditions, have we seen so grand a gesture of self-sacrifice and moral action. But what other state in modern times has undertaken such a rescue? There is none to have tried, let alone to have succeeded. There is, and has been, only Israel.

In this edition of The CJN, author Judie Oron quotes a Jew who had been rescued from Ethiopia some time before Operation Solomon, who poignantly and powerfully tells us what Israel did for him and his family. "The [Israeli] embassy people gave me money and food and put my children in their school. I knew that here, finally, was a nation that would love us and help us!"

The word "Falasha" was used as a nasty, derogatory epithet by Ethiopians against the Jews of their land. It meant "stranger," or "unwelcome," or even "swine."

And as the songwriters of the Boston-based musical group Safam noted and sang with such glowing inspiration after the Jews of Ethiopia arrived in Israel, they were "Falasha never more." They were and are Beta Israel, of the House of Israel.

We are all of the House of Israel.

We must all note on our calendars, and remember in our hearts, those days of rescue 20 years ago, to ensure our children and grandchildren will know of it too.

25 years ago in The CJN

Israeli prime minister Shimon Peres urged every Jewish family to have at least four children. He made the statement after a Hebrew University study predicted that by 2000, Israel and the territories would be 43 per cent non-Jewish, while the Diaspora Jewish population would fall from 9.5 million to eight million, and to six million by 2026.

Serious errors in letter

I am writing to point out a number of serious errors in the letter from Stephen Scheinberg of Canadian Friends of Peace Now ("Weak attacks on PA's negotiation stance," May 12).

• Scheinberg states that negotiations between Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and Israel "bogged down" after prime minister Ehud Olmert and foreign minister Tzippi Livni's Kadima coalition lost to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. However, Abbas walked away from the negotiating table during Operation Cast Lead, which took place in December 2008. When Netanyahu came to power after the general election on Feb. 10, the negotiations were already at a stalemate.

• Scheinberg quotes German Chancellor Angela Merkel as complaining that Netanyahu has not taken "a single step to advance peace." Yet Netanyahu was the first Israeli prime minister in history to declare a moratorium on building in the West Bank. Abbas refused to negotiate until only a month remained in the moratorium, knowing Netanyahu could not renew it. In fact, Abbas has pointed to U.S. President Barack Obama as having created this impasse, telling Newsweek that "it was Obama who suggested a full settlement freeze... We both went up that tree. After that [Obama] came down with a ladder and he removed the ladder and he said to me, jump."

• Scheinberg asserts that the Palestinians are seeing "their patrimony nibbled away." However, in all peace negotiations since 1993, Israel has offered between 93 per cent and 97 per cent of the West Bank, with land swaps to compensate. Logically therefore, the settlements take up no more than seven per cent of the West Bank. Additionally, all new construction is within existing settlement borders. Claims that there will be no land left for the Palestinians are both ridiculous and easily disproved.

Errors like these contribute to the international vilification of Israel. Why does Scheinberg perpetuate them?

Half truths and innuendo

There is an irony in Lawrence Hart's column on the demonization of Israel: he employs some of the same tactics as Israel's most vociferous critics – half truths and innuendo ("Demonization of Israel as free speech?," April 28).

In defaming Hamilton Jewish Federation and its executive director, Gerry Fisher, Hart relies on a reporter's casual condensation of a thoughtful and well-considered press release to which a collective body of individuals and national Jewish organizations embedded their footprint.

The significant phrases actually read as follows: "CJPME's (Canadians for Justice and Peace in the Middle East) objectives of demonizing Israel and supporting the intentions of the most extremist anti-Israel voices have done nothing for peace and justice in the Middle East, but they have exacerbated tensions between various communities in Hamilton. However, Hamilton Jewish Federation believes in the principal that until CJPME's message is found to be in violation of Canada's anti-hate laws, they are entitled to deliver it, free from intimidation or abuse from anyone, regardless of how dishonest and repugnant their messages may be."

Had Hart been a little more patient and more interested in assessing all the facts before engaging in such a public condemnation, he would also have learned that no less than the chief of Hamilton's police service applauded federation's measured response.

Courier visited Izbica, not Belzec

In "The Jewish Film Festival is back" (May 5), Sheldon Kirshner states that Jan Karski, a courier for the Polish government-in-exile during World War II, visited the death camp Belzec. Historically, this is not correct. While visiting the Warsaw Ghetto, Karski was asked by ghetto resistance leaders to check on a rumoured death camp. Karski found Izbica, which he thought was Belzec. He was able to penetrate Izbica and witnessed life in Izbica. Izbica was a transit camp (Durchgangslager) feeding victims to the extermination camps Belzec and Sobibor. Izbica was the waiting room for death. Belzec was a very secretive experimental extermination camp under the "Aktion Reinhardt" banner. It was Karski who later gave me the first lead for my research about my family, who perished in Belzec.

'The bird from Yerusalem'

Judie Oron

Every year at Rosh Hashanah, a small, black bird flew into the Beta Israel villages. They called it the bird from Yerusalem, because it came from the direction of their ancient homeland. Now, finally, they were following the path of that small, black bird. When a young boy asked, "Where are we going?" his father replied, "To our redemption."

On May 24 and 25, 1991, 14,325 Ethiopian Jews were airlifted to Israel in a clandestine mission, code-named Operation Solomon. When the nearly 36 hours of back-to-back flights were over, rebel armies declared an end to Ethiopia's brutal Marxist regime and entered the city where, hours before, the Jews had waited fearfully, praying to be rescued.

Against the backdrop of these dramatic events, my role in Operation Solomon was a small one. I was in Jerusalem, and the call came at 4 a.m. It was from Susan Berhani – a Jewish Agency social worker and the wife of Zimna Berhani, an Ethiopian-born Jewish Agency official and soon-to-be a future Israeli consul.

"You didn't have any plans for the weekend," Susan declared.

"Nope," I agreed.

"So, pack a bag and get over to the Diplomat Hotel. Prepare yourself for a long vacation – but leave your bathing suit at home."

My connection with the Beta Israel began in 1985, when, as director of the Jerusalem Post's charitable funds, I travelled throughout Israel, assessing and funding the community's needs. Later, I left the Post to form an informal group of professionals who assisted Ethiopian families waiting to immigrate to Israel.

My first trip to Ethiopia was at the request of one of our group, an Ethiopian Jew whom I'll call David, who had asked me to help his cousin and her family.

Sarah and Amsalu had endured hard times, David explained. Sarah was pregnant when their family left for Sudan. Days later, their guides betrayed them to government soldiers. For months, they huddled on the floor in a filthy jail cell, covering the children's ears when the sounds of torture became too strident.

Released months later and stripped of all their possessions, they arrived at a Jewish village in time for Sarah to give birth to a boy, whom she named Yalfal, which means "these hard times will pass."

Weeks later, they again set out for Sudan, and were again caught and arrested. The soldiers debated, shouldn't they execute this woman? Only a criminal would take a newborn on such a dangerous trek.

Miraculously, they were released, but now they'd have to wait until the end of the rainy season before making another attempt. Then, the rebel armies moved into the area. Fighting broke out and the way to Sudan was blocked. Two long years later, David wrote telling them to make their way to Addis Ababa. The Israeli Embassy had opened and Jews were leaving for Israel.

When I met the family in Addis in 1990, Amsalu told me, "The embassy people gave me money and food and put my children in their school. I knew that here, finally, was a nation that would love us and help us!"

I'd noticed that even though Yalfal was one of the older children, he was one of the shortest. "Yalfal became sick in jail and since then, he never grew," Sarah said, clearly worried.

Yalfal may have been small, but his smile was enormous. Despite chronic stomach pains and diarrhea, he was a cheerful kid, and a resilient one, too, as, over the next few weeks, I dragged him daily to the American Jewish Joint Distribution's medical clinic to treat his parasites.

I worried about him, and about Sarah, too, because I'd been instructed to lie to her. She'd been asking David why there were no letters from her father. In fact, he had died months before. David feared that Sarah might become suicidal if, after everything she'd been through, she learned the truth.

I'd hoped to avoid lying to Sarah, but Amsalu insisted that I keep up the pretense that her father was alive. If she believed that he was waiting for her in Israel, Amsalu said, she'd be more able to withstand the difficult conditions in Addis and the long waiting period that would surely ensue. So, I lied to Sarah and then I worried. The morning of Operation Solomon, I made my way to the Diplomat Hotel and found Susan handing out instruction sheets.

"For symbolic reasons, the first group will be sent to Jerusalem," she began her briefing. "Our first job will be to weed out the sick people who fell through the cracks at the airport. Judie, you and I will be doing that," she continued.

"We'll all make sure that everyone is fed and given a room. After that, we'll start interviewing the olim for their teudat zehut [Israeli identity papers]."

When the first bus pulled up at the hotel, we rushed outside to witness the disembarking. Despite the news blackout, throngs of Ethiopians stood waiting to see if their loved ones had arrived. I watched, captivated, as people ran, crying, into each others arms. There was no sign of Sarah and Amsalu, so I dashed back into the building and joined Susan, who was handing a patient over to a waiting medical team for evacuation to a local hospital.

"Sorry for the delay," I mumbled, embarrassed.

She grinned and bent to interview an old lady who was lying on the floor.

I got out my clipboard and began interviewing a pregnant woman who lay spread-eagled on a sofa. After giving me some vital statistics, she winced and began to moan loudly, gripping her stomach. My Amharic was definitely inadequate for this situation and there wasn't a translator in sight. I looked around and was relieved to finally spot a familiar face from Addis. We got the requisite information on the form and ushered the woman to a waiting ambulance.

About an hour later, we began handing out room keys. A hotel employee accosted me, complaining that the children had discovered the elevators and were riding them up and down, getting lost and holding things up. It was now midnight and, after dispatching one of the translators to sort out the children, we started herding people into the dining room for supper.

Just before dawn, I fell asleep on the floor of the hotel lobby. I woke up when a booted foot nudged me awake.

"Hey, Judie! Isn't this something?" Eli Amir, author and Aliyat Hanoar (Youth Aliyah) head, was grinning down at me.

I sat up and looked around. Tables had been set up, and a few families had lined up in front of them, waiting patiently for their tachkir aliyah (interview for their identity papers). Zimna had flown in on the last plane from Addis. "Written records were rarely kept in Ethiopian villages," he said. "Some olim won't know their date of birth. We'll have to use our common sense, because these dates will determine what grade a child will enter or when an adult will receive a pension."

"This is going to take a while," Susan said grimly. "Can you stay on, possibly for a few weeks?"

"No problem," I answered.

I was assigned to work with Zaudie, a young soldier who had an outgoing personality and, as I was to learn over the next few weeks, a good head in difficult situations.

"Kuchavaloo, [sit down]," I motioned to the first family, a young couple with a small child and an infant.

The man shook my hand and bowed, saying, "Thank God and the Israeli government for bringing us to our homeland!"

"It's a small family. It shouldn't be too complicated," I said hopefully, peering at the registration form.

The woman bared her breast and began nursing the baby. Zaudie laughed at my surprised expression, grabbed a hunk of Play Dough from a neighbouring table and, working rapidly, began to form a beautiful horse. The baby's eyes grew enormous as he watched Zaudie turn the horse into a frog. We got through the family's names and places of birth. I asked the father for his date of birth. He shrugged.

"Were you born before or after Mengistu overthrew the negist [the emperor] Haile Selassie?" I asked.

"After," he replied.

While I counted backward from 1974, Zaudie snorted and then wrote 17 for the man's age. He quickly filled out the rest of the family's ages. It all looked about right to me, so I signed the form under the appropriate box, delighted to be done with our first interview.

The weeks following the operation were exhausting. Each family interview was like an archeological dig, requiring much patience and concentration. I took some time each day to check if Sarah and Amsalu had arrived. David reported that they were living in a hotel in Tiberias. Sarah had been informed of her father's death and was taking it hard. Two months later, I borrowed a translator and headed north.

Sarah's eyes were swollen and she was thinner than she'd been in Addis. She hugged and kissed me and then began to wail loudly. As I struggled to calm her, I caught sight of Yalfal and nearly dropped Sarah onto the floor.

"Yalfal! You are so tall!" I shrieked, startling Sarah out of her wailing.

By the time I left, her mood had lifted and she was boasting about how she'd managed to fatten her son despite the strange food coming from the hotel kitchens.

Days later, I asked David what it had been like for him in Addis.

"Judie, we owned that airport!" he grinned. "My friend was manning the radios. He kept broadcasting, 'Do not approach the airport! The Israelis are taking the poor, miserable Falashas to their country and we have permitted this. They'll be finished soon and then we will capture the airport. Repeat, the Israelis are flying the poor, miserable Falashas.' I looked around me and thought, 'How far I've come from that terrified boy who left Ethiopia for Yerusalem!'" he said proudly.

Judie Oron is the author of the award-winning novel, Cry of the Giraffe. Oron will host an event at the Kensington Place Retirement Residence May 24 at 6:30 p.m. commemorating the 20th anniversary of Operation Solomon. RSVP to Lisa, 416-636-9555.

Mulcair the mensch

As Liberals reel from their stunning electoral defeat and Conservatives rejoice, Israel's supporters in Canada can find reassurance in two important outcomes from the recent federal election.

First, the re-election of Prime Minister Stephen Harper is sweet vindication. Harper has been a steadfast friend of Israel, defending and embodying the democratic values uniting Israel and Canada. Claims that Harper and his party would suffer at the polls for befriending the Jewish state proved as empty as the charge that Canada was not elected to the UN Security Council as punishment for voting for Israel.

Gill Troy

in Montreal

The second piece of good news is that, as the NDP gets used to becoming the loyal opposition, the NDP deputy leader and designated coach for its unseasoned rookie MPs is Thomas Mulcair, a thoughtful, reasonable progressive who refuses to join the pile-on against Israel.

I had the privilege of hearing Mulcair address the Ottawa Conference on Combating Antisemitism last fall. Amid a tsunami of speeches, Mulcair's stood out. It was short, elegant, eloquent and effective. Although I will only quote from a CBC blog description because the conference was under Chatham House Rule, Mulcair impressed me in three ways.

First, he struck me as someone who believes in democracy and the rule of law, refusing to sacrifice core ideals to follow one trend or another. Second, he was embarrassed, as a member of the McGill community, having graduated from McGill Law School, that McGill hosts Israeli Apartheid Week. His indignation reflected an awareness that those who claim to be "only" anti-Zionist are usually antisemitic, too, as well as a deep commitment to preserving universities as safe, open, tolerant places for thinking students.

Third, he described an ugly moment in an anti-Israel demonstration when protesters wanted to attack a Jewish-owned business. This move reflected what he called the "any Jew will do" mob mentality of picking on all Jews because of a disagreement with some Israeli policy – demonstrating the underlying antisemitism perverting so much of the anti-Israel movement.

A year earlier, when a local synagogue was defaced with swastikas in his riding, Mulcair again stood tall. He declared the act of hatred "particularly disgusting in the case of a congregation that includes several Holocaust survivors." He quoted Martin Luther King's teaching that "he who passively accepts evil is as much involved in it as he who helps to perpetrate it. He who accepts evil without protesting against it is really co-operating with it."

And in that spirit, when his NDP colleague and fellow deputy leader Libby Davies supported the anti-Israel boycott movement, Mulcair confronted her swiftly and directly. Davies is a long-time critic of Israel who mocks Canada's "so-called friendship with Israel." She has no problem speaking at a rally whose chants call for another intifadah or being photographed at that rally in front of a poster making the false comparison between Israel and South African apartheid.

"No member of our caucus, whatever other title they have, is allowed to invent their own policy," Mulcair proclaimed when Davies endorsed boycotts. "We take decisions together, parties formulate policies together, and to say that you're personally in favour of boycott, divestment and sanctions for the only democracy in the Middle East is, as far as I'm concerned, grossly unacceptable."

I have no idea where Mulcair stands regarding Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu or Israel's ultimate borders, and I don't care. We need a broad pro-Israel coalition that fights blatant antisemitism and the antisemitism masquerading as "only" anti-Zionism.

We need a broad pro-Israel coalition uniting people from left to right who defend Israel's right to exist and fight the demonization of Israel and Zionism. We need a broad pro-Israel coalition standing for core democratic rights and the understanding that Israel is the only democracy in the Middle East, the only stable country following rule of law, the only steady source of civil liberties for Arabs and Jews, and the Mideast's only true friend to Canada.

And we need to honour steadfast friends such as Mulcair, hoping that as he coaches his young, newly elected NDP MPs, he points out some of the hypocritical trends that some fellow progressives succumb to, while reminding them of the enduring liberal rights and democratic ideals that make Canada and Israel among the few functioning democracies in the world – whatever mistakes they may make, whatever imperfections they may have.

Mi casa es su casa

Once in a long while, a rabbi has an experience so profound, so exhilarating, so close to why they feel "called" to the rabbinate that it makes him or her stop in their tracks and say, "If this was the last rabbinic thing I ever did, I would be happy." At the end of a Shabbat service and dinner in Guatemala with Casa Hillel, I felt just that.

While there are organized denominational synagogues in Guatemala City of both Ashkenazi and Sephardi background, it was the small group of native Guatemalan Jews that my recent "voluntour" participants were most interested in meeting. This newspaper has recently run articles on the Jewish population of Guatemala and noted that members of this small chavurah, known as Casa Hillel, remain "outsiders" to the larger mainstream communities. The truth is, Casa Hillel has been marginalized by the mostly white, mostly upper class and mostly traditional synagogues who won't recognize these working-class, brown, Reform-converted folks who feel more zeal and dedication to their Judaism than so many Jews who have been born into it.

The Casa Hillel community is an amazing group from Guatemala, Colombia and Nicaragua – Spanish-speaking folks who, to put it simply, fell in love with Judaism. Some of them trace their roots through the Marranos of the Spanish Inquisition, secret Jews whose descendants are only now discovering their Jewish identities. Others fled from the strong evangelical presence in Guatemala to find a new spiritual home. Some are children of intermarriage who now as adults want to identify fully as Jews. None of them converted for marriage. Most of them are couples who converted together, along with their young children.

We brought them tallitot and their first netilat yadayim cup. They gave us Mayan tea and shared their challot, which they'd made with flour milled especially for them by one of their members. They'd never been visited by a Jewish group before. Few Jewish tourists spend Shabbat with them. And I was only the second rabbi to "officially" visit and lead services and give a dvar Torah, the first being the Spanish-speaking rabbi who converted them.

I closed my eyes while we all sang a Sephardi tune to Lecha Dodi. The room felt palpably like the Divine Presence had rested upon it. The sound of Spanish accents mingled with our Toronto tunes. Two of our group had yahrzeits and said Kaddish, to which the group responded with the most heartfelt amen I've heard in a long time. We spontaneously formed a circle and danced together.

Later at dinner, one by one, Casa Hillel members stood up and told stories of how passionately they wanted to practise Judaism, even at the cost of alienating their Christian families of origin, and even at the cost of the antisemitism many of them now experience. They told us how they would never turn back, no matter what, and how Judaism was now the central defining factor of their lives and would always be.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

in Toronto

We Jews have not yet lost our fear and suspicion of the convert. How wrong we are. If only we could admit that a convert who adores Judaism makes us embarrassed at how tired, bored, ignorant and jaded our own Jewish lives so often are.

The highlight: the seven Casa Hillel kids, ranging from 11 to 18 years old, approached me with much enthusiasm and excitement. Now that they have met us, they're so inspired, they said. They want very much to learn more, to meet other Jewish kids who will accept them as Jewish. I asked them to stay strong in the meantime and stay focused on practising Judaism. "You don't have to worry, rabbi!" they said. "Why not?" I asked. "Because we love being Jewish. It's the most important thing in the world to us." Right there and then, wondering how many North American 15-year-old Jewish kids would so freely say that, I made them a promise I intend to keep: I will bring them this summer to a Jewish summer camp where they can "live" Judaism daily. It will be a powerful jumpstart for them.

Gracias Casa Hillel, for reminding us that we daily take for granted what for you is a passion, and what for us should be.

A new impediment to peace

Like a bolt out of the blue, the Fatah-Hamas reconciliation agreement, secretly brokered by the new government in Egypt last month, took Israel by surprise. Having watched the implosion of a series of Palestinian attempts to forge unity, Israel assumed that the Palestinians would remain hopelessly divided. Israel was shocked and angered when the rival Palestinian factions finally signed an accord. The Palestinians were influenced by protesters calling for unity, revolts in the Arab world and the collapse of peace talks with the Israeli government last September. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, after warning the Palestinian Authority to choose between "peace with Israel [or] peace with Hamas," suspended the transfer of almost $90 million worth of tax revenues to the PA.

With this pact in hand, the Palestinians, after a period of sustained acrimony, stand on the cusp of forming their second unity government in five years.

Denounced by Netanyahu as "a great victory for terrorism" but hailed by PA President Mahmoud Abbas as the end of a "black" chapter in Palestinian history, the pact is still largely a work in progress, with key details yet to be ironed out, as Abbas said last week.

Mahmoud Abbas

Given their tactical and strategic differences, the Fatah-Hamas agreement may yet blow up, suggested the outgoing director of the Israel Security Agency, Yuval Diskin, who retired on May 15. Claiming that the chances for "real reconciliation" between the rivals were "slim," Diskin noted that the agreement, while creating "a facade of unity," has yet to be implemented on the ground. Considering the fragmented nature of Palestinian politics, Diskin's analysis may be prescient.

Perpetually riven by intrigue and dissension, the Palestinian political scene was thrown into disarray in January 2006 when Hamas, in an astonishing upset, defeated Fatah in legislative elections. Prodded by Saudi Arabia and encouraged by Egypt, Fatah and Hamas negotiated the Mecca accord and formed a coalition government. Fatah continued to govern the West Bank, partially occupied by Israel, while Hamas administered the Gaza Strip, which Israel unilaterally evacuated in the summer of 2005.

Sheldon Kirshner

in Toronto

Fatah's partnership with Hamas was short-lived, collapsing in a welter of violence in 2007 as Hamas staged a coup and ejected Fatah forces from Gaza.

Even if this mini civil war had not occurred, Fatah's union with Hamas seemed doomed. While Fatah, a secular organization dependent on western aid, embraced a two-state solution based on the pre-1967 armistice lines, Hamas, an Islamic fundamentalist group backed politically, financially and militarily by Iran and Syria, remained steadfastly committed to Israel's destruction.

In accordance with its national charter, Hamas, branded as a terrorist group by the United States, Canada and other western nations, rejected the Quartet's conditions for recognition.

The Quartet – the United States, the United Nations, the European Union and Russia – demanded that Hamas recognize Israel, renounce terrorism and accept all agreements previously entered into by Israel and the Palestinian Authority.

With Hamas refusing to budge from its recalcitrant position, the Quartet boycotted Hamas and Israel refused to deal with the Palestinian coalition government.

Now that Fatah and Hamas appear to have reconciled, we appear to be back to square one.

The Fatah/Hamas agreement is clear on only two points.

A new interim government, made up of independent technocrats from both sides, will be created. Parliamentary and presidential elections will take place within a year.

In the meantime, Fatah and Hamas will continue to rule the West Bank and Gaza respectively.

In essence, the agreement is long on rhetoric and short on answers.

First and foremost, observers wonder who will be chosen as the prime minister of a united Palestinian government. The Fatah representative who negotiated the accord, Azzam al-Ahmad, has said that Salam Fayyad, the current prime minister of the West Bank autonomous areas, will not serve in the transitional government. Who will replace Fayyad? Certainly not Ismail Haniyeh, the current prime minister of the Hamas regime in Gaza.

Negotiators will have to grapple with a host of other unresolved issues, the most important of which is whether Fatah and Hamas will merge their police forces.

Khaled Meshal

At present, Israel and the Palestinian Authority engage in security co-operation, which has helped keep terrorism in check. But if Fatah and Hamas amalgamate their forces, Israel will most likely cancel its arrangements with Fatah.

Another unanswered question concerns the future membership of the Palestine Liberation Organization, a major decision-making body.

Until now, Hamas has been excluded from the PLO. But if Fatah allows Hamas to join the PLO, the Palestinian leadership will surely undergo drastic change, with immense ramifications on the Arab-Israeli peace process, such as it is.

The two sides will also have to discuss how best to confront Israel should there be no peace talks in the near future

Hamas, meanwhile, remains extreme and uncompromising in its outlook.

"The presence of the Zionist entity on our land is illegal, and it is impossible to recognize it," said Haniyeh recently. "We will not recognize Israel," declared Mahmoud al-Zahar, a leading Hamas figure. "That matter is settled."

The Hamas official who signed the unity agreement, Khaled Meshal – the object of an Israeli assassination attempt in the 1990s – has spelled out his objectives.

As he put it, "Our aim is to establish a free and completely sovereign Palestinian state on the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, whose capital is Jerusalem, without any [Jewish] settlers, without giving up a single inch of land and without giving up on the right of return [of Palestinian refugees]."

In separate comments, he refused to disavow violence or to pledge that a peace treaty would mean the end to all Palestinian claims on Israel. On May 10, he imposed a one-year deadline on Israeli recognition of a Palestinian state.

Last week, in an effort to allay fears that Hamas' inclusion in a Palestinian government would undermine the prospects for peace, Abbas reiterated his opposition to terrorism and violence and asserted that he will be responsible for handling peace talks with Israel.

Peace negotiations broke down last autumn after Israel refused to renew the partial settlement moratorium in the West Bank.

In its present form, the Fatah-Hamas agreement looms like another obstacle in the search for peace.

For 20 years the boys at Romspen have been good to us, managing our mortgage investments like they are their own. Consistent, solid returns month after month, year after year. Both our investment and RRSP accounts have grown so we will be able to retire in comfort. We can't be more grateful.

Like most long-term Romspen investors, we have brought our friends, family, partners and clients into the Romspen Fund. But most satisfying is that our father, 95-year old Moses, is getting monthly interest on his hard earned savings that allows him to live in a beautiful environment like Kensington Place. L'chaim.

Community brings Israel closer to home

Laura Fixman
Intern

Rabbi Stewart Weiss and his wife, Susie, brought the realities of living in Israel closer to home at the community-wide commemoration of Yom Hazikaron and celebration of Yom Ha'atzmaut last week.

There was a full house for the program at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto (BAYT) May 9, where other speakers included the consul general of Israel, Amir Gissin, and Thornhill member of Parliament Peter Kent.

Susie Weiss focused on Yom Hazikaron, Israel Memorial Day, when she spoke about her oldest son, Sgt. Ari Weiss, who was serving in the Israel Defence Forces and was killed during a raid on Hamas headquarters in September 2002.

She spoke with Ari every day when he was in the army and sent him packages of food. After he was killed, she could never have imagined that she would be speaking about his life to people around the world, she said.

"I didn't then realize how much a part of our lives Ari still would be."

The rabbi spoke during the Yom Ha'atzmaut, Israel Independence Day portion of the program, describing his pride at living in Israel, which remained unchanged after his son was killed.

"I don't think that it has radically changed my opinion," he said. "We always understood that living in Israel included a certain amount of risk."

This was the first time in 20 years that the couple have left Israel during Yom Hazikaron, Rabbi Weiss said in an interview before the program. When they were asked to come, it was the respect they feel for the Toronto Jewish community that made them decide to say yes.

A table was set up to honour the memory of the Fogel family at the community program at the BAYT.

"I think the Toronto Jewish community is very supportive of Israel," he said.

The event also honoured the memory of two non-Israelis.

Chezi Goldberg, a Canadian victim of terrorism who was killed in a bus bombing in Jerusalem, was remembered when members of his family lowered the Israeli flag to half-mast.

"We wanted to highlight that victims of terror could be people next door to us," event chair Jack Samuels said. "We thought the impact would be more profound."

Torontonian Robert Eisen who left university in 1948 to join the Machal Brigade, volunteer fighters from the Diaspora, in Israel's War of Independence was also remembered for his contribution in support of the Jewish state. Eisen has since died and was represented at the BAYT by family members.

Rabbi Weiss and his wife have shared their story all over the world, including in the United States, South America and Australia. The rabbi said they would consider going anywhere that had a Jewish community willing to invite them.

He also spoke of the difference between reading things about Israel, and learning from personal experience. He said he feels lucky to have the opportunity to strengthen a community's commitment to Israel, simply by sharing his story.

"It's different being with someone who's gone through the experience," Rabbi Weiss said. "People are very respectful."

During the program, there were musical presentations by the Or Chaim choir and by girls from Bnei Akiva of Toronto.

The event also included a display of memorial posters and signs, which guests could view before or after the program.

The rebbetzin concluded her speech by thanking people around the world for what they've done in Ari's memory. She spoke of people they'd never met writing songs about Ari or making paintings of him. She spoke of people who offered her food, their favourite coffees and even cleaning services. Before her son was killed, she assumed that people in her situation would have wanted to be left alone, but she was grateful for what people gave her.

"Somehow they knew that was just what I needed," Susie Weiss told the audience.

While in Toronto, Rabbi Weiss and his wife spoke at other locations, where they were able to add an interactive portion and allow questions.

To date, 13 children have been named for Ari Weiss, including the family's first grandson, Ari Yehoshua Weiss.

Go ahead: make your day!

Rabbi Michael Skobac

On the second night of Passover, we're commanded to begin counting the days that will ultimately conclude with the holiday of Shavuot, which marks the day we received the Torah on Mount Sinai more than 3,300 years ago. "You are to count seven complete weeks...until the day after the seventh week, when there will be a total of 50 days" (Leviticus 23:15-16).

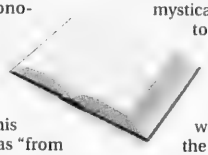
This counting is referred to as Sfirat haOmer – the counting of the Omer. The Omer was a measure of barley (about half a gallon) that was brought as a special offering to the Holy Temple on the second day of Passover that permitted the consumption of the new grain crop.

The purpose of this counting is reflected in the two different formulations of how the counting is actually expressed. Some have the custom of counting the number of days "la'Omer" (to the omer) while others use the expression of "ba'Omer (in the omer).

Counting "to the Omer" expresses the idea of anticipation. After being freed from a brutal Egyptian slavery, we excitedly looked forward to the day when we would rendezvous with the Almighty at Mount Sinai and counted the days.

Counting "ba'Omer" – in the omer – expresses the idea that these are days of preparation for receiving the Torah. Each day is focused on looking inward to work on correcting character flaws and growing spiritually. And of course, some people's practice is to use both forms of counting to focus on anticipation as well as preparation.

In the book of Deuteronomy, the starting time for this 49-day counting is given as "from when the sickle is first put to the standing crop." This agricultural association reinforces the idea that the days of counting are for the purpose of spiritual growth. According to the Maharal, the reason that the essential biblical word for humans, adam, is related to the word for earth (adamah) is that both have the possibility and potential for growth. What develops from both is entirely dependent upon the effort dedicated toward that goal.



Rabbinic Reflections

According to the Baal Shem Tov, this was the meaning of the unusual description of man's creation. "Let us make man" was God addressing each person who will ever exist and expressing the reality that humans could not be created unilaterally like all other creations. God can give us a body and soul, but who we become is ultimately a function of what we do with these raw ingredients.

Sfirat haOmer is, according to mystical teachings, an allusion to the work of purifying and elevating ourselves beyond the superficial materialism and physicality of this world. Sfirah is related to the word safir – sapphire – emblematic of polished brilliance. Omer is related to the word chomer, which means material (the initial Hebrew letters are both gutturals and therefore interchangeable). The focus of these weeks is to polish and refine our baser material side in preparation for receiving the Torah anew.

Rabbi Michael Skobac is director of education and counselling at Jews for Judaism.

Lessons of the Omer

Before Passover ends – in fact, when it has barely begun – we begin counting the weeks and days of the Omer. This is the period between the second day of Passover and the holiday of Shavuot. There is much Jewish literature, ancient and modern, that discusses the meaning of the Omer and how we observe it. In Judaism today, the Omer is observed as a time of semi-mourning. Traditionally no weddings can be booked during this time, and we refrain from public celebrations. But if the Omer overlaps with the holiday of Passover, one would expect a connection of theme as well as calendar.

Midrashic Moments

Rachel Turkienicz

Among the messages of Passover is the message of seizing the opportunity. With the beginning of the narrative, a young girl, Miriam, seizes the opportunity to speak with the daughter of Pharaoh and saves her brother, Moses. She likewise seizes the moment to unite Moses with their mother to be nursed. Moses seizes the opportunity to defend a Jewish slave and the Jewish people leave Egypt as quickly possible during the 10th plague, because they recognize the opportunity to put an end to that era.

Yet in order to seize an opportunity, one must first recognize it as such. We often miss those moments in our lives when a grand opportunity can emerge. We go through our days with an attitude of "same old, same old," not noticing how many life-changing moments have gone by.

One of the reasons for the Omer is the idea of missing a crucial moment. The Talmud informs us that a plague hit the students of Rabbi Akiva and they perished by the tens of thousands during the time of the Omer. The plague only ceased on Lag b'Omer. Yet as tragic as this event is, the tragedies of Jewish history since then have been equally tragic, if not more so. We don't assign weeks of mourning for any other tragedy in our history.

It's also not a coincidence that the students belonged to Rabbi Akiva, the one sage who backed the Bar Kochba revolt. Not only did Rabbi Akiva back the revolt against the Romans, but he also declared that Bar Kochba was the messiah and that everyone must back him. In other words, Rabbi Akiva was begging his generation not to miss this opportunity to back this budding messiah. Ultimately, Rabbi Akiva failed, Bar Kochba failed and Jewish history continued unchanged.

Throughout his lifetime, Rabbi Akiva never recanted. As far as he was concerned, Bar Kochba wasn't a false messiah but a failed messiah. The Jewish people had failed him.

Pesach teaches us what our destiny could look like when we seize the opportunity to change. We are redeemed from slavery and head toward revelation at Sinai. The Omer shows us what happens when we fail to recognize an opportunity that might change the world. It's a tragedy that should be mourned by all.

When the Talmud asks why Rabbi Akiva's students died, it answers that they were punished because "they did not show proper respect to one another."

It seems like such a small transgression. Yet try to count how many times in every day that each of us has the opportunity to show respect to someone and we let that moment go by.

Dura Europos: jewel in the desert

When one thinks of the ideal archeological site, visions of windswept ruins in the middle of the desert come to mind. However, this is rarely the case when looking at most archeological remains. An archeological site is an ancient habitation where the amenities of life must be present. Foremost among these is plenty of water. But then there are always exceptions to every rule.

In addition to the fabled oasis of Jerichom, there is the site of Dura Europos, which fits the romantic vision of what an archeological ruin should look like. Its discovery even fits the mould of how most people think that a site is discovered – at least according to Hollywood.

Dura Europos was found by a British military expedition in the Syrian desert, where it abuts dramatically beside the Euphrates River. The British were in the process of digging defensive trenches against hostile Arabs when they made a spectacular discovery. It happened in 1921 at the beginning of the Mandate period, when Britain and France were given control of Iraq, Syria and Palestine by a fledgling League of Nations.

One wonders what a British military was doing inside the French Mandate of Syria. However, according to another view, the site was discovered by French troops involved in doing amateur archeology around their campsite. Ultimately, when the boundary of the Mandates was confirmed, Dura fell under French control.

A survey of the site was conducted by the legendary James Henry Breasted, founder of the renowned Oriental Institute at the University of Chicago. (Fortunately, Breasted was good friends with industrialist and philanthropist John D. Rockefeller, who had put up the money for the Oriental Institute, which would shortly be responsible for the massive excavations at the legendary site of Megiddo. Megiddo was located at the time in the British Mandate of Palestine.)

Past Forward

Alex Gropper

What made Dura so fascinating was the fact that it was almost perfectly preserved. It was a virtual time capsule of life on Rome's eastern frontier in the third century CE. The excavators found some amazing material, which continues to captivate the imagination of scholars and lay people alike. There were all sorts of documents, including part of the legendary Diatessaron of Tatian, the earliest of the synoptic Christian gospels. For scholars, these are the greatest treasures of all.

For Jews, a truly remarkable find was a very well-preserved synagogue dating to the latter part of the second century CE. This is one of the earliest and best-preserved synagogues from the Diaspora. Even more amazing is the fact that it contained some exceptionally well-preserved paintings.

Ultimately, Dura Europos has helped to give us insights into the development of Diaspora Judaism during the crucial period just after the community had been devastated by the two revolts against Rome, the first ending with the destruction of the Second Temple and Masada, and the second one with the death of its charismatic leader, Simon Bar Kochba, in 135 CE.

Other Shavuot dishes

Unlike other holidays in the Jewish calendar, only one festival, Shavuot, has become synonymous with dairy foods. [http://bit.ly/shav11] And not to just any dairy foods but those ubiquitous blintzes and cheesecakes. Today, however, we're going to look at some other marvellous traditional and contemporary Shavuot dairy dishes.

Start by enjoying Sephardi fare such as Les Fila au Fromage, small cheese triangles. "These ever-so-light little pies... were always among the most popular items on the buffet and tea tables of Oriental Jews," writes Claudia Roden. She recommends filling them with Edam, Gouda, cheddar, cottage cheese and butter. The milk pudding is "the all-purpose dessert of the dairy table and the traditional sweet of Shavuot and Purim." It calls for rice flour, cold milk, sugar and an assortment of flavourings and garnishes. [http://bit.ly/shav12]

For something non-traditional, Israeli food writer Daniel Rogov consulted with three Israeli chefs who created entrées based on the ingredients of the Mediterranean: Eggplant and Vegetable Tart with Bulgarian Cheese, Cheese-filled Ravioli with Tomato Sauce and Tart of Mushrooms and Goat's Cheese. [http://bit.ly/shav13]

• In North Africa, matzah left over from Passover was shredded into bowls of milk and honey as a reminder that Shavuot is the culmination of the Exodus from Egypt.

• The special dish for the Jews of Kurdistan was ground wheat cooked in sour milk with dumplings of butter and flour.

• And then there is the Sephardi seven-layer cake called Siete Cielos (Seven Heavens), symbolic of the traditional seven celestial spheres God traversed to present the Torah to Moses on Mount Sinai. [http://bit.ly/shav18]

Young Poles seek to grasp wartime antisemitism

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

A "significant number" of young people in Poland today can't understand why Poles generally stood by indifferently as Polish Jews were murdered by the Nazis during the Holocaust, a Polish scholar said last week.

Andrzej Zbikowski – a professor of history at the University of Warsaw, a researcher at the Jewish Historical Institute and an associate of the Polish Center for Holocaust Research – made this comment at the conclusion of a lecture on Polish-Jewish relations in World War II.

But in the course of his speech at the University of Toronto, Zbikowski, a specialist in Polish Jewish history, provided the answers to his rhetorical question.

Andrzej Zbikowski

As he starkly observed, antisemitism in German-occupied Poland did not diminish, while stereotypes about the affinity of Jews with Communism were prevalent in Polish society and the underground press in Poland portrayed Polish Jews as "the other."

Relations were strained as Polish people 'grabbed' as much Jewish property as they could

Although the London-based Polish government-in-exile promised equal treatment for Polish Jews after the war, one of its members dissented, saying that Jews could not be permitted to resume their prewar role in the economy. His position was supported by right-wing nationalists, he observed.

Zbikowski, whose talk was sponsored by the Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation of Canada, said that Polish-Jewish relations were strained because Poles "grabbed" as much Jewish property as they could.

He suggested that Jews without means were automatically condemned, because they could not barter property for shelter and food.

By 1941, the Polish underground was aware of the anti-Jewish atrocities being committed by the Nazis. Though it did not materially help Jews, it sent reports to the Polish government-in-exile about Nazi crimes.

Only two per cent of Poles joined the underground, while up to 15 per cent read its publications, he said.

For the Polish underground, the paramount issue was the Nazi persecution of Catholic Poles, said Zbikowski, who recently published a biography of Jan Karski, the Polish courier who gave the Allies first-hand information about the brutal German occupation of Poland.

The mass deportation of Jews from the Warsaw Ghetto in 1942 prompted the Polish government-in-exile to pay greater attention to Nazi antisemitism, he said.

After much of the ghetto was liquidated, the Polish foreign minister urged his British counterpart to issue a declaration warning Germany of the consequences of its crimes, while the Polish government-in-exile published a pamphlet on the topic.

According to Zbikowski, Poles regarded the Nazi extermination of Jews as a template of what awaited them, he added.

In a sharp critique of the Home Army, the dominant Polish resistance movement, he accused it of sending far too few arms to Jewish fighters in the Warsaw Ghetto. Jews were thus forced to buy guns and bullets on the black market.

Left-wing Polish partisans accepted Jews into their ranks, but the Home Army generally did not, he noted.

Poles who helped Jews were summarily executed, and as a result, they were usually loath to take such risks, Zbikowski pointed out.

Nonetheless, more than 50,000 Jews out of a prewar Jewish population of 3.3 million survived the war in Poland. Of these, 27,000 Jews went into hiding in Warsaw, depending on Catholics for survival.

In this vein, Zbikowski reminded the audience that more than 6,000 Polish Catholics who assisted Jews have been honoured by Israel as Righteous Among the Nations.

On the other hand, some 4,000 Polish blackmailers betrayed Jews to the Nazis.

Zbikowski said that more than 1,000 books have been published on Polish-Jewish relations in wartime Poland.

Being philanthropic is not just about giving but about how you've gone about it. We've always tried to give back to my community – personally and through my business. One of the ways we chose to give back is my endowment at the Jewish Foundation, created through a life-insured annuity that will help others long after I'm gone. My hope is that my example will encourage my children to live their lives generously.

Peres' Hamas comments get distorted

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The capacity of the media to convey vital information, along, occasionally, with misinformation, is well known. But when misinformation is disseminated, the impact on audiences can be immense and difficult to correct. Just last week we witnessed a perfect illustration of this.

Under the headline, "Peres: Talks with Hamas possible," the popular Israeli news website Ynet carried a special Independence Day interview on May 9 with President Shimon Peres.

Ronen Medzini of Ynet wrote that even following the Fatah-Hamas reconciliation agreement, Peres "refuses to give up on the Palestinian-Israeli peace process." Medzini immediately noted: "Even while Hamas continues to threaten Israel with violent resistance, the president does not rule out the possibility of future negotiations with the terrorist movement."

Just as Arafat eventually became a negotiating partner by recognizing Israel and renouncing violence at the start of the Oslo process (not that he ultimately did either), so too might Hamas, Peres' comments indicate. According to Peres, Hamas could change because it has "problems" and is "not so strong."

"However," Medzini wrote, "if Hamas does not change its positions, Peres adds, it might face economic sanctions."

On May 10, the British newspaper the Daily Telegraph reported on this interview under the misleading heading, "Israeli President Shimon Peres urges government to negotiate with Hamas." What began with Ynet as Peres' willingness to consider "possible" future talks with Hamas if it changes quickly became, in the hands of this major British publication, Peres' unqualified call upon his government to negotiate with Hamas now.

Writing for the Telegraph, Adrian Blomfield focused on what he took to be Peres' progressive position: "Mr. Peres' comments broke ranks with conventional political thinking in Israel." By contrast, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu "remains categorically opposed to negotiations with Hamas, which has fired thousands of rockets at towns and cities in the south of the country in recent years." This implied that Hamas' deliberate attacks on Israeli civilians do not equally concern Peres and do not represent a fundamental roadblock to talks. Indeed, Blomfield went on: "Mr. Peres' intervention is unlikely to spur the government into talking to Hamas."

Did Blomfield even bother to read the interview he was reporting on? It's unlikely, given his distortions of Peres' actual position. Or perhaps he was determined to put his own spin on Peres' remarks, no matter what. Either way, the report was irresponsible – and it quickly spread.

The May 11 National Post ran a shortened version of the Telegraph piece under the equally misleading headline, "Israel Should Deal With Hamas: Peres." The Post piece began: "Shimon Peres, the Israeli president, has urged the government to start negotiations with Hamas in the wake of the Palestinian unity deal."

Wrong. Wrong. Wrong.

This is a prime example of how misleading, reckless spin can become established fact. And in an age when instant news and weak fact-checking have become the norm, it's all the more difficult to ensure accuracy. Let's remember that, theoretically, establishing the truth is the first and foremost responsibility of news organizations.

Shimon Peres

As far as truth is concerned, here are some basic facts. Far from being radical and outside the Israeli mainstream, Peres' comments fit within the Israeli consensus. As reported in the May 9 Jerusalem Post, Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak said that Hamas would qualify as a party to negotiations were it to accept the conditions of recognizing Israel, renouncing violence, and accepting Israel-PLO agreements. He added that if this were to happen, "Hamas would not be the Hamas we know."

But here is another fact: apart from some recent double-talk about establishing a Palestinian state within the 1967 "borders" – talk that, on the surface, sounds promising to a number of western journalists – Hamas insists that it will never recognize Israel and its right to exist. To date, Hamas remains wedded to the theology that a Jewish state on sacred Islamic soil cannot be tolerated and must disappear. It's hard to imagine a recantation any time soon.

Einat Sarouf thrills audience at fundraiser

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Making her Toronto debut, Israeli singer Einat Sarouf drew more than 200 to Kachol-Lavan's fifth annual fundraiser last week, entertaining the audience with renditions of classic Israeli songs and modern hits in Hebrew, English and Arabic.

Following a light kosher dinner, a silent auction, a few welcome speeches and a video about Kachol Lavan, Sarouf took to the stage, and within minutes, nearly the entire crowd was on their feet, singing along, clapping to the beat and dancing in their seats.

At one point, a group gathered in front of the stage and broke into a hora, while another group led a conga line between the tables in the hall.

Sarouf's playlist included hits including Ufaratzta, Adon Olam, Balbeli Oto, Frecha, Que Sera Sera, Let's Twist Again and Ach Yarab Yarab.

The energy in the hall was palpable – and when Sarouf walked between the tables to pull the last few seated audience members out of their seats to join the dance party at the foot of the stage, no one could refuse.

Sarouf herself gave into the frenzy, and at one point, climbed onto a chair in the middle of the room to dance and sing.

The event, held at the Canadian National Institute for the Blind in Toronto, raised money for Kachol Lavan's Sunday school, which offers Hebrew and Israeli studies to public school students. Now established as a solid part of Toronto's Israeli community, Kachol Lavan has begun registering students for a third campus in Thornhill Woods next September.

The event was attended by Israeli consul general to Toronto Amir Gissin and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto president and CEO Ted Sokolsky, both of whom said a few words before the concert began.

Gissin said that "Kachol Lavan is the most important project in the lives of the Israeli community in this city."

He said Israel needs to remain a place that second-generation Israelis can feel connected to and understand culturally.

"This project, after five years of struggle and effort has now become something to be very proud of and I think we all share this pride."

Sokolsky said Canadians have a special bond with Israel and he thanked Kachol Lavan for strengthening the bond between the Israeli community and the general Jewish community in Toronto.

"Your particular knowledge, your particular connection, your understanding of Israel is helping the Toronto Jewish community grow and prosper and mature as a community," Sokolsky said.

Montessori marks 10th anniversary

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

To mark its 10th anniversary this year, the Montessori Jewish Day School (MJDS) will build a sensory garden, both as a fundraiser and an educational tool for students, who will help build and maintain it. Students will help plant the garden when it opens May 31.

The garden will include flowers of different colours and fragrant herbs for students to enjoy, develop their senses, and use in practical ways.

MJDS is the only accredited Jewish Montessori school in Canada, but head of school Regina Lulka was introduced to the concept in her native Mexico City, where her now-grown daughters attended a similar school. There are also Jewish Montessori schools in the United States and in Europe.

The Montessori approach, which includes mixed-age classrooms and is based on children's natural interests, was developed more than a century ago by Italian educator and physician Maria Montessori.

Lulka, who began her affiliation with MJDS as a board member and became principal about seven years ago, recalls that MJDS held its first classes at the Winchevsky Centre, with a total of 25 students.

Housed for the past five years at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue, the school has grown to serve 108 children from nursery through Grade 7. Next year, there will also be a Grade 8 class.

Just inside the school's entrance is a wall fountain that ties in with the Montessori philosophy, Lulka said. "It reflects that the school is a serene environment."

Montessori Jewish Day School teacher Shalisa Agam works with casa (preschool) student Hannah, right, while fellow classmate Noa observes. [Frances Kraft photo]

An element of trust – in this case, counting on the students not to throw the stones at the bottom of the fountain – is part of the school's ethos too. "With trust comes respect," Lulka said, adding that Montessori students are given both freedom and responsibility.

There is no homework, and there are no tests. "Assessment is ongoing, daily, minute-to-minute assessment," Lulka said.

In Grades 7 and 8, students are taught how to study and take tests. Alumni have gone on to Jewish day schools, public schools, private schools and gifted programs, Lulka said.

In addition to subjects that are mandated by the local curriculum, Montessori students also have a "practical life" component to their studies aimed at helping them become independent. A nursery child would learn how to pour juice for Shabbat, for example, while older elementary students participate in a "going out" program instead of more conventional field trips.

Lulka explains that small groups of students choose a project and an outing that they're interested in. They plan all aspects of the trip themselves, from setting a budget to calling to arrange the outing, planning the public transit route, and enlisting an adult to accompany them.

Teachers "help them to make the right choice. We want to build in them the ability to make the right choices later in life."

Laura Fixman
Intern

The Zareinu Education Centre will hold its 14th annual Moveathon Festival and Moveathon Ride next month.

Funds raised are for the programs the centre offers – special education and individualized therapies for children with physical and developmental challenges.

The Zareinu Moveathon Festival, on Sunday, June 12, from 11 a.m. to 6 p.m., will transform Downsview Park into a centre of fun that includes food, mechanical and inflatable rides, a ferris wheel, a carousel and carnival games. There will be a 65-foot inflatable obstacle course and wagon rides.

The festival's sporting events include a two-kilometre walk, a five-kilometre and 10-kilometre run, the 20-kilometre Ell Monson Simpson Family Ride, and the 20-kilometre girls and boys bike rides. Admission to the park is free, and participants in the sporting events are asked to raise a minimum of $250.

The Zareinu Moveathon Ride for Kids with Special Needs, on Sunday, June 26, is a long-distance cycling experience of either 162.5 kilometres, 100 kilometres or 50 kilometres. The cycling route, which starts and ends at Bishop Reding Secondary School in Milton, Ont., will take experienced cyclists along the beautiful Niagara Escarpment.

There will be drink and food stops along the route, as well as professional cyclists riding along to offer their encouragement and support vans.

For riders over 18, the minimum fundraising requirement is $1,000, and for riders under 18 the minimum fundraising requirement is $500. All participants will receive a custom Louis Garneau jersey and a Zareinu Ride gift pact.

There are two pre-registration and bike inspection days for this event – on Wednesday, June 22, and Thursday, June 23, from 5 to 9 p.m., at 4630 Dufferin St., Suite 301. A bike inspection is courtesy of The Bike Depot.

Post-ride massages will be offered, as well as a barbecue at the finish line.

DeZwirek, Moore to be honoured by ORT Toronto

Compiled by CJN Staff

Peggy DeZwirek and Micki Moore are this year's honorees at the ORT Toronto's 37th annual Golden Circle Luncheon.

The luncheon, which supports ORT's work helping educate students in Canada and in Israel, will take place at the Four Seasons Hotel on June 14.

DeZwirek and Moore are being honoured for their dedication to education through the arts, business and community involvement.

Proceeds from the luncheon will go to the ORT Peggy DeZwirek and Micki Moore scholarship funds, which provide scholarships and bursaries to students in Ontario and to the ORT Schulich Canada Project in Israel, a joint project between ORT and the Israeli Ministry of Education.

The ORT Schulich Canada Project brings the highest level of educational technology into classrooms in Israel. Through the Smart Class Project, whiteboard equipment installed in classrooms allows students to interact not only with one another but also with the online community of ORT students around the world. The equipment is currently being installed in 415 classes in northern Israel, in 87 schools and 38 cities.

ORT has changed the state of the education system in Israel by providing students and educators the technology that ensures success today and into the future. What has been accomplished in such a short time is being called revolutionary.

Peggy DeZwirek

The Israeli Ministry of Education has reported that since ORT Smart Classes were implemented, students' progress and test score results have dramatically improved. ORT's goal is to expand the project to other regions in Israel.

"As a mother and grandmother, I fully understand the priority of the best education possible," Moore said. "We all seek that naturally for our own children and grandchildren. Now through ORT, with their technological know-how and resources, we all can help level the playing field, so tens of thousands of youngsters will step into the future with an education. I am very proud to be part of the ORT team."

Micki Moore

DeZwirek added: "As one of the more fortunate women of today, I have had the opportunity to achieve many of my goals and actively continue to try to help others attain theirs. ORT provides technological expertise through education, which is the pathway to successful futures for the upcoming generations to achieve their goals. "

DeZwirek is the founder of Oakdale's Golf Fore the Cure Golf Tournament, and a member of the Canadian Women's Breast Cancer Society and the Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation.

Moore is a broadcaster, journalist, actor and media coach. She is known as the host of Citytv's talk show, You're Beautiful, which ran for 12 years and was syndicated across North America. Moore was a columnist for the Toronto Star and the Toronto Sun, and her columns were distributed to other publications by the New York Times syndicate. She was also the broadcast editor of Flare magazine.

Moore is a board member of the Mount Sinai Hospital and served four years on the Ontario Film Review Board. She is a supporter of the Zareinu Educational Centre, the Israel Cancer Research Fund and United Jewish Appeal .

For more information about the luncheon, contact Lindy Meshwork at 416-787-0339. Ort Toronto's website address is www.ort-toronto.org.

Doctor remembered for undercover work

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

In the summer of 1954, Ben Massouda came very close to being killed. Tipped off by a friendly Egyptian official that he was on a "blacklist" and could be arrested at any time, Massouda, his parents and two sisters boarded a flight for London and for freedom.

Two of his cousins were not so lucky. Though he had warned them of the peril, they delayed in making their escape. They were arrested, tortured and eventually hanged as spies by the Egyptian authorities.

All three, history will record, were members of a Jewish underground in Egypt who were implicated in the notorious Lavon affair. Massouda, whose shloshim is being marked this week, was part of the group. He had been working with Israeli military intelligence since the 1948 War of Independence, all the while practising medicine and making friends with the official whose information spared his life.

It didn't have to turn out that way. Born in 1926, Massouda was part of a well-to-do Egyptian family that could afford to send him to medical school. An exceptional student, Massouda finished first in his class, but contrary to precedent in which top students received awards and subsidies, Massouda received nothing. What's more, Jews were singled out and relegated to a special ward in the hospital, Massouda's grandson, Ezra Hahn, recounted.

The antisemitism was such that, when Israel's independence was declared in May 1948, Egyptian mobs rampaged through the Jewish community, trashing homes and killing more than 70 Jews.

"An angry mob shouted death threats as they tried to break into the Massoudas' third-floor apartment," Hahn said. "They blocked the doors with the piano and any heavy items they could find." Egyptian police refused to come to their aid and the family was saved by British soldiers who drove them to safety in an armoured vehicle.

At that time, Massouda, who would go on to a lengthy medical career in Toronto, was approached by his cousins with the suggestion they join an underground to protect Egyptian Jews.

He quickly agreed. "He started by getting money and documents to get young Jews out of Egypt. They felt the situation was deteriorating," Hahn said.

Massouda came into contact with an Israeli agent posing as a British officer, named John Darling. The Egyptians had joined the Arab effort to quash the nascent state of Israel, and Darling had a mission for them. "It's a story that has always stuck in my mind," Hahn said. "They were told the Egyptians were sending a train full of tanks and explosives to the front, near Ashdod, and they had to derail the train."

Darling told the dozen young men that if they were not prepared to die, they should leave the room. Two did, and of the 10 remaining, one was chosen to strap explosives to his body, lie across the track and, as the train approached, detonate the bomb. That was the only option available because Egyptian patrols would have spotted a bomb, Hahn's grandfather told him. The train was disabled as planned.

Massouda continued to work underground right up to the Lavon affair of 1954.

The incident, named after Israel's then-defence minister, Pinchas Lavon, was aimed at disrupting Egypt's growing rapprochement with Britain and the United States. It saw young Egyptian Jews, working with Israeli intelligence, firebomb western targets so that local insurgents would be blamed.

Although no one was killed, Israel was thoroughly embarrassed when its involvement was exposed. What was worse, several of the Egyptian Jews working with Israel were captured, two were hanged and others were jailed and only released in prisoner swaps after the 1967 Six Day War.

Hahn's grandfather was one of the lucky ones, warned by an Egyptian official to leave at once.

Massouda warned his cousins, and within days, he departed with his parents and sisters Vivi and Hosna. Three other sisters left a short time later and two brothers were already living outside Egypt.

However, the two cousins, who delayed their departure, were arrested, tortured and hanged.

"He was always crying when he told us that story," Hahn recalled. "But he was adamant telling them to leave."

From Egypt, Massouda made his way to Boston, where he served as chief resident at the Peter Bent Brigham Hospital. In 1955, he was summoned by U.S. immigration officials, who had received a letter from the Egyptian president, Gamal Nasser, saying Massouda was not Egyptian.

The letter in effect made him stateless and liable for deportation back to Egypt. An intern working with him got him in touch with the local senator, John Kennedy, who contacted Paul Martin Sr. and asked for help to get him into Canada.

Once in Toronto, Massouda served as chief resident at Mount Sinai Hospital for a time. Later, he worked in his own clinics.

"He was a physician in every sense of the word," Hahn said. "He was compassionate and a brilliant diagnostician."

Hahn recalls his grandfather with pockets full of medication he'd hand to family members to treat their illnesses.

He loved to talk about medicine, and some of it apparently rubbed off on his grandson, who's now attending medical school.

"He was a great influence on me," Hahn said. "[He] was an unbelievable man. Always kind and gentle with a love so true it was palpable. He was a giant in his family, he was a giant of a physician and he was a giant in klal Yisrael."

Charity wins at AEPi poker tournament

AEPi almni took part in charity poker tournament last week.

Laura Fixman
Intern

With the Michael Waxman Memorial Poker Tournament, alumni of the Jewish fraternity Alpha Epsilon Pi (AEPi) found a way to honour one of their brothers, who died in 1996, and to bring them together.

The tournament, held on May 12 in Thornhill, raised $1,365, which was donated to the Heart and Stroke Foundation.

The fraternity chose to direct funds to the Heart and Stroke Foundation because Waxman died of a heart attack when he was a student. Waxman was also an avid poker player.

There was a $40 buy-in, and about 85 people attended. Poker players who fell below a certain amount of chips could buy-in again for $20. Prizes included golf greens fees, Raptors tickets and a Canon digital camera.

David Burden, vice-president of AEPi's alumni events, said poker is a great way to get alumni interested in reconnecting, and that it was expected to be the most successful event of the year.

The tournament was open to alumni from any AEPi chapter, as well as undergraduates, and was one of the many events the AEPi Toronto Alumni Club has held since forming last year.

With more than 800 alumni in the Toronto area, AEPi is always looking for new ways to get them involved. The fraternity looks to social media as one of its primary ways to stay connected.

"Facebook is a huge thing and so is building a database," Burden said.

He added that social events make it easier for alumni to connect with brothers from other schools or to see brothers they haven't seen in years.

The AEPi Toronto Alumni Club has held several events in the past year, including bar nights and mixers. Ideas for future events include a golf tournament, an art gallery event with wives and girlfriends, and a cigar and Scotch tasting at a brother's home.

CUNY flip-flop on Kushner degree spurs wider debate

Ron Kampeas
JTA

WASHINGTON — It was the latest dustup over what constitutes acceptable discourse in the American Jewish community when it comes to Israel.

Except this time the battle wasn't contained within the community, but began at a university board meeting and spilled over onto the front page of the New York Times.

When the dust had settled, the City University of New York had reversed its decision to withhold an honorary degree from the Pulitzer Prize-winning playwright Tony Kushner over his views on Israel.

What was less clear was what the victory for Kushner and his supporters meant for the pro-Israel wars in America.

"We do not shy away from the difficult, the unpopular, the mysterious," Matthew Goldstein, CUNY's chancellor, said at the meeting last week that reversed the earlier decision to deny Kushner the degree. "Rather, these are the areas that most deserve our careful scholarly attention and our deepest humanity."

The university's original decision to drop the honorary degree for Kushner from its John Jay College came at the behest of Jeffrey Wiesenfeld, a CUNY trustee who served as an aide to Republican George Pataki when he was the governor of New York. Wiesenfeld argued at a CUNY board meeting that Kushner's harsh views on Israel placed him out of the bounds of acceptable discourse.

After last week's reversal, Kushner and his supporters said it was a victory showing that one can criticize Israel and still accrue mainstream recognition, such as honorary degrees.

"We're in a different place in this country on our understanding of the crisis in the Middle East," Kushner said in a talk at the Public Theater on May 8 after reports surfaced that he was being restored to the list of honorary degree recipients at CUNY.

Tony Kushner

What Wiesenfeld "wanted to happen, which was a rally to this ring of a bell, didn't happen – quite the contrary," Kushner said, in remarks first reported by Tablet.

Kushner's critics said it was par for the course for American universities tainted by anti-Israel bias.

In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal said the episode showed how bias against Israel is endemic among some in the academic world.

"Mr. Wiesenfeld's 'mistake' was not appreciating that hostility to Israel has become such a deeply embedded principle of the modern academy that objecting to it earns you denunciation as a censor and philistine," the newspaper's editorialists wrote.

Wiesenfeld said in subsequent interviews that at the CUNY board meeting, he merely wanted to note his dissent from awarding Kushner the honour, and that he was surprised when his speech persuaded the board to table the degree.

In a recording of the May 2 meeting available on CUNY's website, Wiesenfeld said he was making his views known "even if I am the lone dissenter."

'I can't think of a dumber academic action,' says Koch

At that meeting, Wiesenfeld said Kushner was associated with a group, Jewish Voice for Peace, that advocates boycotting Israel, and that Kushner said that "ethnic cleansing" was used in the founding of Israel and Israel's founding was a disaster.

In a letter to the CUNY board two days later, Kushner demanded an apology and said he should have been given the right to defend himself.

While he has "questions and reservations regarding the founding of the State of Israel," Kushner wrote in the letter, "My opinion about the wisdom of the creation of a Jewish state has never been expressed in any form without a strong statement of support for Israel's right to exist, and my ardent wish that it continue to do so, something Mr. Wiesenfeld conveniently left out of his remarks."

Kushner wrote that his view that ethnic cleansing was used in creating the State of Israel was based largely on the work of Israeli historian Benny Morris. However, Morris also has said that the policy of removing local Arabs from their homes was not a national one, but one instigated by some military commanders on an ad hoc basis and rejected by others.

Ed Koch

Finally, although he is indeed affiliated with Jewish Voice for Peace, Kushner said, he is on the record rejecting its boycott strategy. However, Kushner has expressed his support for the Israeli artists who boycotted the theatre in the Jewish West Bank city of Ariel, saying he and others "stand with them."

"I believe I am owed an apology for the careless way in which my name and reputation were handled at your meeting," Kushner wrote.

But Alex Safian, the deputy director of the Committee for Accuracy in Middle East Reporting in America, which for years has tracked Kushner's statements on Israel, said it was fair game to revoke the honorary degree to Kushner based on his record.

"He's free to hold those opinions, but he shouldn't be surprised if they're held against him," Safian told JTA.

But some supporters of Israel said picking through Kushner's past statements was besides the point: as a celebrated playwright, he deserves an honorary degree.

Ed Koch, the former New York City mayor and himself an honorary CUNY laureate this year, went so far as to advise the institution to boot Wiesenfeld.

"I can't think of a dumber academic action," Koch wrote in a letter to the chairman of CUNY's board of trustees, Benno Schmidt. "What does Kushner receiving an award have to do with criticism of the State of Israel? I am a well-known supporter of that nation. What if I were denied an honorary degree because of my strong support for that state? That would make as much sense as denying Mr. Kushner a degree."

Other past CUNY honorees said they would return their degrees if the university did not reverse its decision revoking Kushner for the honoree list.

Matters became further inflamed when Wiesenfeld told a New York Times columnist that Kushner's sin was to equate Israelis and Palestinians.

"People who worship death for their children are not human," he said.

Jeremy Ben-Ami, who founded J Street, a group that advocates an intensified peace process and that does not shy from criticizing Israel or the Palestinians, said the lesson here for the Jewish community is that Wiesenfeld's tactics, which may have a measure of success in Jewish circles, make no sense in the wider world.

"This same guy doing this kind of stuff in a Jewish institution would have succeeded," he said, noting successful efforts across the country to limit the plays or movies that Jewish community centres may stage. "You try to do this in the real world and people will think you're nuts."

Wiesenfeld, who has two years left on his term on CUNY's board, has resisted calls for his resignation.

Centre has 'potential to build understanding'

In a joint interview with Najman, Tanenbaum said he was "incredibly excited about the potential to work with Hindy... and [that] the impact that could have on Jewish education in Toronto and Canada was very tangible to me."

Two years ago, when Tanenbaum met Najman for the first time and learned of her "road map" for, as she puts it, "getting a very good program mobilized to be one of the best in the world," he "immediately became enamoured" with her vision and commitment, he said. In particular, he noted her plan to integrate the Jewish studies program across university departments and faculties.

He also noted the support the centre has received from the New York-based Tikvah Fund, which recently committed to a third year for a total of $800,000. Najman told The CJN she feels very inspired by Tikvah Fund president Roger Hertog's confidence.

The university's Jewish studies centre dates back to 1967 and has been supported by other philanthropists in the Jewish community, including Tanenbaum's grandmother, Anne. Early supporters of Jewish studies at U of T "imagined much of this and started to put the building blocks in place," Tanenbaum said, referring to aspects such as endowed lectures and visiting professorships.

The centre has 65 faculty members and 2,300 students (approximately 60 percent of whom are not Jewish), enrolled in more than 100 Jewish studies courses. Of those, 50 are pursuing undergraduate majors and minors in Jewish studies, and 70 are working on MA or PhD degrees.

In the past year, the centre's undergraduate program has grown by 50 per cent, and its graduate program has more than 10 times the number of students it did three years ago – only six at the time, and 73 now, Najman noted.

Recently, the centre, which was upgraded from a "program" shortly before Najman became director, joined forces with the university's faculty of law to create a collaborative master's program. As well, Jewish studies collaborates with 21 departments and centres in the faculty of arts and science.

Other faculties have expressed interest in collaborating

Other faculties have also expressed interest in collaborating, said Najman, who will be taking a year's leave of absence starting in the fall to teach at Yale University. Jeffrey Kopstein, a professor of political science, will serve as acting director.

Najman said the reason she agreed to take on the directorship three years ago was that she saw the potential of the program. Since then, she added, she's fallen in love with Toronto's Jewish community, and credits it for inspiring her to "build a bridge" between it and the centre, a metaphor she attributes to Tanenbaum.

A native of New York who taught at Notre Dame University before she was recruited by U of T, Najman feels she's been "embraced as an outsider" by lay and professional leaders and community members of all denominations. She said she's spent a lot of time at Jewish high schools, "explaining why we should aspire to send our children to the best universities in the world – it's not just about U of T... and why Jewish studies has to continue beyond Hebrew school, beyond Grade 8, beyond Grade 12. One can't stop at 12 or 18 and imagine you have a sophisticated model of how to be a Jew in the world."

As well, referring to a broader context beyond the Jewish community, Tanenbaum said that U of T, with a student population of 72,000, is "a beacon of multiculturalism and pluralism... We believe that this collaborative model has great potential to build understanding across the university... We must teach the students that cross the U of T campus every day what Jewish studies is, what Jewish civilization and culture and history is about, and what Jews have given to western civilization and what we have received."

Najman also believes that the centre will have a further-reaching impact. She believes it will help other Jewish studies centres throughout North America by serving as a "model of collaboration and conversation with the community."

Ted Sokolsky, president of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, said it's part of UJA's philosophy, "especially through our foundation arm, to become a philanthropic broker... and help donors reach their philanthropic dreams." He added that while federation was already involved with the Centre for Jewish Studies, the new project is a Tanenbaum family initiative.

He said that the university "wants to create one of the finest centres of Jewish studies anywhere... and we want to make [Toronto] one of the finest Jewish communities in the Diaspora." Having such a centre "adds a lot to the attractiveness of a Jewish community," Sokolsky explained. It will "get people to continue to move here, keep our young people here over the long period of time, and continue to make the Toronto Jewish community a hub of Jewish education and Jewish culture in the Diaspora."

Najman is passionate about the centre and the changes it is undergoing. "I feel very blessed to have had this opportunity," she said.

Former U.S. first lady Laura Bush is the keynote speaker at this year's Negev Dinner in Hamilton.

At the May 30 dinner, the Jewish National Fund (JNF) of Hamilton will honour Kevin P. D. Smith for his continuous support for Israel and the Jewish community, as well as for his contributions to the city of Hamilton, Ont.

Smith is the president and CEO of St. Joseph's Health System, one of Canada's largest health sciences networks, and is an associate professor at the De Groote School of Medicine at McMaster University.

All funds raised will go to support a major research and development project in the Arava, a valley in Israel between the Dead Sea and Eilat.

This project studies irrigation, concentration of soil nutrients and the efficacy of different irrigation regimes in reducing the potential of groundwater pollution.

The results of this research could have a profound impact on desert agriculture in Israel and in other countries around the world dealing with similar conditions.

One Family Fund Gidion Ride to aid terror victims in Israel

Compiled by CJN Staff

The One Family Fund Gidion Ride, which raises funds for terror victims in Israel, is being expanded to other cities across Canada this year, for the first time.

Cyclists will take to the bike paths on Sunday, June 12, for the seventh annual event in the Greater Toronto Area, a 55-kilometre ride that will take place near Stouffville, Ont.

"In the wake of the recent increase in terrorism in Israel, it makes it more imperative for our community to join in solidarity to support terror victims.... That's why we're giving riders all across the country the opportunity to participate this year," says Marilyn Gotfrid, co-chair of the ride with Lisa Stern.

Rides have already been organized for Vancouver, Ottawa and Montreal.

There are prizes for all participants, but the best reason to participate is "to help victims become survivors," says Gila Yefet, of Thornhill, who will be riding with a group of Israeli-Canadians for the first time this year.

Yids on Wheels (Yowies) will be on hand to marshal the GTA ride once again. Yowie member and One Family Fund vice-president Jonny Diamond is riding because "my grandparents and parents taught me that it was important to support Israel. I feel a strong personal connection and want to do what I can to help alleviate the aftermath of terror for so many people."

Charest meets 500 young Jews at political 'party'

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL —Premier Jean Charest's eyes lit up when he walked into a room full of hundreds of young people gathered in a swanky night-club setting to party, and shmooze with politicians like him.

Charest was one of more than 30 elected officials, from all levels of government, who accepted the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee's (CJPAC) invitation to its annual Action Party. The event is intended to encourage younger Jews and others who are pro-Israel to become engaged in the political process by first getting to know politicians informally.

This was the third year the event has been held in Montreal and, at close to 500 people, drew its largest crowd ever. A different trendy venue is chosen each year, and this time it was Complexe Dompark, a century-old former textile factory on the Lachine Canal, that has been renovated into commercial lofts.

Participants paid $60 to dress up in "urban chic," enjoy an open bar, food and loud music supplied by a DJ, and meet a politician or two.

"It makes me feel great," Charest told The CJN. "This is what we hoping for. It speaks very highly of the community to organize something like this. We want young people to stay and thrive here in Quebec; but we know they are very mobile and can live and work where they want. This is the challenge, and I thank the Jewish community."

At least six of Quebec cabinet ministers were also present including Immigration and Cultural Communities Minster Kathleen Weil and Environment Minister Pierre Arcand.

Among other provincial politicians were Action démocratique du Québec leader Gérard Deltell and Parti Québécois member of the National Assembly Pascal Bérubé, who represents Matane in the Gaspé.

The New Democratic Party may have swept 58 seats in Quebec in this month's federal election, but the only MPs from that party present were deputy leader Thomas Mulcair of Outremont and the new member for Gatineau, Françoise Boivin, as well as Glenn Thibeault who was returned to his Sudbury seat in Ontario.

The Conservatives were represented by John Baird and Christian Paradis, both ministers in the previous Harper government.

Other federal politicians included Liberals Marc Garneau (Westmount-Ville Marie), Justin Trudeau (Papineau) and Irwin Cotler (Mount Royal). Marlene Jennings, the Liberal incumbent who was defeated in Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine, also stopped by.

Three mayors were on hand: Montreal's Gérald Tremblay, Anthony Housefather of Côte St. Luc and William Steinberg of Hampstead, as well as some of their councillors, including the new chair of the Montreal executive committee, Michael Applebaum.

"It's interesting to meet politicians in an informal way," said Jeff Sinsofsky, 35, who works for a national real-estate holding company. "There's normally such a disconnect between politicians and citizens. This helps bring them together, gives us a little face time with people we see in the media."

Sinsofsky decribed himself as not particularly political, but he does vote and tries to follow certain issues.

He thinks that Jewish young adults are probably a little more politically active than average because the community is very small and therefore more organized.

Jessica Sharafi, 29, a product manager at a bank, said she had not yet met any of the politicians present and wasn't sure what she would say to any of them. "It might be a little intimidating to ask a question, it depends where they are from. But this format is great. You can get to know them in a social setting, so it's less intimidating."

The goal of these parties is to get younger Jews politically involved beyond simply voting and reading the news. CJPAC encourages them to become members of or work for the party of their choice at any level, thereby helping to shape policy, including, but not exclusively, related to Israel and other Jewish concerns.

During the last federal election, CJPAC mobilized more than 900 people to volunteer in the campaign and they could be found in all parties and across the country, including many small centres, said Tomer Chervinsky, CJPAC's Toronto-based communications director. That's almost double the number it mustered in the 2008 election, he added.

Y firebomber to be released from jail

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The man considered to have instigated two firebombing attacks on Jewish institutions in 2006 and 2007 will be released from prison this month.

Omar Bulphred, 25, is due for mandatory release after having served two-thirds of the seven-year sentence in a federal penitentiary he was given in February 2009, after pleading guilty. The 22 months he spent in detention from his arrest in April 2007 until his sentencing counts for double time.

Bulphred was twice turned down for day parole, in 2009 and 2010, because it was thought there was still a risk he would reoffend, and, in fact, he has continued to show a propensity toward violence and criminal thinking while in prison.

Correctional Service Canada did have the exceptional option of recommending to the National Parole Board to keep Bulphred in jail if they believe he is a danger to society, as parole officers still think.

Omar Bulphred

There are conditions on his freedom. He will live in a halfway house full time until his sentence is completed in June 2012, and he'll be required to obtain psychological counselling aimed at learning to control his negative emotions which are said to include aggression and "racial extremism."

He'll also be barred from having access to the Internet because, during the Montreal police investigation, Bulphred was found to have twice searched websites linked to terrorism and bomb-making.

The Algerian-born Bulphred and accomplice Azim Ibragimov, 23 at the time, were arrested soon after the attempted late-night firebombing of the Snowdon YM-YWHA during Passover 2007. A small device made with a propane tank was ignited outside the building, but caused no material damage.

Their first attack, the September before, when a Molotov cocktail was thrown, started a fire in the entrance of the chassidic Skver community's Toldos Yakov Yosef school in Outremont.

The crime, which was caught on a surveillance camera, occurred shortly after the school was vacated by students that evening.

Ibragimov was given a four-year prison term in November 2008. He had 10 months left to serve when he was sentenced.

The pair were also convicted on a third arson count not connected to the Jewish community and for uttering death threats.

The attacks struck fear in the Jewish community, especially because the duo were found during the police investigation to have been inspired by Islamic extremism.

Although neither has been connected to any organized movement, the investigation uncovered two letters in which they claimed the attacks were carried out to further the Islamic jihad. The author spoke of planning other attacks against "the Zionists," as well as against sites not connected to the Jewish community.

The letters suggested the two wanted to avenge the arrests in Toronto in the summer of 2006 of 17 suspects alleged to have been involved in an Islamic terrorist plot.

Guelph project aims to boost Jewish education

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Guelph resident Pauline Breitman hopes that the Beth Isaiah Hebrew school reunion and classroom project will raise enough funds to enhance the quality of Jewish education in Guelph.

Breitman, the classroom project's chair, said the goal is to provide the Hebrew school students with a Jewish education that's "more in line with what's enjoyed by students in the larger centres.

"The actual reason we're doing this is to upgrade the present classroom, which has been virtually the same since the 1940s," said Breitman, who has lived in Guelph since 1978 and sent all three of her kids to the Hebrew school that operates out of Beth Isaiah Congregation, Guelph's only synagogue.

There have been recent cosmetic changes to the classroom, such as new carpeting, new desks and a fresh coat of paint, but Breitman said that there also needs to be fundamental changes to the quality of education to ensure that the Jewish children in her community receive the same standard of education Hebrew school students get in larger Jewish communities.

Her grandchildren who live in Toronto have computers at their Hebrew school.

"Here, we just have books," she said.

"We want to add computer programs field trips, speakers and things like that."

Since the 1940s, several hundred children have attended the synagogue's Hebrew school, which runs like an afternoon cheder twice a week. The classes usually accommodated four to eight children.

In addition to appealing to former Hebrew school students for support, Breitman said the other component of this initiative is to hold a Hebrew school reunion at Beth Isaiah on June 12.

Breitman said that once she and her fellow organizers gathered as many addresses of alumni as they could, they sent out letters to the former Hebrew school students to tell them about the project.

"We've had an overwhelming response," she said, adding that they've already raised $11,000 for the Hebrew school.

"We put together an honour roll plaque, which will hang in the synagogue lobby, and this will be a plaque of names of as many alumni as we can possibly find," she said.

"We've already engraved about 120 names... so what we're doing is holding a reunion of the former students and we will dedicate the plaque at that time."

Breitman said they are still looking for former students, and a list of alumni who are unaccounted for can be found on the shul's website, www. guelphsynagogue.ca.

"We're asking people to go to the website to see if they can help us contact them. I'm sure there are others out there."

She said that the refurbished classroom will be dedicated to the late University of Guelph professor and former Beth Isaiah member, Jay Newman, who would have been "very much interested in this type of project."

Breitman added that during the reunion, several alumni from different generations will speak about their experiences as Hebrew school students.

Former Guelph mayor Joe Young, who attended the school in the 1940s, is one of the presenters.

"We're also going to have an open mike and people can come up and reminisce about their Hebrew school experiences," she said.

The congregation, which was founded in 1907, has a membership of nearly 50 families. Located at the corner of Dublin Street South and Surrey Street West, the building was purchased in 1949 and has been the centre of the Guelph Jewish community ever since.

"It's an old community, but it's a small community. However, we have managed to stay alive, whereas many other shuls around us have closed in smaller towns," Breitman said.

Beth Isaiah students in a play in 1982

With the 2009 addition of Cantor Avraham Fisher and his wife, Techiya, as the shul's spiritual leaders, the congregation has continued to evolve to serve its community.

"Women are participating more in the services, as they are called now to the Torah," Breitman said. "[Fisher] sees no halachic reason as far as he's concerned that women can't do that. It has kept some of our younger members interested."

The classroom project is another attempt at keeping the Guelph Jewish community alive and thriving.

"Hopefully, this project will enhance the quality of Jewish education to the point that it will be attractive for people to come. We have to stay current."

Israeli immigrants hope to revive community

St. John looking to welcome almost 60 newcomers

Joel Jacobson
Atlantic Correspondent

ST. JOHN, N.B. — The Jewish community of Saint John is trying to turn a corner.

Numbers have fallen in the last couple of decades, causing a vibrant community of 250 families in the 1950s to dwindle to a mere 30 families today. The synagogue that served the community for more than 100 years was sold in 2008 and a new, smaller building was obtained to retain a Jewish spiritual presence and house the Saint John Historical Society Museum.

Now Saint Johners are looking ahead to the arrival of almost 60 newcomers, including 25 children ages one to 14, a number that will more than double the current Jewish population in the New Brunswick port city.

Dan Elman, a life-long active member of the Jewish community, part of a working committee of about 15 men and women, is eagerly anticipating Aug. 30 when the first newcomer family – of 17 who have agreed to emigrate from Israel to Saint John – will arrive.

"We looked back at the early 1900s, when my grandparents and many others like them came to Saint John to start new lives," Elman said.

"It was a successful emigration of these people from eastern Europe who wanted to leave their present home to set up a new life. If they didn't stay in Saint John, it was OK, but many did remain and built Saint John into a vibrant Jewish community. We hope these newcomers will have the same impact and bring Jewish vibrancy back to Saint John."

He said his grandfather, Israel Elman, started a group called Habonim as the welcoming committee for other newcomers. The current committee has retained that name.

"I set up a website [now non-existent] inviting interest in emigrating to Saint John from Israel, and we received a couple of hundred resumes," he recalled of the start of this newcomer program a year or so ago.

"We also had a contact in Israel, lawyer Yigal Ben Zion in Jerusalem, who visited our community and was aware of the provincial nominee program [which allows the province to select and assist skilled immigrants]. He screened people in Israel and helped them fill out forms, etc."

Two groups visited separately for one week in fall 2009 and spring 2010, hosted by the working committee, which held receptions and special events at the synagogue, showed them areas to live, and set up interviews and meetings with Enterprise Saint John to discuss housing and business opportunities. They also made connections with multicultural associations and the newcomers resource centre.

"The role of our support committees within the Jewish community is to help the newcomers settle," Elman said.

Linda Hamburg, Susan Isaacs-Lubin and Lorne Daltrop will assist in housing. Phillip Bloom will guide them to financial institutions. Robert Selby, Herzl Kashetsky and Kate Elman-Wilcott will develop cultural contacts and assist in finding education opportunities for the children, with Elman-Wilcott also coordinating youth programs and activities. Cathy Tait will assist in employment contacts, while Murray Goodman finds recreational programs.

Ruth Koven and Diane Bloom work in transportation, while Lois Bessoudo and Lorie Cohen-Hackett co-ordinate shopping advice and opportunities. Dr. Ricardo Bessoudo and Shelley Cohen-Thorley are assisting with medical contacts, of obvious importance to families with young children.

Elman added: "We have one family already living here, and they came outside this newcomer program. The husband searched the web, discovered a Woodstock, N.B., company needed truckers and would arrange work permits. They came to Saint John to our Jewish community and they've already integrated with us. Both children are in Hebrew school and he is working steadily."

One lawyer from Israel, who will have to earn his certification in Canada, told Elman he'll do anything just to be here, "even shovel snow" until he is able to practise in his profession.

"We told all these people we want them in our community. We said we want you to have our [shul] building. We want to preserve our Jewish history and move ahead and you can help us do that," Elman said.

Most of the newcomers are originally from Russia and the Ukraine. They'll be coming with backgrounds in security, music, engineering, welding, program management, nursing, human resources, translation, pharmacy, sales, and even restaurant development and management. Their English is good, but Elman said most have been studying online to improve their language skills.

They're employable, he said, unlike his ancestors, who were educated but only through books, not work experience.

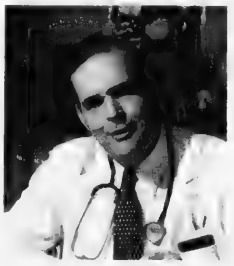
Shaare Zedek to expand with new pediatric ER

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Shaare Zedek Medical Center's director general Dr. Jonathan Halevy was in Toronto earlier this month to present the Jerusalem hospital's latest developments to its Toronto-area supporters.

The Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation, which raises money to further research, upgrade medical equipment and expand the hospital's facilities, organized a private function during which Halevy informed current and potential foundation members about new innovations and expansions – including a new pediatric emergency room and a new emergency response centre.



Dr. Jonathan Halevy

Halevy, who recently celebrated his 23rd anniversary as the hospital's director general, spoke to The CJN enthusiastically about the expansion of the Wilf Children's Hospital.

Currently, the pediatric unit is spread out on the sixth and eighth floors of the main 10-storey hospital.

"We have the largest maternity centre in Israel. We delivered in 2010 over 14,000 babies, and we are forever in need of expansion," Halevy said.

The new centre, which is expected to be completed in 2013, will be built atop an existing outpatient clinic within the 11-acre campus and will create a specialized hospital that brings nearly all aspects of pediatric care together and expands the maternity and neonatal intensive care units.

The children's hospital also now houses an upgraded pediatric emergency room, named after Miriam and Felix Glaubach, which includes triage and trauma units and more than 20 individual stations for treatment and observation.

Shaare Zedek, which celebrates its 110th anniversary this January, has another major project underway to create a "comprehensive emergency preparedness and disaster management centre."

The Dr. Jack Matloff Family Disaster and Emergency Response Center is designed to serve as an urgent care facility for mass casualty incidents as well as a training centre for medical professionals.

Halevy said what makes Shaare Zedek able to respond well to mass casualties, is its "vast and extensive" emergency management plan that was born out of experience with terror attacks in Jerusalem.

"When we go on high alert, when Magen David Adom calls that a bomb detonated, there is a chain reaction and we are well prepared to call the staff in and evacuate the emergency room from existing patients to pre-designed areas. We are able to absorb within a very short time – I'm talking about half an hour or 45 minutes – hundreds of casualties," Halevy said.

The new emergency response centre will be built in an underground facility in the main hospital and accommodate 120 beds.

The first three floors of the main hospital building, which houses operating theatres, an emergency room and a pharmacy, were built below the ground level as a safety measure in the event of war or a terror attack.

The new underground facility "is an additional part where we will evacuate mainly children who are on the upper floors of the hospital in case of a missile attack on Jerusalem," Halevy said, adding that it will also serve as a decontamination centre in the event of chemical warfare.

Despite the new developments, Halevy said there are a number of challenges that come with his role as director general, including the pressure "to keep the hospital at the forefront of medicine, which calls for the recruitment of new people who have the best training."

Halevy added that he also puts much thought into appointing heads of the hospital's departments.

"First, they should be menschlichkeit. They should have personality, empathy. Then we would like the head of the departments to be disciplined, to have managerial skills, to be a researcher and to be a teacher. And my main challenge is to keep our centres of excellence manned with these types of people," he said.

But appointing the best doctors is not enough, he said.

"The second challenge in keeping the hospital in the forefront of medicine... is by buying the equipment, which in medicine ages every four to five years."

He added that establishing cutting-edge research laboratories is another priority.

As the leader of a teaching hospital, Halevy also emphasized the importance of guiding the next generation of doctors and researchers that work at Shaare Zedek.

Since Shaare Zedek doesn't receive financial support from the Israeli government for development and expansion, Halevy spent a week travelling to North American cities to meet with fundraisers and donors on which the hospital relies.

In addition to the Toronto event, Halevy also met with members of American Shaare Zedek foundations in cities including New York and Los Angeles.

He said he hopes to recruit more North Americans to support the hospital.

Balance training is for everyone

One of the most challenging problems for older adults is instability and loss of balance. Many daily activities such as standing, walking or climbing stairs put your body off balance, placing you at risk of a fall or injury. Improving balance is vital for maintaining quality of life.

Fitness Corner

Felyce Zomparelli

Your balance muscles work every time you stand or move without holding something for support. Balance muscles or core muscles are the muscles that surround your spine and abdominal area. These muscles shut off whenever you are sitting.

Balance exercises train the body for rapid shifts in balance, such as fast walking, a quick turn or getting out of a chair. Exercising deep core muscles helps tighten the midsection. The tighter your midsection, the more prepared your body is for sudden movements. Learning how to engage your stomach muscles also helps prevent injury when you are lifting.

Balance exercises can be as simple as standing on one foot. This activates your core muscles and strengthens the gluteus medius, a small part of the bum that helps stabilize the pelvis during walking or lifting. Balance training exercises fine-tune the senses that allow you to go up stairs or walk without looking at your feet. Balance training can also help to prevent injuries to your knees and ankles.

Dancing is a great way to improve balance. Big steps, small steps, sideway steps, backward steps – these motions all work your sense of balance. Using tools such as balance boards, cushions or foam rollers is a good way to strengthen core muscles and build better balance. Balance training can make walking, shopping, and getting in and out of a car easier.

Balance muscles need regular stimulation to stay toned, especially as we age. Balance exercises should be done every day for best results. Progress slowly, performing simple exercises first, then move to more complicated multiple-movement exercises. But, before trying balance exercises, check with your doctor and enlist the help of a professional, such as a fitness trainer.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style food" may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Twentieth anniversary of Operation Solomon

In 1991, the sitting Ethiopian government of Mengistu Haile Mariam was close to being toppled by the recent military successes of Eritrean and Tigrean rebels, threatening Ethiopia with dangerous political destabilization. Several Jewish organizations, including the Israeli government, were concerned about the well-being of the sizable population of Jews, known as Beta Israel, living in Ethiopia. Also, the Mengistu regime had made mass emigration difficult for the Beta Israel, and the regime's dwindling power presented an opportunity for Beta Israel who had been wanting to leave for Israel. In the previous year, 1990, the Israeli government and the Israel Defence Forces, aware of Mengistu's worsening political situation, made covert plans to airlift the Beta Israel to Israel. Finally, on Friday, May 24, 1991, within 36 hours, more than 14,000 Jews boarded 34 Israeli aircraft, including Israeli Air Force C-130s and El Al cargo planes, and flew to Israel. Once there, many were reunited with family they hadn't seen for many years. It was the largest emigration of Beta Israel to date.

Following the successful Operation Solomon came the reality of settling more than 14,000 Ethiopians into the mainstream of Israeli life. Only one day after the historical airlift, Addis Ababa airport in Ethiopia was closed. The 11th-hour rescue of the Ethiopians brought commendation in Israel for the operation's efficiency. Kept secret for the previous six months, the plans were meticulously worked out by the Israeli Air Force and Jewish Agency. It was recognized that in the event of a successful airlift, housing and hostel accommodation would be needed. Prior to the operation, the housing ministry was criticized for keeping new temporary houses empty when other immigrants badly needed the facilities. The ministry had to accept the criticism without being able to explain that the housing had been set aside to accommodate the coming aliyah.

Israel shone in airlift

Mordechai Ben-Dat
Editor

HAIFA — "The largest Jewish school in the world, perhaps ever, was in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, in 1991," Asaf Agmon told The CJN in an exclusive interview in Israel last week

Agmon is the CEO of Israel's Fisher Brothers Institute for Air & Space Strategic Studies – a non-profit organization that receives funding from the Israeli Ministry of Science and works with NASA to bring Israeli experiments into space.

He described the chaotic, tumultuous scene some 20 years ago, in May 1991, in the compound in and surrounding the Israeli Embassy in the capital of Ethiopia.

His was an authoritative description. For he knew it, first-hand, as the commander of the daring overnight rescue mission named Operation Solomon that brought 14,325 Jews from Ethiopia to Israel during a span of merely 36 hours from May 24 to 25.

"At one point there were more than 5,000 Jewish students 'enrolled' in the Jewish school in Addis Ababa," Agmon said.

How they and their parents and grandparents arrived there and why they were there en masse in the Israel Embassy compound is one of the great rescue stories of modern time.

Israel was determined to rescue as many Ethiopian Jews as possible. Indeed the Jewish state had been doing so, in relatively small numbers, as early as the mid-1970s. In the early to mid-'80s, in a more organized but still always clandestine fashion, Israel saved some 10,000 Jews from Ethiopia.

Asaf Agmon

Some of the stories of the rescue of the earlier groups of Ethiopians have been told. Most have not.

The three-to-four-week trek in the desert to get from Ethiopia to Sudan to the secret, rescue departure points, fighting hunger, disease, bandits, soldiers, hot sand, lack of water and fear was the first part of their stories. But there were other dangers, as well.

Agmon knew them all as he also commanded Operation Moses, a series of rescue efforts between November 1981 and April 1983.

Jafar al-Numeiry was then the ruler of Sudan, and for a certain consideration, he agreed to allow Sudanese soil to be used as the port of exit for the Jews of Ethiopia to Israel.

He rescinded his permission once the rescue efforts became the subject of media reports in the West and other Muslim rulers in the region persuaded him to desist in giving the Israelis land and air space to save other Jews.

But Agmon returned to the Horn of Africa in 1991, this time to Ethiopia, where strongman Mengistu Haile Mariam was the ruler. He was in a fight to the death with Eritrean-based rebels who sought to depose him.

For weapons and money, Mengistu agreed to allow Ethiopia's Jews to depart for Israel.

Many of the Jews who had made the journey to Sudan had to find their way to the Israeli Embassy in Addis Ababa. And they did. Other Ethiopian Jews found their way there with the help of Israeli agents. among whom were Jews who had arrived from Ethiopia some years ago.

Nearly 15,000 Jews, in all conditions of health – 5,000 of them children – were corralled together.

But Agmon and his fellow pilots, soldiers and volunteers did not have the luxury of time and leisurely paced, systematically scheduled flights to freedom.

The rebels were quickly closing in on Mengistu. With his overthrow, the Jews would likely be slaughtered.

Thus, Operation Solomon was executed non-stop, through two days and one night until all 14,325 Jews who were in the embassy compound on May 23 were brought to Israel.

Agmon recalled that at the start of the second day of the operation, Mengistu's soldiers who were guarding the compound had started to come uncomfortably close to the Jews still waiting to get on the buses that took them to the planes.

"They were bribed back away from the compound, away from the frightened Jews with as many cigarettes as my pilots could bring me that morning from Israel. It was very close."

Mengistu was deposed the next day.

"As far as I know, there has never been any comparable air rescue operation conducted anywhere by any other country," Agmon said. "In terms of the dangers to the rescuers and to the people being rescued, it stands out in modern history."

Agmon also said, "We don't consider ourselves heroes. It was a privilege to take part in it. We did it as Jews, helping and saving other Jews."

"The rescue was conducted Friday and Saturday. Because Friday is a special day for Muslims, it was quieter for us to operate. But the point I wish to make is that no observant soldiers refused to take part in the operation because of the Shabbat…"

"It was one of the best chapters in the unfolding story of the State of Israel," he said. But he also added that the chapter is not yet complete. There is still a great deal to do.

"The integration of Ethiopian Jews into mainstream Israeli life is a major challenge for Israelis and indeed for Diaspora Jewry, too," he said.

Agmon added that many people who took part in the rescue operations, including himself, volunteer in assisting in the integration of the Ethiopian immigrants, especially in the schools.

Operation Solomon is to be the subject of a ceremony sponsored by the Fisher Institute for Air and Space Strategic Studies on the actual date of the rescue, May 25, at the Israel Air Force Center in Herzliya.

Demjanjuk found guilty of war crimes

JTA

BERLIN — A Munich court has found John Demjanjuk guilty of war crimes, and sentenced the 91-year-old former Cleveland-area autoworker to five years in prison.

The May 12 verdict came after 93 court days, including deeply affecting testimony from Dutch survivors and their kin, and monologues by Demjanjuk's chief attorney, Ulrich Busch, who claimed his client was just as much a victim of Germany as any Jew.

His attorneys say they will appeal the verdict. Demjanjuk will be free pending the appeal because he was judged not to be a flight risk. An appeal could take a year.

Reacting to the conviction, Jewish leaders worldwide expressed gratitude to the court.

In a statement, Canadian Jewish Congress national president Mark Freiman said the conviction gives "a degree of closure to Holocaust survivors in Canada and around the world and a measure of justice to those who perished."

He added: "The ability of the German court to sift through the evidence and deliver a verdict should encourage other countries, including Canada, to act on the remaining cases and on cases from other, more recent genocides such as in Rwanda and Darfur. The passage of time should not confer immunity from prosecution for such heinous crimes. Now is the time to act."

John Demjanjuk

Stefan Kramer, general secretary of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, told JTA in a telephone interview that "the most important thing is that he was tried and judged and for the last days of his life is confirmed as a perpetrator. How long he is going to serve is secondary."

However, he decried the judge's decision to release Demjanjuk pending appeal.

"The immediate release of Demjanjuk from the prison is a slap in the face to any survivor and the relatives of the victims. He should have served the term at least in a prison," Kramer wrote to JTA. "That's not justice. It is cynicism at the expense of the victims. Absolutely unacceptable."

Demjanjuk, born in Ukraine, was charged with being an accessory to the murder of 27,900 Jews in Sobibor. He was present at nearly every court date, always in a wheelchair or hospital bed. He wore sunglasses, and said virtually nothing for the duration of the trial. In April 2010, Busch read aloud a statement in which Demjanjuk called the trial "torture," relieved only by his care attendants.

Survivor Thomas Blatt, one of the rare escapees from Sobibor, told JTA during the trial that "All the guards [at Sobibor] were murderers... it is enough to prove he was there."

Demjanjuk immigrated to the United States after World War II. He lived in suburban Cleveland from 1952. His later years were spent fighting accusations of involvement in wartime crimes against humanity: he was accused in the early 1980s of being a guard at the Treblinka death camp, but was released from jail in Israel after seven years when another Ukrainian was identified as the guard in question.

The U.S. Justice Department later reported that Demjanjuk was suspected of having been a guard at Sobibor and was liable for deportation because his U.S. citizenship had been granted based on false information. His citizenship was revoked in 2002 and deportation was approved in 2005. He was deported in March 2009.

Violence erupts in Israel

JTA

JERUSALEM — In the wake of disturbances on Israel's borders that have resulted in as many as 15 deaths, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said in a national address that he ordered the military to stop the infiltration.

"This is an appeal against the very existence of the State of Israel, which they call a catastrophe," Netanyahu said Sunday evening in Israel, responding to massive Arab protests both inside and outside of Israel for Nakba Day – the day Arabs mark the "catastrophe" of Israel's birth on May 15, 1948.

"We hope the calm and quiet will quickly return, but let nobody be mistaken, we are determined to defend our borders and sovereignty," Netanyahu said.

Hundreds of Arabs from Syria stormed across the border into Israel on Sunday, prompting Israeli troops to respond with live fire killing up to four people, according to reports. By Sunday evening, most of the infiltrators had been rounded up and returned to Syria.

Some of the Syrian infiltrators told Israeli media that they wanted to be granted asylum to live in Israel, calling it safer than living in the current uprising against the Syrian government. Others said they were there to liberate the Golan Heights from Israel.

The incident, which marked the first major eruption of violence along the border in decades, came on the same day that an Israeli Arab rammed a truck into pedestrians in Tel Aviv, killing one man and injuring a dozen people.

Elsewhere around Israel and the West Bank, thousands of Palestinians protested to mark Nakba Day.

The number of Arabs from Syria who breached the border on the Golan Heights was estimated at up to 400. The Israel Defence Forces declared the area of Majdal Shams, a Druze town near Mount Hermon, a closed military zone as Israeli troops tried to round up those who had infiltrated the border.

Israeli troops also fired on Palestinian protesters who approached Israel's border with Gaza, wounding several teens, according to reports.

In Lebanon, thousands of Arabs reportedly converged on Israel's border to demonstrate, but they were pushed back when the Lebanese army fired warning shots into the air. Israeli soldiers also reportedly shot in the air and at the feet of Lebanese demonstrators.

Up to 10 Lebanese demonstrators were killed in the incident, with most believed to have been killed by the Lebanese army, according to reports.

At least 10 Israeli troops were injured in the incidents on the Syrian and Lebanese borders.

Meanwhile, Israeli law enforcement officials in Tel Aviv said Sunday morning's truck rampage there appeared to be a terrorist attack. The 22-year-old man from the Israeli Arab village of Kafr Kassem who drove into cars and pedestrians on a busy thoroughfare reportedly told police that his tire had exploded, causing him to lose control of his truck.

In Jerusalem, Palestinian demonstrators also reportedly threw firebombs at Hadassah Hospital on Mount Scopus in Jerusalem.

The violence came two days after a Palestinian teen was killed during a protest in eastern Jerusalem. The boy may have been shot by a security guard for several Jewish families who live in the area.

Hamas' prime minister in the Gaza Strip, Ismail Haniyeh, told thousands of Muslim worshippers in a mosque Sunday morning that Nakba Day should be observed this year "with great hope of bringing to an end the Zionist project in Palestine."

Haniyeh made the remarks less than a week after his Islamist party and the Fatah party of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas reconciled and announced plans to form a unity government in the coming weeks.

"This is the first year crowds will march to Palestinian borders, annulling the old saying that elderly people die and younger generations forget the past," Haniyeh told the crowd, according to the Ma'an Palestinian news service.

In a nationally televised address, Abbas said of the dead protesters, "Their blood will not go to waste. Their blood was spilled for the freedom of our Palestinian people and for its rights."

Netanyahu, speaking at the weekly cabinet meeting Sunday morning, said he "regrets" that there are extremists among Israeli Arabs and in neighbouring countries "who have turned the day on which the State of Israel was established into a day of incitement, violence and rage. There is no place for this, for denying the existence of the State of Israel. "

Country on alert following clashes

The Israel Defence Forces said on Monday that Israel's frontiers are quiet after a violent day of border breaches, though security forces remained on alert for more violence.

Police arrested an unarmed man Monday from Syria who tried to make his way out of the Golan Heights into central Israel.

Police spokesperson Micky Rosenfeld said the man was stopped in a taxi driven by a Palestinian from east Jerusalem at the exit of the Golan village of Majdal Shams.

Israeli security forces fear that Sunday's Nakba Day events may be a model for additional violence aimed at Israel and may trigger further protests for Palestinian refugees.

Rosenfeld said police carried out house-to-house searches in Majdal Shams all night looking for some of the hundreds of people from Syria who burst through a border fence into the village Sunday.

Other Arab protesters marched on Israel's borders with Lebanon and Gaza.

The protests sparked clashes that killed at least 15 people.

On Sunday, two demonstrators were killed in clashes near Majdal Shams on the Syrian border and from three to 10 people were killed in Maroun a-Ras on the Lebanese border.

The IDF said that the incidents clearly bore Iran's fingerprints.

The Lebanese army said that 10 people were killed and 112 were wounded in Maroun a-Ras when IDF troops opened fire on demonstrators trying to cross the border.

The Lebanese army said it was in a state of maximum alert and had co-ordinated with UN peacekeepers in southern Lebanon "to prevent the enemy from continuing its targeting of the masses and its violation of Lebanese sovereignty."

Complaint lodged with UN

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The Israeli delegation to the United Nations announced Monday that it will file a complaint with the UN Security Council against Syria and Lebanon regarding Sunday's Naqba Day border clashes, Army Radio reported.

Israel said the two countries violated both international law and UN Security Council resolutions when Naqba Day protesters from Syria and Lebanon clashed with Israel Defence Forces and infiltrated into Israel. Naqba is Arabic for "catastrophe," the word Palestinians use to refer to the establishment of the State of Israel.

Earlier, the Lebanese delegation to the United Nations filed a complaint against Israel after the Lebanese army said 10 people were killed and 112 were wounded in Maroun a-Ras when IDF troops opened fire on demonstrators trying to cross the border.

Beirut officials called on the UN to "denounce this act of violence and Israel's disregard for Lebanese sovereignty and UN resolutions."

Two demonstrators were killed in clashes near Majdal Shams on the Syrian border, and between three and 10 people were killed in Maroun a-Ras on the Lebanese border.

The Lebanese army said it was in a state of maximum alert and had co-ordinated with UN peacekeepers in southern Lebanon "to prevent the enemy from continuing its targeting of the masses and its violation of Lebanese sovereignty."

IDF sources said, however, that both IDF and Lebanese forces opened fire to prevent demonstrators from crossing the border.

Changes to Israeli democracy recommended

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

There are 13 political factions or parties represented in Israel's parliament, ranging from Kadimah's 28 to Meretz's lonely caucus of three.

Given the members' fractious nature and the parties' propensity to divide and subdivide into ever tinier groupings, Israel's parliament, or Knesset, has assumed an international reputation for divisiveness and inefficiency. No one has noticed the resulting political instability more than Israelis themselves and recently The Forum for Political Reform in Israel, an Israeli NGO, issued a series of recommendations designed to reform the country's political system.

Arye Carmon

Meir Shamgar, former president of the Israeli Supreme Court, passed the forum's recommendations to Knesset speaker Reuven Rivlin. The recommendations contain 10 specific steps that, if adopted, will help stabilize Israeli democracy and increase its transparency and effectiveness, said academic Arye Carmon.

The forum was established by the Institute for Democracy in Israel (IDI), a think-tank headed by Carmon. It was tasked with examining Israel's democratic shortcomings, comparing the best practices of other parliamentary systems, and coming up with suggestions that would address the country's democratic deficit, Carmon said.

Among the steps urged by the forum are increasing the number of Knesset members to 180 from 120; gradually increasing the minimum threshold for parliamentary representation from two per cent of the vote to four per cent; limiting the number of cabinet ministers to 18, along with six deputy ministers; creating incentives for parties to become more transparent and strengthen internal democratic procedures; establishing taxpayer-funded think-tanks associated with each party to formulate policy and shift away from personality-fixated politics, and allocating half of all Knesset seats to specific constituencies.

Carmon, an educator and Holocaust historian, said Israelis have been considering ways of reforming their political system since at least 1988, when the electoral results led to a political stalemate. Changes adopted then proved disastrous, however. Israel implemented a process by which the prime minister would be elected directly, with a second ballot cast for members of the Knesset. That led to vote splitting and further fragmentation of the Knesset, making it very difficult to govern, Carmon said.

That provision was repealed in 2001, "but the damage from it was very painful and remains to this day."

Prior to 1996, each Israeli governing ruling party had a majority of cabinet posts. Since then, cabinet posts have been doled out to ensure the support of small parties in a coalition government, leading to "instability," Carmon said.

Israel has also suffered from a proliferation of private members' bills far exceeding the norm in any comparable democracy. From 1999 to 2009, "the number of private [members'] bills reached 13,000 and less than four per cent became actual laws," he said.

Further instability and fragmentation comes from the vast number of cabinet posts that coalition governments create. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, whose Likud party has only 27 seats, has created 30 cabinet posts and appointed nine deputy ministers.

His is "the politics of survival," with the result that "quality legislation" suffers, Carmon said.

By gradually raising the threshold for election to the Knesset to four per cent, smaller parties will be encouraged to merge, he continued.

The forum, however, did not advocate changes to the country's system of proportional representation, which allocates seats based on each party's percentage of the vote.

"We grappled with this a long time as to how to balance between proportional representation and efficient government," he said. The forum decided to leave it untouched so as not to disenfranchise wide segments of the population.

As to prospects that any or all of the recommendations will be adopted, Carmon said, "I don't expect it will happen overnight. It's a process that will take place over several [parliamentary] terms."

An organization called Save Israeli Democracy has been established to educate the public and mobilize its support for the reforms, while IDI will continue to lobby politicians to begin making changes to the country's democratic system.

"I hope that in the summer session after Independence Day we pass legislation on how to improve political parties and reduce corruption."

If that transpires, his hope for the winter session is that more steps will be taken.

"We need to show the public a success," Carmon said.

U.S. senators urge PA aid cutoff

JTA

WASHINGTON — Half the Democratic caucus in the U.S. Senate urged President Barack Obama to suspend assistance to the Palestinian Authority unless Hamas recognizes Israel and renounces terrorism.

"It is imperative for you to make clear to President [Mahmoud] Abbas that Palestinian Authority participation in a unity government with an unreformed Hamas will jeopardize its relationship with the United States, including its receipt of U.S. aid," said the letter sent May 6 to Obama and signed by 27 Democratic senators.

Abbas' Palestinian Authority signed a reconciliation deal with Hamas this month.

The letter from the Democrats notes that U.S. law proscribes assistance to any government that includes Hamas, unless it and its ministers comply with principles laid down by the Quartet, the grouping that includes the United States, Russia, the European Union and the United Nations. Those principles include recognizing Israel and renouncing terrorism. Under that formulation, the Obama administration could have relations with a PA government that has the support of Hamas but does not include its members at cabinet-level positions.

Italy will not recognize unilateral Palestinian state, Berlusconi says

JTA

ROME — Italy will never recognize a unilateral declaration of a Palestinian state, Italian Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi said.

Berlusconi at a celebration of Israel's 63rd birthday praised the Jewish state as the only democracy in the Middle East. He was the guest of honour May 11 at an Israeli Independence Day reception hosted by Israeli Ambassador Gideon Meir.

"No, absolutely not," he was quoted as telling reporters when asked whether Italy would recognize a unilaterally declared Palestinian state.

"I think that there is no other course other than an agreement between the two states," Berlusconi added. "Our policy has always gone in this direction, and it is also the policy of the European Union."

During a speech, Berlusconi said Israel is "the only real democracy in the Middle East, and Italy is concerned there are difficult situations for Jews. There can be no solution for your people and your state but peace with your neighbour Palestine."

During the reception, Berlusconi helped cut a large birthday cake frosted with the image of the Israeli flag. He also strongly reiterated Italy's support for the Jewish state.

Italian President Giorgio Napolitano is scheduled to make a visit to Israel this month, and Israeli President Shimon Peres will come to Italy in June.

Italian Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi is seen meeting with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu last year in Jerusalem.

Group sues on behalf of Canadian Orthodox convert

JTA

JERUSALEM — An Orthodox advocacy group has filed a lawsuit in Israel's Supreme Court against the Interior Ministry, demanding that it recognize all Orthodox conversions – and particularly that of a recent immigrant from Canada – performed abroad for the purposes of aliyah.

The Jerusalem-based ITIM, the Jewish Life Information Center, filed the lawsuit May 12. It argues that individuals who underwent Orthodox conversions in recognized communities outside of Israel should be granted citizenship in Israel under the Law of Return.

The lawsuit was also filed on behalf of Tomas Dohlan, a Canadian man who completed an Orthodox conversion in February 2010 and was denied Israeli citizenship. Dohlan, his wife and four children arrived in Israel four months ago. Dohlan's wife is an Israeli citizen.

In 1988, the Israeli Supreme Court ruled that individuals who underwent conversions in "recognized" communities around the world would be eligible for aliyah under the Law of Return. However, the Interior Ministry consults with Israel's chief rabbinate to determine which communities are "recognized." When a convert presents an aliyah application, the ministry relies on the leadership of the denominations to determine eligibility. The Conservative and Reform communities are centralized and vouch for their converts.

Since Orthodox Judaism does not have a centralized leadership, the ministry has determined that Israel's chief rabbi is the leader of Orthodoxy around the world. The chief rabbinate now only recognizes conversions performed by about 50 Orthodox rabbis in North America, but there are more than 2,000 Orthodox rabbis in North America.

Since March, 20 converts have approached ITIM who were denied aliyah because they converted Orthodox, according to Rabbi Seth Farber, director of ITIM.

"An anomalous situation has been created where Orthodox converts are being discriminated against," Rabbi Farber said. "Unfortunately, only by going to the Supreme Court can we protect converts."

"This situation cannot continue," he added.

The Chief Rabbinate and ITIM reached an agreement this month under which the rabbinate will recognize all conversions conferred under the auspices of official Israeli conversion programs, including the military, which are all Orthodox.

Clothing company markets, edgy, in-your-face items

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

"It's a cutthroat industry," the model opines as she gives the middle finger salute. Although the attractive blonde with the flowing locks is not actually verbally denigrating "the industry," her T-shirt is.

With lettering of faux-blood, dripping as if still wet and alternating between red and black, the shirt – along with the curious omission of wearing any pants that day – makes it clear she is all about attitude and making a statement.

And she's not alone. On the website of a company that goes by the name Milly Millionaire, a section titled We are Young is devoted to a trio of skateboarding hipsters displaying "MM" tees and muscle shirts. One sleeveless item is worn by a dude with the obligatory backward-facing hat and another by a female model for whom, apparently, smiling to the camera is forbidden.

Then there's the other model, with the blue "rockin' the scene, killin' the show 24/7" T and the guy with what looks like his grandfather's hat, wearing the eponymous Milly Millionaire T-shirt, looking cool, edgy and... wait a minute, if my jaded middle-aged eyes don't deceive, isn't that Milly Millionaire himself?

As a matter of fact, it is him participating in the photo shoot and showing off the merchandise he has been marketing for well over a year now. The "Milly" behind Milly Millionaire is actually Daniel Milstein, a 24-year-old entrepreneur and creative force who conceived of the company two years ago and began marketing the apparel last year.

"It was something I always wanted to do, design clothing," he said over coffee at an uptown cafe.

As owner and executive designer of his own business, designing shirts gives him an outlet for his creative juices. So far, making a business of it has been a relative success, though sales are modest and the enterprise remains in its very early stages. In his first run, he marketed 2,000 T-shirts and a second run, expected shortly, will see a similar number produced. Milstein is taking a cautious approach to the business. Most of the clothing is sold online, but he also markets them at booths at various concerts and music events. "They were featured at the 2010 Teen Choice Awards" in Los Angeles and he sold them at the Vans Warped Tour – a music and extreme sports event – in Toronto last year as well.

Music and clothing are common denominators in Milstein's description of the process that got him into the business. "I have a background in music and with artists," he explained. "I was working with musicians and artists and clothing was always something I wanted to get into."

After brainstorming with artist friends a couple of years ago, he settled on the idea of marketing bold T-shirts that he would design himself. "The idea behind the clothing line was to cater to the music community and to artists," he said.

"The market I catered to is one I'm very familiar with. I knew the kind of products they were looking for."

Describing the shirts, he calls them, in turn "colourful, intriguing, in your face, edgy, different."

The shirts themselves are manufactured in the United States and printed in Canada, with the help of contacts he's developed over the years. He still consults with friends in the artistic community who help him with ideas and designs. He's at the stage where they still don't expect to get paid.

Recording artist Nicki Minaj shows off a Milly Millionaire shirt.

"What I'm most proud of is that I never used big loans or investors," he said. "I put in my own money and I still do.

"I wanted it to grow organically," he continued, although he acknowledged that "organically" could also be a synonym for "slowly."

This summer, he plans to introduce the products at various tour events and perhaps in some retail outlets downtown.

As the ultimate creative force behind Milly Millionaire, Milstein has had to learn about production costs, marketing and sales. But, "I think the hardest part is keeping up with new trends and giving the people what they want.

"The major priority is the artwork and the creativity. It has to be current, fresh and up to date.

"Right now, the biggest thing I'm working on for 2011 is new designs, to give it a new twist, a different direction in terms of creativity."

Israelis love their beef on Yom Ha'atzmaut

Amiram Cohen and Adi Dovrat-Meseritz
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Barbecues are an integral part of the celebration of Independence Day in Israel, and supermarket chains reported a particularly successful holiday with regard to meat sales.

The largest chain, Super-Sol, said meat sales prior to Yom Ha'atzmaut were 50 per cent higher than in an average week. The company said it sold 150,000 kebabs alone in the run-up to the holiday.

The Kimat Hinam chain reported a 15 per cent increase in sales of meat over last year's holiday. The company expects a similar jump in sales for Lag b'Omer, later this month.

Sales of meat were higher at the Rami Levi chain as well, where 14,000 tons of meat went out the door. Tiv Ta'am supermarkets reported a 12 per cent increase in holiday meat sales compared to last year and noted a trend toward the purchase of higher-quality cuts of meat.

Ironically, shortly before the Independence Day holiday, the Agriculture Ministry released comparative data on beef consumption in Israel and other developed countries which showed that Israelis prefer chicken to beef – primarily because it is cheaper, but also because of its generally lower fat content.

Unsurprisingly, Argentina leads the developed world in the annual consumption of beef, the ministry said, at 54 kilograms (119 pounds) per person. Australia comes next at 46 kilograms (101 pounds), followed by the United States at 41 (90 pounds).

Israelis, by contrast, consume only 17 kilograms (37.5 pounds) of beef, the lowest among the countries in the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD), which represents the world's developed economies. Israel also raises little cattle compared to other OECD countries, primarily because of the lack of grazing land.

The ministry also published guidelines for the purchase of various kinds of meat, recommending that consumers be sure the packaging features a veterinary inspection symbol. Fresh chicken should be pink and not red, and meat should not have an unusual odour. Fresh beef should be reddish and not shiny, and beef should be marbled with fat, making it juicier.

Dark edges are an indication that the beef is drying out. Meat should be defrosted in the refrigerator.

Tzafrir Ginsberg, of the Sheva group, which operates the Papagaio meat restaurant chain, said Israelis are showing an increased preference for fresh meat over frozen.

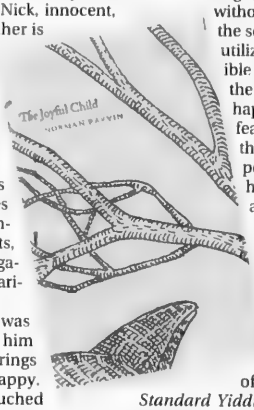
A novel about the ephemeral nature of life

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

At the heart of The Joyful Child, the new novel by Norman Ravvin (Gaspereau Press), is a subtle, charming sketch of a father-son relationship. The joyful child of the title is four-year-old Nick, innocent, playful, wide-eyed and curious. His father is Paul, whose life seems to be drifting away from its moorings even as his marriage to his wife, Mary, falls apart. In the centre of the book, Paul takes Nick on the road for a series of what the child happily describes as "adventures."



Emblems of impermanence, such as signposts or rusted-out old automobiles along an old highway, are strewn throughout the story. There are dreamlike quests, ruminations about loss, disappearing vagabond cousins that Paul must find, and various other forms of uprootedness.

"All he [Paul] wanted for his son was solidity. Stability. If he could shield him from his own rootlessness, his wanderings and self-doubt and regret, he'd be happy. The boy, lovely and naive, was still untouched by it all. His own life, Paul knew, had a tumbleweedy quality to it."

The early chapters sketching out the family's domestic life are essentially descriptive without any rising dramatic action; not a good recipe for readability. But when Paul and Mary entrust a young woman living in a hippie-style caravan near their home to babysit Nick, and she is late in returning the boy, a vague, looming menace is introduced. The reader is made to consider the horrible possibility, never explicity expressed, that the caravan will be gone and the boy abducted.

But no, this is neither a novel about child abduction nor a marriage gone awry: Mary just seems to disappear without foreshadow or explanation. However, the sense of vague menace continues. Ravvin utilizes a somewhat distant, infrequently visible narrator (a transient friend) leaving open the possibility that something horrible will happen to Paul. (It does.) Perhaps the real fear, too awful to be considered directly, is that something horrible and final will happen to the joyful child – that he will lose his innocence and purity, as he must. So, as in a dream, that possibility must be transmuted into something else.

Despite a minimum of plot and story points, The Joyful Child is a subtle, sensitive piece about the ephemeral nature of life and childhood innocence. It is Ravvin's third novel. He is also the author of a much sharper and pointed collection of short stories, Sex, Skyscrapers and Standard Yiddish, as well as the non-fiction Hidden Canada: An Intimate Travelogue.

Jewish Public Culture in the Late Russian Empire by Jeffrey Veidlinger (Indiana University Press)

In this non-fiction academic work published in 2010, Veidlinger, an academic at Indiana University, offers a new perspective on the vibrant Yiddish culture that flourished across the Russian Empire in the late 19th and early 20th century.

The period featured many prominent Jewish writers, historians and other cultural figures, including Sholom Aleichem, Mendele Moykher Sforim, Sholem Asch, Y. L. Peretz and Simon Dubnow. It also saw the emergence of many new cultural organizations such as libraries, drama circles, literary clubs, historical societies and even fire brigades.

Veidlinger observes that this "flowering of a grassroots secular culture" in the last years of the Russian Empire allowed Jews to step outside their tradition religious paradigm and to live for today, not just for the "next world," and also to permit a mode of expression within the wider multicultural society.

A Man in Uniform by Kate Taylor (Doubleday Canada)

Toronto author Kate Taylor studied France's infamous Dreyfus affair at university and found in it "a detective story worthy of le Carré." After featuring elements of the story obliquely in her first novel, Mme Proust and the Kosher Kitchen, she decided that it could "form the spine of a second novel." Thus, A Man in Uniform was born.

Lawyer Francois Dubon lives in a bourgeois eighth arrondissement of Paris when a mysterious widow visits his office, beseeching his help in rescuing her innocent friend, Captain Alfred Dreyfus, who has been wrongfully accused of treason. What follows is a noirish detective novel set in late-19th-century Paris.

The Day My Mother Cried by William D. Kaufman (Syracuse University Press)

The roughly 30 unadorned first-person tales in this short-story collection seem almost indistinguishable from memoir. Some are set in the author's parents' world in Ukraine, some in his American childhood, some on his international travels.

Kaufman is an inventive craftsman of autobiographical episodes with a distinctly literary bent. For the mature Jewish writer attempting to pen his or her memoirs, The Day My Mother Cried is especially recommended as a model of what is possible, using only stuff within easy reach: personal tales that are then minimally burnished or embellished into art.

Israeli play showcases old Jerusalem neighbourhood

Yosef Tastassa
Special to The CJN

The classic Israeli play The Spanish Garden, or Bustan Sepharadi, written by former Israeli president Yitzhak Navon, is being performed in Toronto on May 22 and 23 by Mifgash Theatre.

The company is the only Hebrew-speaking theatre troupe in Toronto and is made up of volunteers aged 10 to 70.

The musical, which was first staged in 1969, is set in the Sephardi Ohel Moshe neighbourhood in Jerusalem of the 1930s.

Ohel Moshe, established in 1882, is one of thea first neighbourhoods that was built outside Jerusalem's Old City walls. The area was named for Moses Montefiore, a 19th-century philantropist who supported Jewish settlements in Palestine.

The play portrays the vibrant life of the neighbourhood's residents. Written in Hebrew and the Spanish-Jewish language of Ladino, it focuses on a Sephardi family and is filled with sacred and secular poetry, anecdotes and humour.

The musical, which won the David's Violin Prize in 1970, has had an impact on the neighbourhood. A park in the Ohel Moshe was officially renamed the Spanish Garden in July 2005.

The play is produced by Tami Berman and directed by Yael Feingold. These two Israeli-Canadian women said it's important to show the Toronto community authentic Israeli culture.

"I wish to thank UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and Schwartz-Reisman Centre, and especially Galya Sarner, the director of federation's Hamifgash program," Berman said.

Ottawa musician is a mentor to Justin Bieber

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

As the guitarist and musical director for 17-year-old pop music phenomenon Justin Bieber, Ottawa-born Dan Kanter has also taken on the roles of mentor and friend.

"He is a great kid, a sweet guy, with a good heart," said 29-year-old Kanter, who spoke to The CJN from Melbourne, Australia, where he was on break from Bieber's world tour.

"I definitely mentor him. Even though he's my boss, I compare it to when I was a camp counsellor. He's not just musically impressionable, but even in life, we try to steer him in the right direction."

Kanter displayed a musical talent as a child and then studied piano, drums, bass and guitar. It seemed only a matter of time before he made a name for himself in the music industry.

By the age of 14, Kanter was playing clubs in Ottawa as the lead guitarist of a rock band called Hubris. Four years later – no doubt influenced by his father who directed musicals performed at the local Jewish community centre – Kanter wrote a full-length musical titled Destiny: The Musical.

After moving to Toronto in 2000 to pursue a music degree at York University, Kanter continued to build on his experience, eventually touring with up-and-coming artists, including Toronto's Fefe Dobson and Shiloh.

Kanter was well on his way to a promising career in the music biz, but he never imagined how quickly his career would snowball when he joined the "Bieber crew" in 2009.

Two years ago, Bieber was scheduled to perform an acoustic show at MuchMusic in Toronto, and was in need of a second guitarist. Kanter's record label recommended him.

"Right off the bat, we hit it off, and we've been working together ever since," he said.

When Kanter first joined him, Bieber hadn't yet become the household name he is today.

"He had quite the following on YouTube and Twitter, but it wasn't until six months of working with him that he really blew up everywhere," Kanter recalled.

Kanter said that despite Bieber's status as a pop icon, he is still just a "phenomenal, incredibly grounded" teenager from Stratford, Ont., who wants nothing more than to live up to the hype.

"I think he's become a phenomenon so quickly that he feels a lot of personal pressure to live up to it artistically, so he's always trying to be a better singer, a better guitar player, a better drummer, a better songwriter."

Dan Kanter, left, puts the teen idol through some vocal exercises before a show.

Kanter has his own reputation to live up to as the musical director for a tour that has stopped in "pretty much every city that has an arena that can hold at least 20,000 12-year-old girls."

Kanter has a presence not only on stage as Bieber's guitarist, but also behind the scenes, where he works closely with the dancers, the lighting technicians and the concert producers.

"I was always into the music and the show, not just the song, but how the song looks with lighting, dancing, choreography."

Kanter said touring with Bieber has given him so many opportunities to see the world, achieve childhood dreams and even experience moments he himself could never have imagined.

He said one of the best moments of his career came just weeks ago when they performed in Israel.

Coming from someone who has performed in front of millions of people in stadiums, on Saturday Night Live, The Oprah Winfrey Show, and the MTV Video Music Awards, it must have been a very special moment.

"For me, it was a huge deal to be playing in Israel. We had 40,000 kids in the audience and they don't really get concerts very often," Kanter said.

About an hour before they took to the stage, Kanter was approached by Bieber's manager, Scooter Braun, who is also Jewish, and he suggested that just before the show, Kanter would play "a very Jimmy Hendrix style version of Hatikvah," Israel's national anthem.

"I did it, and it was one of the most special moments of my life. With the kids singing along, right off the bat, it was quite amazing. A moment I'll never forget."

Although it was widely reported that Bieber had a difficult time navigating around Israel because of aggressive paparazzi, Kanter said that he didn't have the same experience because he was touring Israel separately.

As if touring with a pop star isn't eventful enough, Kanter also got married last October to fashion blogger Yael Latner – whom he met seven years ago when they travelled to Israel on a Birthright trip.

Kanter said he never would have anticipated that his wedding would make headlines, but that's just what happened when Bieber not only attended the wedding, but performed during the reception as well.

"Justin really wanted to be there and he wanted to sing. He wanted to sing the song for our first dance, but I told him, 'No offence, our song is not a Justin Bieber song,'" he said with a laugh.

With the tour ending this week in Japan, Kanter said he looks forward to working with Bieber in the future, but also hopes to establish himself as a songwriter and producer.

"Since working with Justin, I got to produce his last album, called My Worlds Acoustic, and he and I have been writing for his next record," Kanter said.

"Working with him has opened a lot of doors to write and produce for other artists. I would love to eventually not travel and work out of my studio in Toronto and write for film and TV and pop artists and be a sort of a David Frost type."

Despite his success, Kanter is determined to obtain his master's from York in musicology and is currently working on his thesis.

"I'm going to try to incorporate what I'm doing. I'm going to do it on the process of musical directing a pop show. Hopefully when we have some time off from travelling... I can try to finish my thesis."

Jewish music festival to be launched in Toronto

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

From Jewish Broadway to Yiddish theatre, from Sephardi beats to liturgical folk music and from Jewish gospel to the Golden Age of Cantors, Toronto will soon be musically enriched.

Jewish Music Week in Toronto: From Bible to Broadway is an inaugural weeklong music festival that will take place from May 22 to 29.

Hosted by Jewish and cultural organizations, synagogues and educational institutions, the festival will celebrate diverse genres of Jewish music, catering to audiences of all ages and musical tastes.

The festival will offer a series of exciting professional concerts, recitals, lectures and musical programs, during the day and evening, at locations in the Toronto area.

Performances will be held at synagogues, hotels, restaurants, seniors residences, universities and local hot spots. Ticket prices vary, with a number of events offering free admission.

Aliza Spiro, award-winning songwriter and wife of Cantor Simon Spiro of Beth Tzedec Congregation, conceived the event. "This is the first time an event of this kind has taken place in Toronto, offering the community such an incredible profusion of professional musical talents and styles."

The festival coincides with the international convention of the Cantors Assembly, taking place in Canada for the first time since its inception 64 years ago.

Aliza Spiro said the Jewish community, as well as the general public, will be exposed to different genres that fall into the category of Jewish music at the festival. They will also be able to see the Jewish influence within types of music that people ordinarily wouldn't classify as Jewish.

"When people think of Jewish music, they usually think of klezmer, cantorial or Israeli. We'll have that, but we'll also have a session on Jewish Broadway, featuring the Jewish songwriters of Tin Pan Alley, from the Gershwins, Jerome Kern, Irving Berlin, to Richard Rodgers, Stephen Sondheim and Leonard Bernstein."

In addition, Spiro said, the festival will offer a session on the Jewish contribution to jazz and a performance of Jewish big band. "These are songs made famous by Jewish big band leaders of the '30s and '40s, including Benny Goodman, Harry James and Artie Shaw."

For even more diversity, the festival will feature a string quartet playing Jewish classical music, a tribute to songwriter Debbie Friedman, who added a new dimension to synagogue prayer through music, and an evening on the Jewish influences of Bob Dylan.

Each night, there will be a major concert, said Spiro. "Sunday night [May 22] is Canadian Jewish Composers, with Toronto's famous Mendelssohn Choir [singing alongside the cantors]. We're introducing the Toronto audience to the cantors, but we're introducing the cantors to Toronto's music scene as well."

On Monday, May 24, Marvin Hamlisch performs. "Marvin is receiving the Cantors Assembly's highest award for his contribution to music and his work within the Jewish community. Marvin will be at the piano, telling anecdotes and premièring his new composition for Shehecheyanu, which was written specifically for the Cantors Assembly this year."

OnTuesday, May 24, a choir from Japan, made up of Christian performers who sing in Hebrew to show their support for Israel, appear. Spiro said Wednesday night, May 25, is the highlight event of the week with Halleluyah! Greatest Hits of the Israel and Chassidic Song Festivals.

"It will be a huge concert with a 40-piece orchestra, singers and cantors from around the world, four student choirs from Toronto schools and a special appearance by Israel's hottest new group, the Ein Prat Fountainheads."

This concert will showcase the most beloved songs from 40 years of the hugely popular song festivals. "These songs have become part of the fabric of our musical culture. We hear them on the bimah, we hear them at summer camp, we hear them at school, we hear them at weddings. Plus, I love the fact that, in addition to the cantors and singers from around the world, we have representation from four different Toronto school choirs," Spiro said.

"The consul general of Israel, Amir Gissin, will be appearing, too, and it's a real chance to show solidarity with Israel. We're expecting upwards of 1,500 people in the audience."

On Shabbat, different synagogues in the city will be featuring special musical Friday night services. "Maybe people who don't ordinarily go to shul on Friday night can now go for a new experience."

Spiro said she started promoting Jewish Music Week this past winter with a student art contest in Jewish schools. "The kids of Toronto knew about Jewish Music Week before their parents did. We felt it was important to get children involved in the arts."

With support from Baycrest, Koffler Centre for the Arts, Harold Green Jewish Theatre, Mount Sinai Hospital, Teatron Jewish Theatre, Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, Prosserman Jewish Community Centre, rabbis and synagogues, Spiro can spread her love of Jewish music.

"I think Jewish music needs exposure everywhere. For Jews, it's a way to connect to your Jewish roots, to your personal identity as a Jew and to the Jewish community. For non-Jews, it's important for them to connect to us. Music brings people together, and I think there will be many surprises when people see just how much music can be called Jewish music."

Performers who cancel their concerts in Israel due to politics are "real wimps," classic rock band Deep Purple's drummer said. Ian Paice made the statement in a Ha'aretz story at a news conference ahead of two scheduled concerts in Caesarea last weekend. This was to be the third time Deep Purple toured in Israel. The group performed four concerts in its last visit in 2008. Vocalist Ian Gillen told reporters that musicians should be impartial in political disputes. Band members said they were looking forward to playing in Israel. —JTA

Inter-Camp Classic raises funds for charity

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

In North America, European handball is one of those games you play in gym class and then forget about after you graduate. It may be loads of fun but somehow, in North America, it never caught on or developed the popularity of basketball or volleyball.

But for a handful of young women, it will be the sport of choice as they pass, dribble and shoot the ball in a girls tournament that will be part of the second Inter-Camp Classic on May 23.

Camp alumni will compete for bragging right in softball tournament

Fifty-two teams, divided largely on the lines of camp affiliation, will take part in the event. Slowpitch softball is the sport of choice for the vast majority, but regardless of the sport, friendly rivalries and raising money for charity are the raison d'etre for the event, said Spencer Hoffman, one of the organizers.

Located at the Poweraid Centre in Brampton, the Inter-Camp Classic is expected to attract some 600 competitors, ranging from high school and university students to older competitors, along with 1,000 spectators.

Hoffman, one of four buddies who pulled the event together, said Ve'ahavta and Kids In Camp will split the funds raised this year. Money raised for Ve'ahavta will go toward the organization's Uganda Spinal Surgery Mission, while the rest of the funds will subsidize families to allow youngsters to attend summer camps.

This year's goal is to raise $100,000 – a figure that is well within reach, Hoffman said. Last year, the first time the event was held, $38,000 was raised. The money went toward Project Muso, which helps combat malaria in West Africa, and that sum was matched by former British prime minister Tony Blair.

This year's event is close to double the size of the 2010 Classic, when only 28 teams participated. Each team is asked to ante in $1,200, while funds will also be raised from corporate sponsorships and a silent auction.

Participating teams will represent camps such as Tamarack, Manitou, Timberlane, George, White Pine, Winnebagoe, Wahanowin, Walden, Ramah, Northland, New Moon, as well as Young Judea's Shalom, Solelim, Biluim, and Kadimah camps.

Hoffman, who has been a camper or counsellor at Camp Manitou for 13 years, was joined as event organizer by Josh Howard and Jennie Howard (Camp Tamarack) and Noah Sliwin (Camp Walden).

To remind you about European handball, the sport features teams passing a ball, similar to a volleyball, with the aim of throwing it into the opposition's net. Players may dribble the ball and take no more than three steps with it and must pass or shoot within three seconds.

President penned play

"Without the personal support, the place given for rehearsals and the generous budget we are getting, none of this could have been feasible."

The circumstances of Berman and Feingold's initial meeting in 2003 illustrate how small the world is. Feingold graduated from the Beit Zvi School of the Performing Arts in Israel in 1977. She moved to Montreal in 1983, and established the the Hebrew Theatre Workshop at the Jewish Public Library in 2000. Berman, on a visit to Montreal, was inspired by an Israeli play directed by Feingold.

In a 2003 letter, an enthusiastic Berman told federation president Ted Sokolsky about her idea to establish a Hebrew-speaking theatre in Toronto. A few months later, Mifgash Theatre was born. "And here we are," Berman said.

Until 2007, the company imported plays and players from their affiliate in Montreal, but since 2008, Mifgash Theatre has recruited more players from the Toronto area.

Berman and Feingold's dream is that the company will perform for many Israeli and Jewish communities throughout North America.

The Spanish Garden will be presented in Hebrew and Ladino with English surtitles, at the Al Green Theatre, Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, on May 22 at 1:30 and 8 p.m. and May 23 at 1:30 p.m. 905-764-7817, www.mifgash.ca

Actor developed self-confidence despite being bullied as a kid

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

Thornhill's Brett Rabinowitz is being recognized beyond the community he was born and raised in.

The 27-year-old actor, who goes by the name Brett Ryan, said that he's never been an attention-seeker and being in the spotlight is still a strange feeling for him.

It wasn't until after high school that he had the courage to prove his abilities.

"It all started with a commercial I did for a Colombian soft drink company," said Ryan, who most recently appeared on the hit series Nikita and has landed roles on Disney channel's Life With Derek and CBC's Being Erica.

Ryan said that growing up he was bullied by classmates and turned to movies as an escape.

"As a kid, I was too small to be any good at hockey. I got made fun of a lot growing up. I would go home and watch a movie to forget about it for a while," he said.

"It sounds corny, but movies were kind of like a drug for me. They took me away from my reality for a while. They'd make me feel like anything was possible. The kid who got picked on in school could get the girl or could score the winning goal. It just gave me hope."

Brett Ryan on set of American Soldiers

After years of being bullied, Ryan found the self-confidence to go on auditions and face possible rejection.

He hopes that as his career evolves, he might be able to inspire the next generation "to dream" as well.

While starring in movies is his ultimate goal, any form of acting brings him joy.

"Movies are what have always inspired me, but acting for TV is also cool. At the end of the day, the idea of acting is fun for me. I hate waking up early, but if I'm waking up early to go to a set, it's never a problem. There's nowhere else I'd rather be."

Brett Ryan

Ryan said his favourite movies are dramas with a family element or films in the war genre. Gladiator, Saving Private Ryan, Cinderella Man and Life as a House are a few of his top picks. His ideal role would be "something fatherly or heroic," which explains why he admires actors Russell Crowe and Sean Penn.

For a movie to be ranked high on his list, Ryan said he looks for specific values that are intrinsic in the lead characters.

"The willingness and drive to tackle seemingly insurmountable odds to either achieve their dreams, keep a promise or just simply to be a good husband and father... These are qualities that describe an honourable man."

Ryan said the more he sees movies about strong and respectable men, the more he realizes how rare it is to find people like these today.

"Greed and dishonesty seem to have replaced the former traits. I like stories about this old breed of human being. As a flawed person, it gives me something to strive for within myself."

In films about men in wartime, Ryan said reputation and honour are more important than wealth.

"It's such an inspiring concept that honour is the highest form of glory that one can strive for. A character that finds himself in a situation where these issues are on the line would be my ideal role. If that role happened to be a true story, on top of that criteria, then that would be my dream role."

Next up for Ryan is a role in a TV movie for the USA Network with NCIS actor Mark Harmon.

"It's not a huge part, but... I'm looking forward to getting to work with [Mark] and learn from such an experienced actor."

Acting is something Ryan takes seriously, but he's realized there's always room for comedy on set. Pranks are pretty commonplace, and he's been the butt of a few jokes as a fresh face in the business.

He said the best prank that was ever played on him happened in 2005, when he was on the set of American Soldiers, a film that takes place during the Iraq war.

"The director decided he wanted me to shoot the grenade launcher on my gun for the first time during filming. We had been trained on how to handle and fire our guns, except I had never been trained on the grenade launcher."

Ryan was pulled aside by the gun wranglers for a quick crash course. He was warned that the launcher "punched a pretty nasty kickback when being fired and that the trigger guard, which had somewhat rough edges to it, could definitely take a little skin off your finger if you aren't holding the gun tight enough."

Ryan was told he wouldn't be able to fire a practice round, so when he shot the first take of the scene, he "jumped up, threw off the safety on the launcher and held on for dear life while pulling the trigger."

A hollow pop sound followed, but there wasn't any kickback at all.

"When I saw the footage from that take, my face was all contorted and I looked like I was constipated!

"That first take was the one they ended up using in the final cut of the film. Luckily, it's a very quick shot so it's tough to see."

Despite his expanding acting resumé, Ryan hasn't been able to avoid the struggling actor cliché of working as a waiter until he reaches a point in his career when he's landing acting gigs more regularly.

"I'm planning my escape," he said, noting that his family and friends are his biggest fans and supporters.

Ryan is going to Los Angeles soon, where he will be making contacts with people in the film industry.

While the trip may open new doors for him, he said exploring the city is his main priority right now.

"My next trip will be later in the summer to nail down representation," he added.

A posh charity dinner

"I didn't have time to buy them a present. You buy something, and we'll meet there in 20 minutes," I order Meir over the cellphone as the kids and I stroll through our neighbourhood to a posh charity dinner at our new friends' house.

When we arrive, Meir is waiting outside with an amazing chaplet – a floral garland. "Mommy," says my little girl, "didn't the host tell you she was allergic to flowers?" Damn, she did.

"You can't bring them. She'd realize you hadn't paid any attention to her needs." (They study "beginners psychology" at school.)

So I throw the flowers away. As we enter the house, the hostess looks at me agog. "Sorry," I say, "I'll bring you a present next time, or something."

New to Canada

Nina Shenhav

At dinner, the host talks on and on about a charity for poor families that he's establishing. We are served salmon. I love salmon, and I was so busy all day, I hardly ate. As I take the last salmon chunk from the serving plate, I notice my Meir, as well, is eating like there's no tomorrow. Guess he doesn't want to talk much. That's his new tactic with English speakers.

We call it a night, and I'm thinking about the expensive chaplet that I threw away. Looking around outside, I spot it in a garbage can, with leftovers on top of it. While I'm holding the flowers, I see my host looking at me, puzzled (when did he come out?). I throw the flowers back. "Nope, not here! I must have dropped my contact lens somewhere else!" I say.

"But you're wearing your glasses," my girl points out coldly.

The next day, because of all the charity talk, I pack a bag of the girl's old clothing and stuff (yes, including "Josef," her disgusting snake toy), and throw it into the nearest charity box. Naturally, the girl discovers Josef is gone, so we go back to the charity box, and we look for him. I open the bag I thought was mine, to find other stuffed animals we don't even recognize. The ones we do recognize belong to the hosts of the party. There's an awkward moment that is broken only by my girl's happy shout: "Mommy, look, I found this cute stuffed rat! I'm taking it!"

Two days later, we go for Sara's (my dog) night walk, forget to bring a poop bag, and are caught by the hosts as we're digging in someone's trash looking for a spare bag.

The next week, I forget my wallet, and I stand embarrassed in front of a cashier, holding my cup of coffee and promising to pay later, and there are the hosts, watching from the next line.

A week later, we are, surprisingly, invited by them to another charity dinner. This time, we get some leftovers and some pocket money. Life is good.

Except, if any of you find a stuffed animal snake answering to the name Josef, please contact me immediately.

LAYERED CITRUS DESSERT

1 can sweetened condensed milk
1 can evaporated milk
zest of 1 large lemon
7 tbls. fresh lemon juice
24 graham wafers, divided
1 c thawed whipped topping

Combine milks in small bowl. Add lemon juice, 1 tbsp. at a time, stirring with fork after each addition until well blended - mixture will become thick. Stir in zest. For easy unmoulding, line empty pan with plastic wrap. Arrange 6 wafers on bottom of 8"x4" loaf pan, trimming if necessary to make snug fit; cover with 1 c milk mixture, spreading to completely cover wafers. Repeat layers twice with remaining wafers as last layer. Refrigerate overnight. Unmould onto plate just before serving. Spread Cool Whip over top of dessert. Garnish with lemon slices just before slicing.

An open letter to people without friends

"Two are better than one because they have a good reward for their labour. For if they fall, the one will lift up his fellow; but woe to him that is alone when he falls, for he has not another to help him up" (Ecclesiastes 4:9-10).

It must be so tough not having a friend. I'm sorry you are alone. I am writing this to compel you to try again to find a friend.

Friendship is honey. It is milk. "Chaver" (Hebrew for "friend") comes from the Hebrew root meaning "to be joined" or "to unite." The idea and benefits of having friends are so important that Perkei Avot (Ethics of our Fathers) lists "cleaving to friends," dibbuk chaverim, as one of the 48 virtues needed to acquire Torah.

David and Jonathan in the Book of Samuel set the standard for friendship: "Then Jonathan made a covenant with David because he loved him as his own soul." Ruth swears her allegiance to her friendship with her mother-in-law saying: "Where you go I will go, and where you stay I will stay. Your people will be my people and your God my God."

In the ninth book of his Nicomachean Ethics, Aristotle says: When man is in good health and prosperous, he enjoys the company of his friends; in time of trouble, he is in need of them; in old age, when his body is weak, he is assisted by them.

I have always had friends. I am blessed. I imagine what it would be like not to and I can't. Our hearts ache. Consider though, some ideas.

Shyness must be your greatest obstacle. Find a place where you can blend in quickly and not be seen until you want to be. Shuls are good for that. Most of our local synagogues are not friendly. I've been visiting a few with my son and am rarely welcomed. You've probably figured this out, but if you go long enough, eventually a good soul will say, "Good Shabbes," and invite you for lunch.

Check out chavrutah programs in the city, places where you can study Torah with a friend. The Talmud says, "I have learned much from my teachers, but from my friends more than my teachers."

Attend lectures or art or writing classes. Start a Jewish friendship page on Facebook. E-friends are great because they allow for a an easing in of familiarity. Start a blog called "looking for friendship."

Volunteer. You'd be surprised who you might meet delivering Shabbat food to people in need. Adopt a senior. Some of my richest friendships have been with octogenarians. Friendship has no age.

Toronto is not a warm city. Those who have friends likely don't get this. We need to change, but for now, for those who don't have friends and believe you never will, find or develop a group that is as kooky as you and enjoys the same kind of crazy adventures. Or think mainstream and look for the softest person in the room.

If you've settled into a solitary life and believe it will never change, think again. There are individuals around the block who love friendships and will love you. Push hard to find them. Be a Jonathan to David. Be a Ruth to Naomi. Friendship is honey. It is milk.

"You should love your friend as you love yourself."
